RODOLPHUS I.

- RODOLPHUS, the first of that name, count of Hapsburg, was educated under Frederic II. who held him up to the baptismal font, but is afterwards said to have taken umbrage at the prediction of an astrologer, who prophesied that the count would ascend the imperial throne, on the failure of Frederic's issue, which, at that time, consisted of ten persons. Rodolphus, perceiving the emperor's favour sensibly cooled upon this account, dexterously withdrew himself from his court, on some plausible pretence, and afterwards retired to that of Ottocarus king of Bohemia, where he exercised the office of grand marshal with great reputation. From thence he returned to his own territories, where, by his prudent and gallant behaviour, he acquired authority among all his neighbours. He had, during the troubles in Germany, performed divers exploits, which augmented his fame and patrimony at the same time. His first military expedition was against Hugo Trieffenstein, who had said something to his prejudice. Him he slew in combat, and afterwards took possession of his lands; then he turned his arms against Rodolphus of Loffenberg, his own relation: but that war was terminated by an accommodation. He, in consequence of a quarrel with Hartman count of Kyburg, seized upon his succession for his own use, defeated the counts of Toggenburg, and ravaged their country; and putting himself at the head of a troop of gentlemen devoted to the emperor Conrad IV. pillaged the suburbs of Basil, and burnt a monastery; for which outrage, he and all his companions were excommunicated. The citizens of Strasburg having quarrelled with their bishop, and reflecting on the advantages they had derived from the protection of Albert of Hapsburg, they now solicited that of his son Rodolphus, chose him chief of their militia, and, under his conduct, took the fortrels of Haldemburg. They likewise surprised Colmar and Mulhausen, and at last obtained a complete victory over their bishop, who, in a few days, died of grief for this overthrow. His successor sued for peace, which was granted by Rodolphus and the citizens of Strasburg, who erected a stone statue in gratitude to their deliverer. But, two years before this event, the citizens of Zurich, harrassed by the nobles of their neighbourhood, had proposed to chuse Ulrick of Regensburg for their protector, and he refusing that office, unless they would yield to him the perpetual superiority of their town, they put themselves under the auspices of Rodolphus, who was his declared enemy, and three years were consumed in hostilities and mutual mutual incursions; but at length fortune declared in favour of Rodolphus, who reduced Ulrick to a dependence upon that very city, the government of which he had refused. Nor was the piety of Rodolphus inferior to his valour (O). When count Werner of Falkestein was chosen archbishop of Mentz, and set out on his journey to Rome, Rodolphus gave him a convey, with a strong body of troops, as far as the Alps, and, waiting for his return in the same place, reconducted him in safety to his see: an obligation for which the archbishop assured him he would take all occasions to express his gratitude; and he afterwards kept his word.

A. D. 1273.
Pope Gregory
X. presses the princes to a new election.

THE empire had been now fifteen years without a chief, that is, since the abdication of Richard; for though Alphonso took the title of emperor, and promised from time to time to repair into Germany, he never could find leisure for that expedition. The German princes, tired with his delays, and seeing the empire more and more involved in trouble and confusion, and being moreover pressed by pope Gregory X. who threatened, if they should longer delay an election, to provide for the necessities of the empire by his own authority; induced, I say, by these motives, the princes intreated the elector of Mentz to call a diet at Frankfort. There, notwithstanding the protestations which Alphonso's ambassadors made against all that should be done to the prejudice of their master, and the pretensions of the king of Bohemia and some other princes to the imperial crown, the archbishop of Mentz had such influence in the diet, as to engage a majority in favour of the count of Hapsburg, whose merit he did not fail to extol.

chosen emperor.

THE beginning of this assembly was very tumultuous. The deputies of Ottocarus pretended that their master had two votes, as king of Bohemia and duke of Austria; but his pretensions were opposed by the count Palatine, who affirmed that he had usurped Austria, and that he could not justly avail himself of the investiture he had received from Richard of England, whom Germany had never acknowledged as emperor; besides this contest, which could not be determined, another dispute arose about the choice of a king of the Romans. Menhard count of Tyrol proposed three persons, namely, Albert count de Goritz, Rodolphus of Hapsburg, and Bernard, who called himself duke of Carinthia, though he was not in possession of that province. Each of the three had partizans at the assembly, but the strongest party declared for Rodolphus. Some of the electors, indeed, were of opinion, that they ought rather to chuse a prince of higher rank and greater power (P), who might be more enabled by his authority to retrieve the reputation of the empire; but the archbishop of Mentz replying, that this end would be better answered by a wise, valiant, and experienced prince, than by one who had nothing to recommend him but his riches and power, his brethren of Cologne and Triers favoured him with their votes, without further hesitation. The secular princes, and in particular Lewis duke of Bavaria, and Albert duke of Saxony, who were unmarried, reflecting that Rodolphus had six fair daughters, of whom they might have their choice in marriage, while, by means of the rest, he might make other advantageous alliances, assented to the opinion of the ecclesiastic electors, and unanimously gave their voices in favour of count Rodolphus. The news of his elevation was brought to him by Frederic burgrave of Nuremberg, while he was engaged in the siege of Basil (Q), in consequence of the protection he had granted to one of the factions of that city. He no sooner received this intimation, than he repaired to Frankfort, where, having accepted the imperial dignity, he was conducted by all the princes to Aix-la-Chapelle, and there crowned with the usual solemnity (R).

He repairs to Frankfort, and is crowned at Aix-la-

d AVENT.

(O) Being one day at the chace, it began to rain with such violence as rendered the road extremely dirty, when chancing to meet a poor curate on foot, carrying the host to a sick person, he was so much affected with the sight of this good priest labouring through the mud, that he immediately alighted, saying, it ill became him to ride on horseback, while the priest who carried our Saviour was walking on foot, and not only mounted the curate, but attended him bareheaded to the sick man's house, and afterwards reconducted him to his church, where the priest, amazed at such an extraordinary instance of zeal, gave him his benediction, and, being inspired by the Holy Ghost, prophesied that he and his descendants would sit upon the imperial throne (3).

(P) This seems to have been an unreasonable objection, when we consider the birth and fortune of Rodolphus. He was the son of Albert count of Hapsburg and Itba, daughter of the count of Bregentz, descended by his father from the counts of Thierstein, near Basil in Switzerland, as may be proved by the antiquities of the monastery of Mucy; and by the mother, from the counts of Hapsburg. At the time of his election there was not a count in Germany who could vie with him in wealth and extent of dominion; besides the county of Hapsburg, which he inherited from his father, he possessed three more; namely, Kybourg, Baden, and Lentzenbourg, which last he enjoyed by his uncle Hartman, and by his wife he obtained the landgraviate of Alsace (4).

(Q) Henry of Neufchatel, bishop of Basil, was so confounded and chagrined at the news of this election, that he fell sick of mortification, and is said to have addressed himself to God in these words:

(R) At this coronation the princes making some scru-

a HAVING thus taken possession of the imperial throne, his first care was to suppress the rapine, robberies, and murders, which had so long prevailed with impunity, and he succeeded so well in his endeavours, that, in a little time, peace and security were re-established; for he destroyed in Thuringia sixty castles, which were the retreat of banditti, and ordered ninety-nine highwaymen to be hanged at one time in the city of Erfurt. A certain Hungarian count, having for some years publicly murdered, robbed, and pillaged the country, the emperor, who then resided at Vienna, would not make war upon a whole country for the villainy of one man, and therefore employed the count's friends to reclaim him by remonstrance and admonition. They accordingly made such good use of their exhortations, that he was persuaded to wait upon the emperor in person, after he had been assured b that he had nothing to fear from his resentment. He was very kindly received by Rodolphus, had the honour to eat at his table, and even to drink out of his own glass (S). After this hospitable entertainment, the emperor having remonstrated to him the injury he did himself by his enormous actions, he swore by all that was sacred that he would reform his life, and upon that promise was suffered to retire towards his own habitation. But he was beset by his enemies on the road, and thrown into a river, where he perished. Thus was the country rid of a notorious thief, without any prejudice to the emperor's word of honour (T).

A. D. 1274.
He suppresses robbery, and restores the security of the public roads.

c His son Albert having married Elizabeth daughter of the count de Tyrol, and uterine sister of Conradin, who was executed at Naples, he laid claim to the rich inheritance of that young prince, consisting of Alsace and part of Suabia, and, by force of arms, wrested them from several noblemen who had seized those fiefs, during the troubles of the inter-regnum, and now engaged in an association to defend their unjust acquisitions. The next step which Rodolphus took was to solicit the pope's confirmation of his imperial dignity, which he obtained, after his ambassadors had sworn in his name that he would assert and defend the holy see against all its enemies, and never make any attempts to the prejudice of its vassals, particularly of the illustrious Charles king of Sicily and his heirs.<sup>2</sup>

He lays claim to the inheritance of Conradin.

His election confirmed by the pope.

d THIS complaisance of the pope was owing to the hope he had entertained of engaging Rodolphus in a crusade for the relief of the Christians in Palestine, the expence of which was to be defrayed by the tythe of all church revenues, to be raised for that purpose for the space of six years, according to the decree of the council held at Lyons.

ALPHONSO of Castile, far from renouncing his pretensions to the imperial crown, loudly protested against these proceedings of the pope, whom he visited at Beaucaire in Provence, in order to engage him in his interest: but Gregory was deaf to all his remonstrances; and, tho' he returned to Castile very ill satisfied with the result of this interview, and even affected to re-assume the imperial ornaments, which he had for some time laid aside, he was at last, by the admonitions of the archbishop of Seville, prevailed upon to renounce his claim to the empire; and, in consideration of this self-denial, the pope permitted him to lay a tax upon the clergy, for the expence of the war against the *Moor*s, who threatened to attack him from all quarters.<sup>b</sup>

e RODOLPHUS having in a great measure pacified the troubles of the empire, assembled a diet at Mentz, where he granted new privileges to Goslar and other cities, and confirmed those which had been conferred by his predecessors. Upon this occasion also the deliberations of the assembly turned upon certain noblemen, who had protested against the election of the count of Hapsburg, particularly Ottocarus king of Bohemia, against whom they had other causes of discontent; for the states of the duchy of Austria, which, after the death of Frederic their last duke, had been seized upon by Ottocarus, complained of the oppression they suffered under the government of the usurper, from which they begged to be delivered.

ple of taking the accustomed oaths, because the sceptre was wanting, without which they could neither give nor receive the investiture of their fiefs, Rodolphus took a crucifix from the altar, saying, "This is the representation and sign of him by whom we are saved, let us use it instead of a sceptre." They accordingly agreed to the expedient, and were invested with their fiefs with a crucifix (6).

(S) Upon this occasion, "I have now, said he, no reason to be afraid; for I have drank with the best man on earth (7)."

(T) Towards the end of the inter-regnum many of the princes and towns caused their peculiar laws to be reduced to a body, and published. The principal were those of Magdeburg, Saxony, and Suabia: the first of these were adopted by the states of Prussia, and afterwards received in several provinces, that did not belong to Germany. The Mirrou of the Saxon Law was likewise composed during the anarchy, by one Epko, or Repko, who says he had collected the laws of Constantine and Charlemagne. This work, which first appeared in Latin, and was afterwards translated into the German language, though not recommended by any public authority, acquired great reputation through all the empire. Before its appearance the laws of Charlemagne and the Othos were very little known. The Germans had forgot the statutes enacted in the assemblies of their nation, and followed implicitly the codes of Theodorus and Justinian in all their tribunals and courts of justice (8).

A. D. 1257.

The emperor subdues divers princes of the empire, and makes peace with Henry of Bavaria.

A. D. 1276.

Ottocarus does homage to Rodolphus for Bohemia and Moravia.

Renounces his engagements at the instigation of his wife, but is defeated and slain.

Moved by these solicitations, Rodolphus convoked a diet at Augsburg, to which Ottocarus sent ambassadors, who, instead of doing homage in his name to the emperor, whom he had not yet acknowledged, one of them began a long harangue, in which he disavowed and declared void the election of Rodolphus. The members, incensed at this presumption, interrupted the discourse, and ordered the ambassadors to be turned out of the assembly; then they declared Ottocarus a rebel to the empire; and concluded, that as he had unjustly taken possession of Austria, Stiria, Carniola, and Carinthia, the emperor should divest him of these dominions. Ambassadors being sent to him with a notification of this sentence, he arrogantly answered, that as to Rodolphus, who was formerly his servant, he had already paid him his wages; that he possessed Austria, Stiria, and Carniola, as the dowry of his wife; and that as he had purchased Carinthia with ready money, he was resolved to maintain himself in his lawful possession. The ambassadors having made this report to the diet at Augsburg, it was decreed, that he should be chastised for his disobedience, and those lands re-united to the empire (U). Rodolphus undertook to execute this resolution, and raised a sufficient body of forces for the occasion; but, before he turned his arms against Ottocarus, he resolved to subdue and chastise all the other noblemen, who refused to acknowledge him as emperor. Accordingly he fell upon the marquis of Baden, and the counts of Neuburg and Fribourg, who were soon reduced, and compelled not only to do him homage for the lands they legally possessed, but also to restore some fiefs they had unjustly seized in the Brisgaw, Suabia, and on the banks of the Rhine. He afterwards attacked and defeated Eberhard, count of Wurtemberg, surnamed the Quarrelsome, and obliged Henry of Bavaria to sue for peace, which was granted by the intercession of his brother Lewis of Bavaria, count Palatine, on condition that Henry's son, Otho, should marry the emperor's daughter Catherine, on whom he should bestow, by way of dower, all the fiefs he possessed on the river Ens; that he should pay to Rodolphus forty thousand ounces of gold, and take the oath of allegiance to him for all the towns and territories in his possession<sup>1</sup>.

RODOLPHUS, having humbled those petty adventurers, marched into Austria, accompanied by the archbishops of Mentz and Cologne, the bishops of Wurtsburg, Ratisbon, and Passau, and Lewis, count palatine of the Rhine. But the prelates being sick of the war, and unwilling to see the king of Bohemia altogether reduced, mediated an accommodation in his favour, on condition that he should be contented with Bohemia and Moravia, and hold them as fiefs of the empire (X). Ottocarus was fain to comply with these terms, and to receive from his imperial majesty the investiture of his dominions, which was performed in the island of Camberg in the Danube, with great magnificence, under a pavilion which was close shut up, in order to spare Ottocarus the mortification of being seen in such an attitude of humility by more people than those whose presence was absolutely necessary; but, in the midst of the ceremony, the pavilion, either by accident or design, opening on both sides, discovered Ottocarus on his knees before the emperor; a circumstance which greatly mortified the king, and concurred, with the instigation of his wife, who was a Russian princess, and remarkably haughty, to induce him to renounce the treaty he had made, and have recourse again to arms for reducing Austria again to his obedience<sup>2</sup>. The emperor no sooner understood this breach of faith, than he assembled his army, and marching against Ottocarus as a perfidious infractor of the peace, a battle ensued, in which the king was slain (Y). After this victory, Rodolphus gave the government of Austria, Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola, to his eldest son count Albert, whom he afterwards, in a diet at Augsburg, publicly invested with the dukedom of Austria, which was incorporated with the college of the princes; and at the same time he invested Rodolphus, another of his sons, with the county of Suabia, which belonged to him in right of his wife Ann, countess of that country (Z). He likewise resolved to adhere

(X) In this accommodation it was stipulated, that Austria should revert to the emperor, its lawful lord; that Carinthia, and the other provinces of Ulrich, should be given in dowry with Agnes, the daughter of Ottocarus, who should be married to Rodolphus, the emperor's fifth son; and, in order to strengthen this treaty, it was also agreed, that Jutta, one of the emperor's daughters, should marry Wincelaus, the son of Ottocarus, tho' he was at that time but seven years of age (10).

(Y) In this battle the emperor's horse being killed, he fought on foot with great gallantry, until he was remounted by Bertold Capella; then he furiously charged among the thickest of the foe, and, by his personal valour, contributed to the fortune of the day (11).

(Z) About this time appeared one Tilo Collup, a man of some eloquence, and undaunted effrontery. He pretended to be the real emperor Frederic II. who had, for thirty years, been obliged to be concealed in the Holy Land, to elude the fury of the infidels. He claimed the empire as his right; and altho' he was generally considered as a fanatic, he found means to engage some people in his cause: but he was apprehended at Westzlar, and, with all his adherents, condemned to the flames (12).

a to the articles of the last treaty, and for that purpose put young Winceslaus, whom he had destined for his son-in-law, under the tutelage of Otho, marquis of Brandenburg. Rodolphus adheres to the treaty in favour of his son Winceslaus.

THEN he declared war against Henry of Bavaria, who had favoured Ottocarus, in hopes of sharing the spoils, should that prince be victorious. His brother Lewis, count Palatine, and son-in-law to the emperor, though he had hitherto been firmly attached to Rodolphus, in expectation of recovering the investiture of Austria, being by this time disappointed in his hope, was on the eve of declaring openly for his brother, that, by their united force, they might compel the emperor to bestow the duchy of Austria upon a Bavarian prince. But, before they could join, and take proper measures for maintaining the war, Rodolphus fell suddenly upon Henry, whom he entirely defeated; so that the project fell to the ground; and the emperor granted him peace, though upon conditions that were very hard upon his son Otho, who had married Catherine, the daughter of Rodolphus; for he obliged him to restore Litz, Steyer, and other towns above the river Ens, which he had given to that princess by way of dower.

RODOLPHUS, without going in person into Italy, terminated all his differences with the pope, by means of ambassadors. In the year of his coronation, Gregory X. having held a council at Lyons, at which Alphonso, king of Castile, and Ottocarus, king of Bohemia, had, by their ambassadors, demanded the imperial crown, Rodolphus sent thither his chancellor Otho, with full power to confirm all the privileges which his predecessors had granted to the holy see, provided the empire should in no shape be dismembered. Accordingly Otho agreed, and swore, in his master's name, to a certain number of articles concerning the defence of the lands belonging to the holy see; and Gregory, on his side, confirmed the imperial crown to Rodolphus, rejecting the claims of his competitors<sup>1</sup>. Next year there was an interview between the emperor and the pope, in the city of Lausanne, where the former promised to restore to the church all the countries between Radicosani and Ceperano, the exarchate of Ravenna, Pentapolis, the marquisate of Ancona, the duchy of Spoleto, the estate of the countess Mathilda, the county of Bertinoro, and all the lands mentioned in the different privileges granted by Lewis the emperor. On these conditions the crown was again confirmed to Rodolphus, who engaged not only to repair to Rome, at the feast of Pentecost next ensuing, to receive the crown from the hands of the pope, but likewise to set out for Palestine, immediately after the ceremony of his coronation<sup>m</sup>; and, as a mark of this his intention, he at that time took the cross. This last condition, in all probability, was stipulated by the pope, in order to hinder the emperor from enterprizing any thing in Italy. But Rodolphus made no preparations either to go to Rome or the Holy Land: on the contrary, he impowered ambassadors to receive the oath of allegiance from the inhabitants of the cities of Romagnia, and the neighbouring countries; an instance of disregard which provoked his holiness to such a degree, that he had recourse to a sentence of excommunication<sup>n</sup>. Has an interview with the pope at Lausanne, and promises to go to the Holy Land.

AFTER Gregory's death, Innocent V. wrote to the emperor, inviting him to send ambassadors to Rome, to negotiate an accommodation with the holy see, forbidding him at the same time to go thither in person, until the peace should be concluded, and the dispute terminated between him and Charles of Anjou, about the vicariate of Tuscany, and the county of Provence. The king of Sicily had obtained the vicariate during the inter-regnum, and still kept it after the election of an emperor, when he had no longer any just claim to that office. Rodolphus, at the same time, disputed with the son of Charles the possession of Provence and Forcalquier, which, he affirmed, had devolved to the empire, of which they were fiefs, by the death of Raymond Berenger, who left no male issue, and had no power to bequeath his dominions to heirs female, in right of whom they were claimed and possessed by Charles of Anjou.

POPE John XXI. had writ to the same purpose, and laid injunctions upon the archbishop of Mentz to persuade the emperor to perform his promises: finally, Nicholas III. pressed him to confirm the articles he had promised to Gregory, which he now willingly performed, not only in consideration of the vicariate of Tuscany, which was at length yielded to him by Charles king of Sicily (A), at the desire of the pope, but also because he was inclined to a reconciliation with the holy see. His ambassador therefore renewed and confirmed, in full consistory at Rome, all the promises which he had made; and the nuncio, whom the pope sent into Performs his articles with the pope. A. (A) By the mediation of the pope, a peace was concluded between the emperor and the king of Sicily, on condition that Charles should renounce the vicariate of Tuscany; that he and his heirs should possess the provinces of Provence and Forcalquier, as fiefs of the empire, and the accommodation was cemented by a match between Charles Martel, the grandson of his Sicilian majesty, and Clementina, the emperor's daughter (13).

Germany, obtained a full ratification of these articles, as well from the emperor as from the princes of the empire<sup>a</sup>. Notwithstanding this agreement, the pope, far from having any real friendship for Charles king of Sicily, wished for nothing so much as his destruction, and the expulsion of his family from the throne of Naples. Charles had affronted his pride in rejecting with disdain a match that he proposed between his nephew and one of the daughters of the prince of Salerno; and this slight operated so strongly upon his resentment, that he engaged in the conspiracy of John di Procida, which broke out in the massacre, known by the appellation of the Sicilian Vespers, and had well nigh terminated in the ruin of his Sicilian majesty<sup>p</sup>.

The emperor invests his son Albert with the duchy of Austria, &c. A. D. 1283.

THE emperor still resided in Austria or Stiria, insensibly preparing the people of these provinces for becoming subjects to his family: he granted privileges to the clergy, bestowed new dignities upon the noblemen, diminished the taxes, built and repaired public edifices, and, in a word, behaved with such generosity and moderation as won their hearts; and they unanimously demanded a prince of the imperial house. In consequence of this agreeable request, he founded the German princes, and finding them favourably disposed towards him and his family, convoked a diet at Augsburg, where his son Albert received the investiture of Austria, Stiria, Carniola, and the march of the Vinides: but this ceremony was not performed until Rodolphus had obtained the consent of Albert, duke of Saxony, who had more weight in the diet than any other nobleman of Germany. At the same assembly Rodolphus, the emperor's second son, was invested with Suabia, which had devolved to the emperor upon the death of Conradin, who left no issue; and Carinthia, with the march of Trevifano, was bestowed upon the count of Tyrol<sup>q</sup> (C).

IMMEDIATELY after the diet, the emperor marched into Alsace, to the assistance of the bishop of Basil, from whom the count de Montbelliard had taken the castle of Porentrui, which Rodolphus in person besieged, and restored to the right owner. Then he appeased some quarrels which had produced a civil war among the inhabitants of Mulhausen, and cost their neighbours abundance of blood. But, notwithstanding all the care and industry he exerted in re-establishing peace and tranquillity through the towns of Germany, the spirit of discord reigned in many cities, and even possessed the churches and religious communities: there was scarce a parish which did not feel the miseries of civil war; the different processions engaged each other in the streets; canons fought with their own bishops; and the burghers, as well as noblemen, decided the most trivial dispute by single combat; nay, this absurd custom prevailed with such rage and barbarity, that it contributed as much as all the other wars to the depopulation of the empire.

Diet at Wirtzburg.

ABOUT this period the pope used all his endeavours to execute the project for a crusade, which had been formed by Gregory X. and even began to levy, through all the countries of Christendom, the tythes which had been granted for this purpose by the council at Lyons. Rodolphus convoked a diet at Wirtzburg, to deliberate on this subject, and was not displeased to find all the princes, ecclesiastic as well as secular, averse to this imposition. Indeed his holiness could not have chosen a more improper season for carrying this design into execution: the emperor was intirely ingrossed by the measures he took to aggrandize his family, and establish his power. Peter III. of Arragon was employed in supporting his claim to Sicily; Castile was harrassed by a civil war on the death of Alphonso; Italy was divided

(C) The ceremonial of taking possession of this duchy is so singular, that we shall describe it for the entertainment of the reader. Near the town of St. Voit, in a pleasant valley, are the ruins of an old town, the name of which is not known. In the neighbourhood of these is a piece of marble set upright, and upon this stands a peasant of a certain family, which has an hereditary right to take that station. On his right hand is a black meagre bullock; on his left a lean mare, and all around him a crowd of peasants and other people. Then the prince, environed by his officers, advances with the standards and marks of principality. Count Goritz, who is marshal of the court, goes first, with twelve small standards, and is followed by all the magistrates in their formalities, while the prince himself appears in the habit of a shepherd. He is no sooner perceived by the peasant on the stone, than he exclaims in the Sclavonian tongue, "Who is he that comes with such a magnificent train?" He is answered, "It is the prince of the country." The peasant asks again, "Is he an equitable judge, zealous for the good of his country? Is he of a liberal disposition? Does he deserve to be honoured? Is he an observer and defender of the Catholic religion?" Being answered in the affirmative, "I desire to know, cries he, by what right he comes to take my place?" Then the count de Goritz exclaims, "The favour is purchased of thee for sixty deniers: these beasts are thine: thou shalt have the cloaths the prince now wears, and thy family shall be exempted from taxes." Then the prince approaching, receives a box on the ear from the peasant, who exhorts him to be a good judge. So saying, he gives him his place, and carries off the bullock and the mare. The prince mounts the stone, brandishes his sword, promises to judge equitably, goes to hear mass, quits his pastoral garb for apparel more suitable to his quality, entertains the company, and returns to the stone, where he hears some causes, and receives homage for the vacant fiefs (14).

- a by a quarrel that raged between the Genoese and Pisans; the pope himself could hardly contain the Romans and subjects of the ecclesiastical state within the bounds of their duty; and Hungary was laid waste by the Cumani, a savage people, inhabiting part of Wallachia and Moldavia, who poured every year like a deluge into Hungary precisely about the time of harvest, and lived with their families and flocks until they had consumed all the fruits of the earth, and all the substance the country afforded; then they retired to their own habitations. These incursions were repeated for several seasons, and the Hungarians, quite dispirited under the government of Ladislaus III. a weak effeminate prince, at length derived courage from despair, and prevailed upon their monarch to lead them against the enemy. He accordingly levied an army, and took possession of the hills of Krapatz, by which the Cumani
- b usually entered the kingdom: there waiting for a proper opportunity, attacked them while they were engaged in the defiles, with such fury and unexpected resolution, that the greatest part of them were cut in pieces, and their king Oleto obliged to retreat with the utmost precipitation. However, he soon returned with a reinforcement of Tartars, and penetrating as far as Pesth, destroyed the whole country with fire and sword<sup>a</sup>.

- HONORIUS IV.* who about this time succeeded Martin in the papacy, began his reign by declaring one Pinzivello Fleſca, a Genoese, vicar of the empire in Italy; and his office was confirmed to him by the emperor, who had no inclination to quarrel with the Roman see: This vicar, however, behaved with such insolence and indiscretion, as attracted the hatred and contempt of the Tuscans; so that there was a necessity for divesting him of his dignity, and Rodolphus appointed in his room Henry Crodcur, bishop of Basil, his own chancellor; a nomination which was approved by the pope, in consideration of the emperor's relinquishing all the rights the empire still retained upon the exarchate of Ravenna<sup>c</sup>.

- ALTHOUGH Martin and his predecessors had often invited Rodolphus to come and receive the imperial crown, he would never go to Rome; but to those who pressed him to that journey, he used to repeat the fable of the fox, who refused to go and visit the sick lion, because he perceived the footsteps of a great many animals who went thither, but none of those who came back. In the same manner the emperor observed, that many of his predecessors had gone to Italy, but that they seldom, if ever, returned, without the loss either of their rights or authority<sup>d</sup>. He therefore contented himself with sending his chancellor into Italy, with power to receive, in his name, the homage and allegiance of the imperial towns; but they refused to take the oaths to a commissary, so that one would have thought Rodolphus should have reduced them to their duty by force: but being in no condition to take this step, he had recourse to the method of accommodation, and was the first emperor who sold these privileges and immunities which they have since enjoyed. The city of Lucca paid but twelve thousand crowns; those of Florence, Genoa, and Bologna paid but six thousand each, on condition, nevertheless, that they should still preserve their fidelity to the empire, of which they were members<sup>e</sup>. This conduct not a little tarnished the reputation of Rodolphus, who, in the sequel, was looked upon as an avaricious prince, who turned every thing to ready money (D).

In the same language also he ordered the first constitution of the empire to be published, relating to every thing that was to be mutually observed between the ecclesiastics and secular princes and states, as well as the administration of justice, and the policy and subordination established among the vassals and subjects of the empire<sup>f</sup>.

- f THE emperor's chancellor, whom the pope had created archbishop of Mentz, returned to Germany, loaded with gold and silver, and accompanied by a legate called John Buccamali, bishop of Tusculum, who held a council at Wirtzburg, where he published regulations to prevent disorders among the clergy, and demanded, in the pope's name, one-fourth of the income of all benefices for the term of four years. This exaction was strenuously opposed by the archbishops of Cologne and Triers, and particularly by Conrad, bishop of Toul, who expatiated upon the mischiefs which had been entailed upon the empire by such legations, and

the succession to the crown of Hungary.

Rodolphus
marches a-

THE council being finished, the emperor sent his son Rodolphus to reduce a number of freebooters, who had made an irruption into Switzerland; while his eldest son Albert besieged the town of Weill, which was supported in its rebellion by William, abbot of St. Gall. Both expeditions were attended with success; the banditti were destroyed; the town surrendered; and the abbot was obliged to submit to the emperor's decision touching the privileges of his abbey. Then the young Rodolphus turned his arms against the town of Lauterburg, which had revolted, in consequence of his endeavours to divest it of its antient privileges, and his father coming to his assistance, the place was besieged, and obliged to surrender at discretion. But he did not meet with the same success in his war with Anselmo, lord of Rapoltstein, against whom he sent a body of troops, because he refused to divide his lands with his brother and nephew, in obedience to the emperor's decree. The imperial troops were defeated, and Anselmo took several towns and fortresses, proceeding with such rapidity in his conquests, that the whole province of Alsace was filled with the terror of his name, until the emperor in person arrived with a strong body of forces, and put an end to the war by an accommodation <sup>1</sup>. Rodolphus having, in a great measure, quelled the troubles of the empire, enjoyed the satisfaction of seeing his daughter Judith married to Winceslaus, king of Bohemia, who, before the ceremony was performed, renounced, by a solemn oath, all his pretensions to the duchies of Austria and Stiria, as well as to the other fiefs belonging to the successors of Frederic, surnamed the Warlike; and the emperor, to whom this advantageous match could not but be very agreeable, confirmed, by patent, the honorary post of cup-bearer attached to the crown of Bohemia.

THIS affair being consummated, Rodolphus convoked a general assembly of the princes at Erfort, where the famous quarrel, touching the succession of the landgraviate of Thuringia, was terminated, to the satisfaction of all parties, by a division, in consequence of which Thuringia, properly so called, remained in the hands of Albert, son of Henry the Illustrious, marquis of Misnia, and the western part, distinguished by the name of Hesse, devolved to the posterity of Henry, duke of Brabant <sup>2</sup>. But the chief deliberations of this diet turned upon a dispute of much greater consequence. Ladislaus III. king of Hungary, having been killed by the Cumani, his kingdom was claimed by three competitors; namely, Charles Martel of Sicily, the nephew of Ladislaus by his sister Mary; Andrew the Venetian, grandson of king Andrew; and Rodolphus, who pretended that Hungary was a fief of the empire. Nicholas IV. who had succeeded Honorius in the papacy, sent a legate into Germany, to declare to the emperor, that Hungary belonged to the church of Rome, and to forbid all persons whatever to interfere in any shape with the pretensions of the holy see. Notwithstanding this prohibition, Andrew the Venetian took possession of the throne; and when the pope afterwards, by the hands of a legate, bestowed the crown upon Charles Martel, the emperor protested against the coronation, and bestowed the investiture of Hungary upon his own son Albert; but next year he renounced his pretensions in favour of Charles, who married his daughter Clementia, according to the treaty formerly concluded between him and the king of Sicily <sup>3</sup>.

AFTER the diet at Erfort, Rodolphus took the field against Otho, count palatine of Burgundy, the declared enemy of the empire, who had taken the oath of allegiance to Philip the Fair, king of France, and had formerly been put to the ban of the empire for that instance of apostacy. Rodolphus had defeated him in a pitched battle, and compelled him to sue for peace, which was granted: but now, being joined by the count de Montbelliard, he renewed the war; and the emperor marching against him at the head of twenty thousand men, made himself master of Montbelliard, ravaged the country, and undertook the siege of Besançon (E). But he was so hampered for want of provisions, that he listened to terms of accommodation, and a treaty was concluded at Basil, on condition that Otho, and his allies, should pay the

(E) While he was employed in the siege of Besançon, ambassadors arrived in his camp from the king of France, giving him to understand, that, if he would not raise the siege, he would march to the assistance of the duke of Burgundy. In answer to this message, Rodolphus said, “ Let him come; we shall wait and receive him with open arms: he shall feel and own that we have not come hither to dance and make merry; and know by experience how easy it is to give law with the sword” (16).

a expence of the war, and do homage to the emperor, who, on his part, should discharge them of all sentences and decrees of proscription.

ALL the malecontent princes of the empire being reduced to order, Rodolphus resolved to extirpate some formidable bodies of banditti, who infested the provinces of Franconia, Suabia, and Thuringia; and with this view sent detachments of troops to dislodge them from their recesses and retreats: these in a little time freed the country from the oppression under which it had groaned for many years, and took nine and twenty of their chiefs, whom the emperor ordered to be tried and beheaded, although they belonged to the best families of the province. Nay, such was the zeal of this prince for the establishment of tranquility in the empire, that understanding justice was very partially administered in the remote provinces, he appointed extraordinary judges to make a minute inquiry into all malversations of that kind, and ordered them to punish the delinquents upon the spot, according to their demerits, of what rank and quality soever they might be. By this expedient he not only laid a restraint upon those who thought they could shelter themselves from justice, under the shadow of their wealth and interest, but at the same time filled his own coffers with the fines which were exacted from the guilty <sup>b</sup>.

RODOLPHUS, after having reigned eighteen years, finding himself exhausted and indisposed, convoked a diet at Frankfort, where he demanded, that the imperial crown should be secured to his son Albert duke of Austria, by creating him king of the Romans; but the princes excused themselves from complying with this request, on pretence that the empire could not maintain two kings at once. Chagrined at this refusal (F), he repaired to Strasbourg, from whence he set out for Spire, saying he would go and pay a visit to the deceased emperors. This he actually performed, sooner, perhaps, than he expected; for, being taken ill at Germerheim, he died in the 73d year of his age; and, his body being carried to Spire, was interred in the great church, together with the rest of the emperors <sup>c</sup>.

The princes refuse to elect his son king of the Romans.

By his first wife Ann, daughter of Albert count Hochberg, whose dowry was the greatest part of the landgraviate of Alsace, he had seven sons and as many daughters; but of the first none remained, except Albert duke of Austria, and Rodolphus duke of Suabia, and landgrave of Alsace. The daughters were Jutta, or Judith, wife of Winceslaus king of Bohemia; Clementia, married to Charles king of Hungary; Mathilda, wife of Lewis count palatine; Agnes, espoused by Albert duke of Saxony; Hedrige, married to Otho marquis of Brandenburg; Catherine, wife of Otho duke of Bavaria, and Eupheme, who was a nun <sup>d</sup>.

THUS died Rodolphus, on his birth-day, in the seventy-third year of his age, and the eighteenth of his reign, a prince renowned for his valour, sagacity, and love of justice, who, by his sole courage and conduct, extricated the empire from misery and confusion, and restored it to the fruition of peace, policy, and riches. He was extremely frank and obliging, plain in his dress, and very much addicted to pleasantries (G). His stature was tall and thin, his head small, his complexion pale, his nose remarkably long, and hair scanty. and character.

(F) This chagrin co-operated with his grief for the death of his son Rodolphus, which happened a few months before this transaction. That prince left his wife big with child of a son, who was called John, and afterwards murdered his uncle Albert king of the Romans, to whom he owed his education (9).

(G) Two deputies of a certain town, having one day waited upon him to remonstrate upon the necessities of his fellow-citizens, he listened with great attention to what they said, and observing that the beard of one was black and his head grey, while the other's head was black and his beard grey, he asked the reason of these uncommon phenomena: when the first replied, "My beard is grown grey sooner than the hair of my head, because my chief concern hath always centered in my mouth." And the reason which the other gave, was, that as the hair of his head was older than that of his beard, so it was, of consequence, sooner grey (1).

A merchant having once complained to him of an inn-keeper of Nuremberg, who refused to refund a sum of money which he had deposited in his hands, the emperor, tho' the defendant could not be convicted, took an opportunity some days after, when he came with some other deputies of the city upon business, to praise his hat, and propose an exchange; accordingly, he no sooner received the inn-keeper's hat, than he sent it as a token to his wife, with a message in her husband's name, desiring she would deliver the bearer the money which the merchant had left in his hands. The stratagem succeeded: the wife sent the purse, which was restored to the right owner, and the inn-keeper condemned to pay a large fine (2).

Such was his affability and obliging demeanour, that while he was no more than count of Hapsburg, and engaged in a war against the bishop and city of Basil, supported by the abbot of St. Gall, finding himself unequal to such powerful antagonists, he went one day to dine with the abbot, without giving the least previous notice of his intention, and found means over the glass, not only to detach the abbot from the adverse party, but also to engage him on his side (3).

With regard to his moderation in dress, it was so remarkable, that when Ottocarus king of Bohemia came to do him homage, in the most magnificent apparel, Rodolphus was clad in a coarse grey coat (4).

The noblemen of Austria and Stiria revolt against duke
Albert.

DURING the interregnum, which lasted nine months, the empire was exposed to several domestic disturbances. Conrad, bishop of Strasburg, by force of arms, reduced the town of Colmar, which set up for independency, and compelled the inhabitants to take the oath of allegiance to his brother Frederic de Lichtemberg. The noblemen of Austria and Stiria were extremely disgusted at the administration of duke Albert, who, instead of indulging them like his father, began to govern with great rigour, and lay them under such restrictions and impositions, that they exclaimed loudly against his conduct, and even taxed him with the design of enslaving his subjects. Nor was their resentment limited to complaints only: they entered into an association, which was supported by the kings of Hungary and Bohemia, Otho duke of Bavaria, and Conrad of Salzburg, on condition of their being rewarded with part of the spoil; and, having revolted openly, took the field with these their allies. Albert, finding it would be a difficult task to reduce them by force of arms, published a manifesto, in which he promised to re-establish the government upon the old footing, and put the noblemen and people in possession of their antient privileges, provided they would return to their duty. This declaration had great weight with the malecontents; and by the mediation of Lewis count palatine of the Rhine, first a truce was agreed to, and then peace was concluded, to the satisfaction of all parties<sup>c</sup>.

the succession of the duchy of Limbourg.

BUT this difference did not produce such serious consequences as those that attended the dispute between the pretenders to the succession of Valeran III. duke of Limbourg, who had died in the reign of Rodolphus, leaving one only daughter, called Hermenegarde, married to Renaud count Guelderland. This lady likewise dying without issue, Adolphus, count de Bergue, who was her cousin, disputed the succession with her husband, who insisted upon keeping possession of Limbourg during his natural life. Adolphus, finding himself too weak to cope with such a powerful antagonist, ceded his right, in consideration of a large sum of money, to John duke of Brabant, who resolved to confirm his purchase by force of arms, and put himself at the head of an army for that purpose. Renaud was no sooner apprised of his design, than he engaged in an alliance with the archbishop of Cologne, the counts of Luxemburg, Cleves, Juliers, Nassau, and several other noblemen, who joined their forces near Aix-la-Chapelle, and both sides commenced hostilities without farther hesitation. When the armies were in sight of each other, and just ready to engage, some noblemen, who were neutral, proposed that the dispute should be decided by the arbitration of the counts of Flanders and Hainault. The proposal was embraced by the competitors, and the arbiters, having considered the case with due deliberation, pronounced, that the count of Guelderland should enjoy the duchy for his life, and that the reversion should be vested in the duke of Brabant.<sup>d</sup>

THIS sentence, equitable as it was, disgusted both parties; and before any other steps could be taken for an accommodation, the count of Guelderland made over his right to Henry of Luxemburg, who was descended from the dukes of Limbourg, and actually the next male heir of that duchy. Then both parties, with their allies, had recourse to arms. Several skirmishes were fought with various success, the friends of the count of Guelderland made an unsuccessful attempt upon Maastricht, and ravaged the territory of Dalem; the duke of Brabant, passing the Meuse, laid waste part of the duchy of Limbourg; and at length the two armies meeting at Worringen, a fortress between Cologne and Nuits, belonging to the archbishop of Cologne, a very obstinate battle ensued, in which Henry of Luxemburg and his brother lost their lives, after having performed miracles of courage. The archbishop of Cologne, the counts of Nassau, Juliers, and Guelderland, were taken prisoners, and the duke of Brabant obtained a complete victory, in consequence of which he got quiet possession of Limbourg. This acquisition was confirmed to him by Henry IV. of Luxemburg, afterwards emperor, who, soon after his father's untimely death, married the duke of Brabant's eldest daughter; and after this marriage the dukes of Brabant and the counts of Luxemburg always lived in the greatest harmony and friendship<sup>e</sup>.

A D O L P H U S.

SEVEN or eight months after the decease of Rodolphus, the princes of the empire assembled at Frankfort, in order to elect a new chief; and as it was grown into a custom, to give the preference to the family of the last emperor, their votes were solicited for Albert duke of Austria; but Gerhard, elector of Mentz, by artful insinuations to each of them in private, obtained their promises separately to adhere to his nomination, and were not a little astonished to hear him propose his own kinsman, Adolphus of Nassau<sup>g</sup>; whom, however, they could not in honour reject (H). He was accordingly proclaimed emperor, and tho' he

(H) Adolphus was the son of Walrab count de Nassau, and the poorest prince that ever ascended the imperial throne;

for all his possessions were limited to the lordships of Istein, Wiesbaden, and Weilbourg, in the county of Nassau;

a possessed some of those qualities which constitute a great prince, he was not rich enough to support the imperial dignity.

THE beginnings of his reign were fortunate, inasmuch as he governed the empire by the advice of Boemond, archbishop of Triers, a prelate of great virtue and capacity, who persuaded the emperor to leave all those in possession of their employments, who had served his predecessor with fidelity, although some of them had connexions with his rival, Albert duke of Austria: nor had he the least cause to repent of the confidence he reposed in their honour.

As his natural genius inclined him to war, and he was desirous of employing those princes who were averse to his elevation, he convoked a diet at Spire, and proposed that war should be declared against Otho count palatine of Burgundy, who wanted to dismember Franche

b Compte from the empire, and become a vassal of the French king.

THIS proposal being embraced, the archbishops of Cologne and Mentz, and the bishops of Spire and Basil, furnished him with troops, which at first took the route of Besançon; but Albert of Austria refusing to contribute his proportion for this war, and being suspected of carrying on a correspondence with the king of France, Adolphus marched towards Suabia, with intention to seize the fiefs which belonged to Albert in that province. The duke, however, came to the assistance of his vassals, with a body of forces, and posted himself in such a manner, that the emperor could not act against him, while the boisterous weather that supervened effectually hindered him from executing his scheme against Franche Compte; besides, he did not at that time chuse to give umbrage to the king of France, so as to produce

c an open rupture with that monarch.

THE miscarriage of this enterprize greatly diminished the reputation of Adolphus: moreover, being a better soldier than a politician, he was too much governed by the advice of his officers, and paid too little regard to that of the princes of the empire, many of whom, being disobliged at this neglect, attached themselves in the sequel to the duke of Austria's party.

THE emperor no sooner quitted Alsace, than the bishop of Strasburg put a garrison in the fortrefs of Ortemberg, in order to preserve it for the duke of Austria; and an insurrection was raised in Colmar, by means of Anselmo lord of Rapoltstein, who took possession of the town with a body of troops, and renounced all allegiance to Adolphus. Information of d this revolt being brought to the emperor, he marched into Alsace, ravaged the lands of Rapoltstein, and besieged the city of Colmar, which being reduced to great extremity, was obliged to surrender at discretion. Anselmo was imprisoned for life, and all his estate confiscated; and the provost of Colmar, who was his accomplice, punished in the most ignominious manner. After the reduction of this town, he took the route of Lower Alsace, in order to besiege the castle of Erstein, the lord of which had joined the bishop of Strasburg in his rebellion. The place was accordingly taken, as well as the castle of the count de Wart, remarkable for its strength and situation; and the inhabitants of Strasburg, fearing that his next visit would be to them, prevailed upon the bishop to go and ask pardon of the emperor, which he obtained for himself and his associates.

ALTHOUGH Albert of Austria had taken the oath of fidelity to the emperor, it was very well known that he entertained an animosity against him; and Adolphus fearing his power and resentment, took all the opportunities in his power to engage the friendship and attachment of the duke. With this view he proposed a match between his own son Gerlac and Albert's daughter; when the haughty Austrian replied, that he would consent to the marriage, provided it could raise his daughter to the rank of a princess: but, that being impossible, he said Adolphus might send his daughter to one of Albert's sons, whom he intended to make a prince (H).

sau; but he was reckoned the greatest warrior of his time. He had defeated John I. duke of Brabant, in five pitched battles; but in the sixth, which was that of Worringen, he was taken prisoner, and carried before the duke, who asked him, with a contemptuous sneer, who he was? "I am (said he) the count de Nassau, a poor lord of the empire; but who art thou?" "John (replied the duke) against whom thou hast waged a most obstinate war, and slain five of his best generals in as many severe battles." "I wonder (cried Adolphus) how thou thyself hast escaped my sword, which was whetted for thee and thee only." The duke was so struck with his intrepidity, that he set him at liberty, overwhelmed him with presents, and solicited his friendship. Nor was Adolphus ungrateful in the sequel; for when he was raised to the imperial throne, he not only gave him the investiture of the fiefs, which the dukes of Brabant held of the empire, but also appointed him governor and supreme judge, in his name, thro' all the countries from the Moselle to the sea, and from the Rhine to Westphalia (1).

(H) In the German marriages, a maiden of the first nobility acquired the title of princess, by marrying a prince; but a maiden of the lower noblesse has not the same right: she does not even become a countess or baroness, by marrying a count or a baron. In case of such an alliance, the husband is obliged to have recourse to the emperor, and solicit for his wife the honours due to his rank. If the emperor consents, the diet of the empire must ratify his consent: then the prince's wife enjoys the honours due to her husband, and her children are declared capable of succeeding to the dignities and fiefs of their father. This was the case, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, with John Adolphus duke of Saxe-Weissenfels, Albert duke of Saxe-Cobourg, George William duke of Zell, and a prince of Anhalt.

A WAR breaking out about this time between France and England, on account of some a provinces claimed by each, Edward king of England sent ambassadors to Adolphus, to propose an alliance, and to promise, that, if he would reinforce him with troops against France, Edward would go in person to Germany, and assist him in his turn, with forces and money, to recover the kingdom of Arles, which France had wrested from the empire. His proposal was joyfully embraced, because it was accompanied with a good round sum of money, which enabled him to purchase the landgraviate of Thuringia and Misnia, from Albert surnamed the Depraved, who had disinherited his own sons Frederic, Henry, and Dißmann, out of hatred to their mother Margaret, daughter to Frederic II. <sup>z</sup>

His proposal treated with contempt by Philip, who engages the duke of Austria in his interest.

MEAN while he sent ambassadors to demand from Philip king of France the kingdom of Arles, and some other countries which he pretended were fiefs of the empire, together with b the crown of thorns that Christ wore; and to denounce war in case of a refusal. But Philip, despising his impotent arrogance, dismissed his ambassadors without an answer (I); and this contempt, in all probability, deterred him from prosecuting the enterprize which he had projected, for all his exploits were limited to a few skirmishes between Theobald count of Pfirt, governor of Alsace, and the troops of the king of France <sup>h</sup>. Philip, however, being informed of the league between the emperor and the king of England, made use of the same expedient, by engaging in his cause Albert duke of Austria, who upon this occasion observed, that there was at least as little dishonour in taking subsidies from the king of France, as in being pensioner to the king of England. The English money which Adolphus received, instead of advancing, contributed to the ruin of his affairs; for the purchase he c had made, entailed upon him the enmity of Dißmann, Henry, and his brother Frederic, who were gallant princes (K), and defeated his troops upon more occasions than one; and the count of Pfirt had, by his insolent behaviour to Conrad, bishop of Strasburg, wholly detached that prelate from his interest <sup>i</sup>. Besides, his best friends, and among the rest the elector of Mentz, who had raised him to the empire, were incensed, because he neither gave them a share of the English subsidy, nor had recourse to their advice in his most important affairs. These concurring motives induced the princes of the empire to engage in an association for the support of Frederic, Dißmann, and Henry, as well as for the preservation of their own liberty.

A. D. 1295. Adolphus disoblige his best friends; wages war with Frederic, Dißmann, and Henry, princes of Thuringia;

FREDERIC having taken possession of the margraviate of Misnia, which he inherited d from his uncle, levied a body of troops, and entered Thuringia, in order to expel the emperor, who had already made himself master of several towns in that province; and Adolphus, by way of reprisal, made an irruption into Misnia, took the city of Dresden, together with twelve strong castles, and pillaged every place where he met with resistance. This cruel war continued for the space of three years; but justice at last prevailed in favour of Frederic and his brothers: for Adolphus, notwithstanding all his efforts, could never obtain possession of Thuringia.

A. D. 1297. renders himself odious to the nobles;

INSTEAD of endeavouring, by reforming his conduct, to efface the bad impressions he had made upon the minds of his people, by engaging in such an unequitable enterprize, his behaviour became more and more haughty and tyrannical. He bestowed employments e upon the unworthy and debauched ministers of his own pleasures; and ruled with a most

In these marriages, which are stiled matches of the left hand, it is usually stipulated, that the wife shall continue in her original condition and rank, and that the children she shall bear shall have no other rank or prerogative than that of their mother. Rodolphus duke of Lunenburg caused his wife to be called madame Rodolphina, because it was a left-handed match. Henry landgrave of Thuringia, Ernest and Edward the Fortunate, marquises of Baden, and Frederic Lewis elector palatine, did not raise their wives to the dignity of princess, or demand the consent of the emperor or diet to declare the children of these marriages capable of succeeding them in their honours and estates. They never make such a request, except when they have no children by a former match with a lady of the first quality, or have not made an alliance of confraternity with some princes of the empire (1).

(I) Philip is said to have answered him in these two words, Trap Allemund, i. e. too much of a German (2).

(K) Albert the Depraved had married Margaret daughter of the emperor Frederic II. by whom he had three sons, namely, Frederic, Dißmann, and Henry; but conceiving a disgust for this prince, he attached himself to Cunegunda of Iffenbourg, and laid a scheme for poisoning Margaret, who, being apprised of his design, made her escape from the castle of Eisenach; and, in bidding adieu to her children, severely bit the cheek of Frederic the eldest, in order to imprint upon his mind the memory of his mother's wrongs: hence he derived the appellation of Frederic with the bitten Cheek. Margaret having retired to a monastery at Frankfort, her husband lived openly with his concubine, by whom he had a son called Lewis, to whom he gave the additional name of Apicius. He was distractedly fond of this child, and resolved to declare him his heir: but afterwards foreseeing the opposition he must have encountered from the noblemen of the empire, as well as from his own vassals, he put up his fiefs to sale, that he might give the purchase money to his bastard: but there was no bidder except the emperor, who bought them for twelve thousand marks of silver (3).

- a arbitrary sway, in diametrical opposition to the remonstrances of the nobles, whom he treated with insolence and disdain.

THESE imprudent proceedings alienated the hearts of almost all the princes and states of the empire: the spirit of discontent diffused itself through every province of Germany, and a great number of noblemen, ecclesiastic as well as secular, not only declared openly against his mal-administration, but even formed a conspiracy, in order to remove him from the throne: who form a conspiracy against him;

- b not that he was utterly destitute of adherents; Boemond, archbishop of Triers, Rodolphus, count palatine of the Rhine, and Otho, duke of Bavaria, still supported his interest, and furnished him with troops; at the head of which he took the field, and encamped at Voigtland, to observe the motions of those princes who had declared themselves his enemies; namely, Gerhard, archbishop of Mentz, Winceslaus, king of Bohemia, Albert, duke of Austria, the two margraves of Brandenburg, and the duke of Saxony.

- c THE confederates assembled at Prague for the coronation of Winceslaus, and next day deliberated upon the heads of accusation, which might serve as a foundation for deposing Adolphus, digesting them into the following articles: that he had shamefully renounced the rights of the empire in Italy and Lombardy: that, instead of establishing union and peace in the provinces of Germany, he had fomented a division and civil war, to the desolation of the country: that he had indiscretely squandered away the revenues of the crown, and bestowed employments and offices of state upon unexperienced and ill-intentioned persons, to the great detriment of the Germanic body: that, by his sole authority, he had imposed exorbitant taxes upon the subjects of the empire: that he had affirmed his will was law, and, in consequence of that maxim, ruined a great number of vassals: that he had received a considerable sum of money from Edward, king of England, on promise, by oath, to send succours to that prince, which promise he had broke, tho' he kept the money: that he had slighted the advice of the princes, nobility, and clergy, and never consulted them in affairs of importance, but acted wholly from his own authority: that he had connived at robberies on the highway: that he had allowed his officers to oppress the poor, and his soldiers to commit all manner of outrages: and, lastly, that he had ravished a great number of wives, widows, maidens, and nuns, and put several women to death, after having satisfied his brutal appetite. digest articles of accusation against Adolphus;

- d THE emperor's guilt in all these particulars being notorious, the princes appointed a meeting of the diet at Mentz, in order to depose Adolphus, and elect Albert, who now levied an army to support his pretensions, and oppose whatever measures Adolphus might take to traverse his election. At the same time he sent his uncle, the count de Hohemberg and Hagerloch, to solicit the pope's consent to his deposition; which, however, he could not obtain, with all the promises and presents he lavished away among the members of the consistory. On the contrary, his holiness wrote an account of his refusal to Adolphus, and even offered to consecrate him emperor, if he could come to Rome. Mean while the count de Hohemberg pretended that he had succeeded in his commission, and, at his return to Germany, presented the three electors, who were Albert's friends, with forged letters, containing the pope's approbation of their design.

e ADOLPHUS, encouraged by the declaration of Boniface in his favour, advanced towards Austria, in order to wrest that province from Albert, who marched to the banks of the Rhine to support his friends, who intended to elevate him to the imperial throne, at the meeting of the diet in Mentz. They accordingly assembled for that purpose; the deposition of Adolphus, and election of the duke of Austria, were actually performed; and Albert being encamped with his army without the city, the electors waited upon him, in order to notify what they had done, to wish him all sort of prosperity, and to promise that they would assist, protect, and maintain him against all his enemies<sup>k</sup> (L). who is deposed. A. D. 1298. Albert is elected emperor;

(L) Before they proceeded to the election, they assembled, and harangued the people upon the subject of their present design. Then they repaired to church, attended by a vast multitude, and turning towards the altar, spoke to this effect: "Six years ago, the empire being vacant, we canonically elected Adolphus, count de Nassau, king of the Romans, knowing at that time no person more worthy of that dignity. At first he conducted himself wisely, following the advice of the most prudent electors and princes of his court; but, in a little time, he began to despise their advice, and listen to the counsels of young persons, without either sense or experience: then he found himself destitute of means and friends to assist him sincerely in bearing the burden of government. The electors, perceiving his indigence, and swayed by twenty other motives, have demanded the pope's consent to depose him, and chuse another emperor. We are told, that our envoys have obtained the consent of his holiness; tho' those of Adolphus affirm the contrary. But we, having no regard to any authority but that which is vested in ourselves, and finding Adolphus incapable of governing the empire, do depose him from the imperial dignity, and elect Albert, duke of Austria, king of the Romans (4)." (4) Chron. Colm. part. ii. p. 5.

ADOLPHUS,

ADOLPHUS, being apprised of this election, raised the siege of Ruffach, in Alsace, and marched towards Spire, where he encamped: he was reinforced by the count palatine Rodolphus, Otho, duke of Bavaria, and the cities of Spire and Worms, which, with some others, never deserted his cause. Albert at the same time advanced towards him, in order to dispute the imperial crown by force of arms. They accordingly engaged between Gelnheim and the cloister of Rosendal, and the battle was maintained with great fury on both sides. In the heat of the fight, the emperor, singling out the duke, attacked him hand to hand, saying, "Here you shall abandon to me the empire and your life." To this address the duke replied, without hesitation, "Both are in the hands of God;" and with these words struck him in the face with such violence, that he fell from his horse, and was immediately slain by some of Albert's party<sup>1</sup>. Thus fell Adolphus, a valiant, tho' unfortunate prince, whose death is said to have been bitterly lamented by Gerhard, archbishop of Mentz, who had been the principal cause of his deposition. He was no sooner killed than Albert put a stop to the carnage, and granted quarter to all the enemy; but the count palatine and duke of Bavaria saved themselves by flight. As for the emperor's body, it was interred in the cloister of Frauenfelt, because Albert would not allow it to be deposited in Spire, with the rest of the emperors, tho' it was afterwards carried thither by the emperor Henry of Luxembourg (M).

The Jews are massacred in divers parts of Germany.

In the reign of Adolphus, as well as in that of his predecessors, the Jews were persecuted in the empire with great cruelty, on the supposition that they had slain several Christian children, and committed other crimes which attracted the hatred of the public. During the troubles produced by the competition between Adolphus and Albert, a certain peasant, called Raind-Fleisch, preached in the Upper Palatinate, that God had sent him to destroy the Jews. From thence he made a progress through Franconia, and the neighbouring provinces, haranguing on the same subject, and affirming that the Jews had stole a consecrated host. The common people, without giving themselves the trouble to investigate the truth, were incensed at this pretended sacrilege; and the inhabitants of Nuremberg, Rottembourg, Amberg, and other towns of Franconia and Bavaria, seizing all the unhappy Israelites that fell in their way, committed them to the flames, and drove the rest to such despair, that numbers burnt themselves and their families, rather than fall into the hands of the merciless Christians. These violences were exercised for some time with impunity, until Albert, duke of Austria, took the Jewish nation into his protection, re-established them in all their privileges, and imposed a very heavy fine upon the town of Nuremberg, where the massacre had begun; yet all his care could not extinguish that aversion which the people of that city entertained for the Jews. It broke out on divers occasions, and in the sequel proved fatal to the famous Mordecai of Austria, who composed a commentary on some books of the Talmud, and was author of several other curious performances. He quitted Austria, to go and teach the oriental languages at Triers; and afterwards, in passing through Nuremberg, was apprehended and hanged by the people. Nor were the miserable Jews treated with more lenity in Friesland and Holland, which at that time were provinces of the empire. Florentius V. count of Holland and West Friesland, who had rendered himself odious to the nobility by the severity of his government, thought to engage the people on his side, by favouring their hatred to the Jews, whom he expelled from his dominions: but this step served only to encrease the discontent of the nobles, who had derived great advantages from the Jewish nation; they therefore engaged in a conspiracy, and slew him at the chace. As his son John at that time resided in England, and did not think it safe to come and take possession of his father's estate, the nobles solicited the protection of Eric VIII. king of Denmark, who came with an army to support them, reduced all the towns, subdued the whole country, saddled them with a severe tribute, and left a Danish nobleman to rule them in his absence. The governor treated them so harshly, that they began to repent heartily of having intailed such slavery upon themselves; and, conspiring against this minister of arbitrary power, compelled him to fly for shelter into a fortress, where he was taken, and murdered on the spot. Then they recalled from England John, the son of Florentius, whom they acknowledged as count of Holland and Friesland. He received the investiture of these fiefs from Rodolphus, and in a few years died at Haarlem without issue; so that the antient house of the counts of Holland was extinct, after it had subsisted four hundred and thirty-seven years<sup>m</sup>.

(M) Adolphus was the son of Walrab, count of Nassau, and grandson of Henry the Rich, who is looked upon as the founder of that family. He succeeded to the county of Nassau in 1289, and that same year married Imagine, daughter of Gerlac, count of Limbourg, by whom he had Henry, who died young; Rupert, who married Gutta, daughter of Winceslaus, and was made prisoner by the archbishop of Mentz, in a battle fought near Worms; Gerlac, who succeeded his father in the county of Nassau; Walram, and Adolphus. His daughters were Adebeide, a nun in the monastery of St. Claire in Mentz; Imagine, who was never married; and Mechtilda, wife of Rodolphus, elector palatine (5).

ALBERT I.

- a ALBERT I. called the Triumphant, on account of his generosity and valour, and the many victories he obtained over his enemies, was likewise surnamed the One-Eyed, because he had lost one eye by the operation of poison, which was given to him in his own palace at Vienna, about three years before he was elected emperor. Altho' he had been elected king of the Romans before the victory which he obtained over the emperor Adolphus, being apprehensive that his election would be contested, because the elector of Triers and the Palatine had not joined in it, he convoked the whole number at Frankfort, and desired them to proceed to a new election<sup>a</sup>. After which, they attended him to Aix-la-Chapelle, where he was crowned with great solemnity; and such was the concourse of people upon that occasion, that his brother-in-law the duke of Saxony, and several other persons, were squeezed to death in the crowd.

Albert is re-elected, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle;

- b ALBERT, being thus established on the throne, sent to Rome, to desire that pope Boniface VIII. would confirm his election. That pontiff, chagrined at the elevation of this prince upon the ruins of his friend Adolphus, refused for some time to comply with his desire, on pretence that the electors had no authority to set him on the throne without the concurrence of the pope<sup>o</sup>; till at length the desire he had to be revenged on Philip, king of France, being stronger than his resentment against Albert, he promised to confirm the election of this last, and even made a tender to him of the crown of France. Albert thanked him for his offer; but represented, that he could not embark in a quarrel of such importance, unless his holiness would assist him in carrying on the war against Philip. The pope refusing to contribute, the project was not only laid aside, but Albert, in order to anticipate the ill-offices of Boniface, made advances to the king of France, with whom he had an interview at Vaucouleurs, where they renewed the antient leagues between the empire and France, and treated about the marriage of Rodolphus, Albert's son, with Blanche, Philip's daughter, which was not consummated till next year<sup>p</sup>.

sollicits the pope's confirmation;

has an interview with Philip, king of France.

- c At this interview, a treaty of alliance was concluded between the emperor and the king of France, by which Albert obliged himself to bestow upon his eldest son Rodolphus, and his heirs for ever, as hereditary fiefs, the duchies of Austria and Stiria, with the lordships of Carniola, La Marche, and Port-Naon: he moreover assigned, as the dowry of the princess Blanche, the county of Alsace, and the territory of Fribourg, to be possessed for ever by her husband and his heirs; so that this seems to be the æra at which the duchy of Austria and the landgraviate of Alsace became the hereditary countries of the house of Hapsburg. Be that as it will, when the emperor convoked a diet at Toul, to authenticate this contract, the three ecclesiastic electors protested against the articles of alliance; and when Albert sent ambassadors to the pope, with an intimation of the nuptials, and a demand that his holiness would confirm the choice which the electors had made in elevating him to the imperial throne, Boniface publicly declared, that the election of Albert was null and void, and that he ought to be treated as a murderer; nay, after having refused audience to the German ambassadors, he appeared in public, with a sword by his side, habited like the general of an army, and affirmed, that there was no other Cæsar, or king of the Romans, but the sovereign pontiff of Christendom<sup>q</sup>.

The ecclesiastic electors protest against the treaty of Vaucouleurs.

- d In the mean time the emperor gave orders for assembling a diet at Nuremberg on St. Martin's-day, at which were present, besides the ecclesiastic electors, Winceslaus, king of Bohemia, the elector palatine, and several other princes of the empire. There his wife Elizabeth, daughter of the count of Tyrol, was crowned, and his son Rodolphus invested with the duchy of Austria, for himself and his successors. After the diet, the empress set out for Vienna, with duke Rodolphus and the princess, who died within the year, without issue by the duke of Austria.

- e About this period Albert was engaged in a war with John d'Avenes, who, as the next heir to John, count of Holland, lately dead, had taken possession of his dominions, which Albert claimed as fiefs reversible to the empire. After having published a manifesto to this purpose, he levied an army to support his pretensions, and advanced as far as Nimeguen against John d'Avenes, who had assembled a strong body of forces, with which he passed the river Waal, without being perceived; and having surprised a detachment of imperialists, whom he cut in pieces, spread such an alarm among the rest of the emperor's troops, that he was fain to decamp with great precipitation, and, by hasty marches, retreat to Cologne, where he intrenched himself under the ramparts of the city. There being in danger of perishing by famine, blocked up as he was by an enemy, he employed the archbishop of Cologne to negotiate a peace; which was concluded, on condition that John d'Avenes should enjoy the counties of Holland, West Friesland, and Zealand, in consideration of doing homage to the emperor, from whom he accordingly received the investiture of these dominions<sup>1</sup>. a

electors. THIS war being happily terminated, the emperor caused his statutes, touching the charge and function of the electors of the empire, to be published and executed. As the ecclesiastical electors, and some other of the princes, had converted to their own use the toll and other revenues formerly appropriated to the maintenance of the emperor, he demanded that these imposts should be put upon their antient footing; and was answered, that as they inherited these revenues from their predecessors, without being questioned by the emperors or kings of the Romans, they hoped he would maintain them in these rights, which they could not, nor would not resign. The emperor sent the bishop of Basil to complain of this answer b to the pope; and, in order to obtain a favourable audience, solemnly promised to engage in a crusade, as he had already proposed such an expedition to the princes of Christendom, provided his holiness would enable him to defray the expence of the enterprize, by obliging the three ecclesiastical electors to part with the tolls and duties, which they had usurped during the anarchy of the empire; but Boniface lending a deaf ear to his complaint, he resolved to do himself right by force of arms. In the mean time, by the advice of his friends, he declared his discontent to the ecclesiastical electors, whom he summoned to appear before the states and princes of the empire at Mentz, and answer to the charge that should be laid against them.

A. D. 1301. THE electors, instead of obeying this citation, wrote a letter to the pope, in which they c represented Albert as an insolent and ambitious tyrant, a professed enemy to the clergy, and gave his holiness to understand, that measures were taking in Germany for electing another king of the Romans. These were agreeable tidings to Boniface, who persecuted Albert with the most rancorous hatred. He had already refused the mediation of Philip the Fair, who attempted to reconcile him to the emperor; he had even allured Philip's brother, Charles de Valois, into Italy, with a promise of raising him to the imperial throne; and now he sent an answer to the letter of the ecclesiastical electors, in which, after having stigmatized the emperor as a rebel; "We command you (added he) to signify by public proclamation d " to Albert, the pretended king of the Romans, that he must, in six months, appear before " us, by his envoys, sufficiently authorized and instructed, to justify himself, if he can, " of the imputation of treason against king Adolphus, as well as to avert the sentence of " excommunication, which he has incurred by persecuting the holy see, and other churches, " and to undergo such penance as we shall prescribe. We strictly forbid the electors, vassals, and subjects of the empire, to acknowledge him as king of the Romans; we release " them from their oath of allegiance, and will proceed against him and his adherents, spiritually and temporally, as we shall judge most expedient."

In consequence of this order, the three archbishops retired to the dominions of the elector palatine, as if he had been a competent judge, and preferred a formal complaint against the emperor, for having cruelly slain his predecessor. The count, who hated Albert, ordered a formal information to be taken; and upon the frivolous accusations of the ecclesiastical e electors, and a few other persons of distinction, he pronounced him convicted of the crimes laid to his charge, and consequently unworthy of the empire (N).

A. D. 1302. THIS step, however, they were not allowed to take with impunity; for Albert, incensed at their presumption, no longer hesitated in declaring war against them; and although the marquis of Brandenburg, the duke of Saxony, and the king of Bohemia, remained neuter in this contest, the majority of the princes espoused the cause of the emperor, and he soon saw himself at the head of a very formidable army, with which he ravaged the archbishopric of Mentz, took the strong town of Bingen upon the Rhine by assault, compelled the three prelates to sue for peace, which they obtained at the expence of parting with the toll and duties which occasioned this rupture; but the elector palatine was obliged to purchase his pardon f with a considerable sum of money.

(N) This right of the elector palatine has been since confirmed by the golden-bull, in these words: "Altho', " by very antient custom, the emperor, or king of the " Romans, is obliged to answer in all cases instituted " against them before the count palatine of the Rhine, " arch-steward, prince elector, of the holy empire; " the said count palatine, however, shall not exercise " that jurisdiction, except in the imperial court, where " the emperor, or king of the Romans, shall be personally present, and in no other place (6)."

This article, however, ought not to be understood of causes instituted against the emperor as sovereign, but of those only in which he may be involved as a private person; such as civil causes, which were naturally tried before the count palatine, because he was of old the ordinary and supreme judge at the emperor's court. No prince, who had the least regard to justice, would refuse to answer to complaints of that kind before the tribunal, which they themselves had erected for that purpose; or scruple to leave the course of justice free in those disputes of law which they might have with private persons.

(6) Bull. Aur. c. 8.

- a ALBERT's next expedition was against Winceflaus, king of Bohemia, who had not only ascended the throne of Poland, after having defeated his competitor Uladislaus Loëticus, but also received a deputation from the noblemen of Hungary, with a tender of the crown, become vacant by the death of Andrew the Venetian. Possessed as he was of two crowns already, he recommended his son Winceflaus to the Hungarians, who changed the young prince's name to Ladislaus, and crowned him at Alba Regalis, to the no small mortification of the pope, who protested against his election as an enterprize against the holy see, to which, he said, the kingdom of Hungary appertained; nay, he even affected to decide the affair in a judicial manner, and adjudged the crown to Mary queen of Naples, wife of Charles II. and sister of Ladislaus III. king of Hungary. This princess made over her title to her grandson Char-
- b robert, whose interest the emperor espoused from a double motive; for the young prince was his own nephew, and Winceflaus his professed enemy: besides, he had an eye to the silver-mines of Bohemia, part of which he had already demanded without success. These co-operating considerations induced him to renew his old quarrels with Winceflaus: he assembled a formidable army of Austrians, Hungarians, Bulgarians, and Cumani, which having divided into two bodies, he detached the one to ravage Moravia, and marched at the head of the other into Bohemia, where his soldiers committed the most cruel outrages, without distinction of age, sex, or condition, and made a fruitless attempt upon the mines, from which they were repulsed with great loss. Notwithstanding this check, Winceflaus being disappointed of a reinforcement which he expected from Otho, marquis of Brandenburg,
- c and finding his forces greatly inferior to those of Albert, he permitted the miners to poison the water in the neighbourhood of the imperial camp; so that the greatest part of the Austrian troops, which used these waters, perished in the utmost torture, and the emperor, having moreover lost almost all his whole cavalry, was obliged to retreat into Austria with the miserable remains of his army.

The emperor invades Bohemia;

and is obliged to retreat with loss.

- WHILE the reconciliation subsisted between Philip the Fair and Boniface, this last refused to acknowledge Albert as king of the Romans, and even raised up a rival against him, in the person of Charles de Valois; but now that he had quarrelled with the king of France, who had granted an asylum to his enemies, the cardinals Colonnæ, he made advances to the emperor, confirmed his election, invited him to come and receive the imperial crown at Rome, and exhorted him to declare war against Philip, whom by this time he had excommunicated.
- d But, before he granted his bull of confirmation to Albert, he exacted very humbling conditions from that prince, who sent him letters patent, dated at Nuremberg, in which he acknowledged that the empire had been transferred by the holy see from the Greeks to the Germans, in the person of Charlemagne; that the right of electing a king of the Romans was granted, by the sovereign pontiff, to certain ecclesiastical and secular princes; and that kings and emperors received the power of the temporal sword from the holy see. He likewise agreed to take the oath of allegiance to the pope; to perform all the promises made by Radolphus and his predecessors; confirmed the concessions of Lewis the Debonnair and Otho the Great; and undertook to defend the rights of the holy see against all its enemies, whom-
- e soever they might be, and declare war against them, at the command of his holiness.

A. D. 1303. The emperor's election is confirmed by the pope;

- THE king of France, informed of the steps which the pope had taken to engage the emperor in his interests, contrived a scheme for seizing his person at Anagni, where he resided; and this was actually executed by William de Nogaret and Sciara Colonna, who, at the head of three or four hundred knights, formerly in the service of the count de Valois, surprised the town, and apprehended Boniface, whom they treated with great indignity; but on the fourth day of his imprisonment, during which he had been almost famished to death, the inhabitants took to their arms, under the command of the cardinal de Fresque, expelled Nogaret and Colonna, and set the pope at liberty. Boniface repaired immediately to Rome, where he fell sick of chagrin for having suffered such indignities; and dying, was succeeded by

- THIS new pope, who is said to have been a shepherd's son, seemed very well disposed to maintain an intimate union between the holy see and the empire, and even took some steps towards effecting a reconciliation between the Guelphs and the Gibelines, which last still supported the emperor's party in Tuscany, and some other provinces of Italy: but Benedict did not live to bring his laudable design to perfection; for he died eleven months after his elevation, very much regretted by Albert and the German princes, who hoped to re-establish the rights of the empire in Italy under his pontificate.

- MEAN while Ladislaus, by his misconduct, lost the footing he had gained in Hungary: his vices and debauchery alienated the hearts of his friends, and raised such a spirit of animosity against him, that he was obliged to lock himself up in the citadel of Buda, from which he was released by his father Winceflaus; who dying soon after this expedition, he succeeded

WHEN Winceflaus the younger ascended the throne of Bohemia, his conduct continued so irregular, that he was assassinated by his own subjects; and he dying without issue, Henry, count of Carinthia and Tyrol, the emperor's own cousin, was, in consequence of a free election, promoted to the throne. But Albert, on pretence of a family compact, raised a strong army, in order to put the crown on the head of his own son Rodolphus; and Henry, being too weak to cope with him in the field, resigned his pretensions in favour of his cousin Rodolphus, whose first wife Blanche being dead, he married Isabella, widow of Winceflaus, in order to fix himself more firmly on the throne. However, he did not long enjoy his good fortune; for he was soon after taken off by sudden death: upon which the kingdom was divided b into two factions, one of which recalled Henry, count of Carinthia; and the other elected Frederic, the emperor's son. Albert, who had before anticipated Henry, was now anticipated in his turn by that prince, who was now so well established upon the throne, that it was not in his power to depose him: after having ravaged part of his country, he was fain to return with his army, and leave him in peaceable possession of his dominions *.

AT his return from this fruitless expedition, he employed his arms in a war still more unjust and unsuccessful. We have seen that Adolphus purchased Misnia and Thuringia from that unnatural parent, who wanted to defraud his own children; but that the greatest part of the princes siding with the brothers Frederic and Dietsmann, he had never been able to gain possession; so that he lost both his money and his reputation. Nevertheless, when he died, c his brother Philip of Nassau claimed these countries, and the emperor supported his pretensions, in hope of profiting by the troubles that would necessarily ensue, and of obtaining some portion of the lands in dispute. He accordingly summoned the two brothers to appear before the diet at Fulde, and give an account of their title; and they refusing to adhere to the conditions he wanted to impose, were, by a formal sentence, divested of their estates, and put to the ban of the empire. He at the same time raised an army to carry this sentence into execution: but such a flagrant piece of tyranny and injustice raised up a number of friends to the young princes; so that Frederic found himself in a little time at the head of a strong body of forces, and actually gave battle to the emperor near Luchau, where he ob- d tained a complete victory; in consequence of which he remained peaceable possessor of the two provinces in question, while Albert was obliged to fly with disgrace, and sit down with the mortifying reflection of having seen all his laurels blasted by the prowess of a boy *.

A. D. 1306.

HIS chagrin, however, did not prey upon his faculties so much, but that he exerted all his endeavours in establishing his nephew Charobert upon the throne of Hungary. Pope Clement V. who succeeded Benedict, confirmed the sentence of Boniface in favour of Mary, queen of Naples, and forbade the Hungarians, on pain of the most terrible censures, to receive any other prince but Charobert. At the same time he commanded Otbo, duke of Bavaria, to lay aside the title of king of Hungary, which that prince had purchased with his money, after the expulsion of Ladislaus. He had even been crowned at Alba, and made a progress thro' the kingdom; but the pride and insolence of his disposition gave such disgust, that the nobles abandoned his interest, and the vaivode of Transilvania actually imprisoned him in a strong castle, from which he was not released until he had renounced his title to the crown. e in Holstein.

THOUGH the troubles of Hungary were thus appeased, the northern parts of Germany felt the disagreeable effects of a civil war, that broke out between Gerhard, count of Holstein, and the nobility of his country, who took the field against him, under the command of one Pelos; but they were vanquished in a pitched battle, and their chief being taken prisoner, was convicted of treason, and broke alive upon the wheel. As the city of Lubec gave sanc- f tuary to the fugitive nobles, the duke resolved to punish the regency of the town for this mark of disrespect. He accordingly encamped at the mouth of the Traive, where he built a fort, in order to interrupt their commerce, and hinder them from receiving supplies by sea. The regency, who had concluded a treaty of alliance with the duke of Saxony, determined to defend themselves by force of arms, and had recourse to Eric, king of Denmark, their protector, who sent Waldemar, duke of Sleswick, to take the command of their troops.

COUNT Gerhard, in order to ballance these preparations, received a reinforcement from the duke of Mecklenburg, and some other princes who were his allies, and took post near a place called Suartow, from whence he greatly incommoded the inhabitants of Lubec, and supported the garrison of the fort which he had raised at the mouth of the river.

BUT before any action of consequence was undertaken on either side, the difference was terminated by the mediation of duke Waldemar, and a peace concluded, on condition that

- a the new fort should remain in the hands of the count for the term of four years, which being expired, the emperor Albert should be solicited to decide to which party it should belong. This treaty was followed by a reconciliation between the count and his nobility, who mutually agreed, that in case of any future quarrel and dispute, they should have recourse to the king of Denmark and the duke of Mecklenbourg, who would decide the affair in question, according to the laws and customs of Holstein<sup>2</sup>. An accommodation is effected.

- THESE commotions did not affect the emperor so nearly as did the revolt of the Helvetians or Swiss, which was occasioned by the tyranny of those whom he appointed to govern that people, accustomed to cherish and maintain the idea of liberty as an inestimable jewel, transmitted to them by their ancestors from time immemorial. Fortified by their natural situation, and surrounded with mountains, torrents, and woods, they had nothing to fear from strangers, and lived happily in a rugged country, suitable to none but those who were used to a frugal and laborious course of life. Equality of condition was the most solid base of their government; and when their nobility attempted to tyrannize, they were either altogether expelled, or reduced within bounds by the people. Rodolphus of Hapsburg had appeased these troubles by his courage and discretion; the exiles were permitted to return, and peace was re-established on a solid footing. Although the Swiss were extremely jealous of their liberty, yet they were always submissive to the empire of which they held; and a great many of their towns were free and imperial. With respect to the three cantons of Ury, Switz, and Underwald, they do not seem to have been in any-ways dependent upon the house of Austria. Indeed, they put themselves under the protection of Rodolphus, when he was no more than landgrave of Alsace; and after his elevation to the imperial throne, they never acknowledged in him any other sovereignty but that of chief of the empire. Nor does he seem to have considered them as fiefs of the house of Austria; for he always treated them with great indulgence, and defended their rights and privileges against the noblemen who attempted to infringe them. - ALBERT*'s conduct in this particular was quite the reverse of his father's: he wanted to govern the Swiss as an absolute sovereign, and had formed a scheme for erecting Switzerland into a principality for one of his sons: he had endeavoured to persuade the cantons of Ury, Switz, and Underwald, to submit voluntarily to his dominion, in which case he promised to rule them with the utmost tenderness; but finding them tenacious of their independency, and deaf to all his solicitations, he resolved to tame them by rougher methods, and appointed governors, who domineered over them in the most arbitrary manner. Complaints were preferred without effect; their deputies were treated with contempt at the imperial court; they were subjected at home to numberless species of oppression; they were plundered, taxed, fined, imprisoned, tortured, and even put to death occasionally, without justice or form of law: and, in a word, they groaned under all the miseries flowing from despotic power and barbarity.

- IN this emergency they had no prospect of relief, except in their own courage, and they began to concert proper measures for delivering themselves from the tyranny of the Austrian government. The chiefs of the confederates were Arnould Melchtat, a native of Underwald, Werner Strauffacher, of Switz, and Walter Furts, of Ury. These men, naturally bold, enterprising, and united by a long intimacy of friendship, having frequently met in private to deliberate upon means to free their country, admitted nine other persons to their councils; and the association being confirmed by oath, they resolved to raise insurrections in the three cantons, to demolish the fortified castles, and expel the Austrian governors, with all their adherents. A certain time being fixed for putting this laudable design in execution, the individuals began privately to make preparations for such an important enterprise, which was actually achieved, without the loss of one single life. On the first day of January the conspirators sent fifty men to the governor of Sarn, with the usual presents and compliments of the season; and these being admitted into the citadel, seized the gates and made the governor their prisoner. The people of Ury at the same time surprised Altorf, and the inhabitants of Switz made themselves masters of Lowertz. The forts were instantly demolished, and the governor was conducted to the frontiers, where they obliged him to promise, upon oath, that he would never serve the house of Austria against the Helvetic nation, and never return to the cantons: an instance of moderation rarely found in an incensed people, who have their oppressors in their power. which form a conspiracy for the recovery of their liberty,

IN this manner the three cantons delivered themselves from the Austrian yoke, and retrieved that liberty, which they still enjoy unimpaired. The other cantons soon engaged in the confederacy, which was the origin of the Helvetic republic<sup>a</sup> (P).

THIS desire of aggrandizing his family, in a great measure influenced Albert's whole conduct. He had by his wife Elizabeth six sons and three daughters, for whom he endeavoured to procure all possible advantages; and the eagerness with which he prosecuted these endeavours in the end cost him his life. After the decease of his brother Rodolphus, duke of Suabia, and landgrave of Alsace, he had taken upon him the education of his only son John, as well as the administration of his dominions. This young prince, when he was of age, had often solicited the emperor, both by himself and his friends, to put him in possession of his patrimony, or at least to give him some portion. His uncle had, under various pretexts, delayed doing him justice; and it was generally suspected, that his design was to appropriate his pupil's estate to the benefit of his own children. This suspicion was confirmed by the intrigues he had used to possess himself of Bohemia, and the marquisate of Misnia, where he had even employed force in behalf of his usurpation, by these means incurring the aversion and resentment of several princes of the empire. The emperor having gone out on the first day of May to take the air at Basil, duke John prevailed upon the bishop of Strasburg to intercede with his uncle, that he might put him in possession of some of the castles belonging to his patrimony. To this proposal the emperor replied, that he would make his nephew an officer, and employ him in the Bohemian war, after which he should receive satisfaction. The young duke, who overheard this declaration, called aloud in a transport of passion, "I plainly see that he who would defraud me of my estate, would also deprive me of my life." So saying, he went in quest of three confederates, namely, Rodolphus of Warth, Walter of Eschebach, and Ulrick of Palm, who were all favourites of Albert. With these he had already concerted measures for destroying the emperor, in case he should refuse to comply with his demand; and now they determined to put their design in execution.

AFTER the entertainment the emperor had given to those who accompanied him, during which he had, with his own hands, crowned them with chaplets of flowers, he set out for Rhinfelden, and arriving at the river Rhees near Schaffhausen, he went into a boat, attended by duke John and his three confederates, while his son, together with the rest of his retinue, waited on the bank for its return. Albert having crossed the river, the conspirators advanced to him, while he walked through a new sown field, when duke John stabbed him in the throat, Warth plunged a sword into his breast, and Palm cut him across the head and face. After having thus executed their purpose, in sight of his own son and attendants, who could give him no assistance, they betook themselves to flight. Duke John, after having concealed himself for some time in different parts of Italy, went at length and threw himself at the feet of Clement V. successor of Boniface VIII. begging he would impose a penance proportioned to his crime, when the pope enjoined him to pass the remainder of his life in the monastery of the hermits of St. Augustine at Pisa, where he actually ended his days. By order of the emperor Henry VII. his duchy of Suabia was seized and confiscated for the use of the duke of Austria. Palm concealed himself in a convent of friars at Basil, where he died some time after. Eschebach lived thirty-five years as a cow-herd in a village of the county of Wurtemberg, and discovered himself upon his death-bed; and Warth being apprehended was broke alive upon the wheel. In the place where the emperor was slain a cloister was built, and called Koningsfelt, from whence his body, after having been deposited there for some time, was carried to Spire, and interred among his predecessors (Q). According to some cap, to which every passenger was commanded to pay obeisance; but William Tell, one of the conspirators, having refused to yield this absurd homage, he was summoned to appear before the governor, who condemned him to shoot an arrow through an apple, placed upon the head of his own son, at a certain distance, on pain of being hanged. This feat he successfully performed in public; when the governor, perceiving he had two arrows in his girdle, desired to know for what use he intended the supernumerary shaft. Tell having first obtained his promise that his life should not be taken away, acknowledged, that if it had been his misfortune to kill his son with the first arrow, he would have aimed the second at the governor's heart. Grissler incensed at this declaration, Tho' I will not break my promise (cried he) so as to take away thy life, thou shalt spend it in a close prison. So saying, he caused him to be fettered and transported to Cuschnach, a castle in the lake of Lucern;

They had scarce proceeded half way when they were overtaken with such a tempest, that the boatmen could not manage the vessel, and all on board were in the most imminent danger of their lives. In this extremity one of the governor's servants, who knew Tell to be the most expert boatman of the country, proposed that he should be unbound and set to the helm. The governor assented to the proposal, and Tell taking the command of the vessel, steered her close to a rock, where leaping ashore with great agility, he made his escape thro' the mountains to Straussacher, and lay concealed till the day on which the scheme was executed (1).

- b AFTER the death of the emperor Albert, the electors could not for some time agree in their choice of a person to succeed him on the throne. Philip the Fair of France aspired to the empire; and in order to facilitate the accomplishment of his wish, resolved to go and treat in person with pope Clement V. who was at that time at Avignon, and who is said to have been raised to the papacy, on condition that he should assist the king in his designs upon the imperial throne. The pope being apprised of this intended visit, and well knowing the subject of it, was very much embarrassed in his own mind; for being obliged to remain in France, on account of the commotions of Rome and Italy, he could not decently nor safely refuse to comply with Philip's desire, though he knew it was not in his power to grant it, as the imperial crown was entirely at the disposal of the Germans; who, if he should arrogate to himself the right of conferring it on this occasion, would in all probability explain themselves in express terms against the pretensions of the pope: because they would foresee, that, should Philip ascend the imperial throne, France would retrieve the dominions and rights to which she laid claim in the empire. He was likewise very well persuaded that Philip was dissatisfied with the court of Rome, on account of the insolence with which he had been treated by Boniface VIII. who had commanded him, in a very imperious strain, on pain of excommunication, to make war upon the Turks, for the recovery of the kingdom of Jerusalem. Philip, king of France, aspires to the empire. The pope is embarrassed;

- d CLEMENT V. who was now in the chair, being very much perplexed in consequence of these reflections, and undetermined in his behaviour towards Philip at the approaching interview, cardinal Nicholas Prat advised him to dispatch private messengers to the German electors, with pressing instances to elect a chief, and to declare, that, if the election did not immediately take place, the imperial dignity would revert from Germany to France. He likewise counselled him to propose Henry of Luxemburg, as a proper person to fill the throne<sup>f</sup>. and by the advice of cardinal Prat, proposes Henry of Luxemburg to the electors.

- e CLEMENT relished the advice, and immediately communicated Philip's design to the ecclesiastic princes, who entered into his views, and promised to conduct themselves according to his directions. Mean while Berthold, count of Henneburg, and Conrad, knight of Reida, as proxies of Otho and Waldemar, marquisses of Brandenburg, and Rodolphus, duke of Saxony, repaired to Boppard, where they found Rodolphus and Lewis, counts palatine of the Rhine. These four agreed to propose in the diet of election Otho and Waldemar, Albert, count of Hanau, Rodolphus and Lewis, and Frederic, duke of Austria; and they obliged themselves by oath to acknowledge for king of the Romans him, of these six competitors, who should have a majority of voices. At the same time they drew up some articles touching the preservation of their fiefs and privileges, which the future emperor should approve and confirm.

THESE preliminaries being regulated, the electors, to the number of six, assembled at Frankfort (R), where the archbishop of Triers began the diet by reading a protestation, importing, that all excommunicated or outlawed persons, and others who had no right to be

He pronounces sentence of death upon the murderer of Albert.

Grants the investiture of Austria to the sons of that emperor.

HENRY was not a little surprised when he understood the electors had conferred upon him that dignity, which he thought himself too weak to support. Nevertheless, he gratefully accepted of the honour, and was on the Epiphany crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle<sup>b</sup>. This ceremony being performed, he made a progress along the Rhine, to receive homage and the oath of fidelity from the princes, noblemen, and cities, and convoked a diet at Spire, to which the electors, princes, and deputies of towns, repaired in great numbers. Here sentence of death was pronounced against John of Austria, for the murder of the emperor Albert, whose sons Frederic, Leopold, Albert, and Otho, appearing at the same time, demanded the investiture of Austria, and the other hereditary dominions, which had been left to their father by the emperor Rodolphus. These four princes had been summoned by order of the emperor, who commanded them to resign their pretensions to Austria, which had already been fatal to five kings (T). They, on the other hand, insisted upon being maintained in the possession of a duchy, which had been bestowed upon their father with the consent of the princes of the empire. The emperor, however, remaining fixed in his resolution, duke Frederic retired, and at his departure is said to have sent a person to tell the emperor, that the duchy of Austria, which had already been the death of five kings, might still be fatal to a sixth, if he did not desist from his unjust pretensions. Be that as it will, certain it is, the emperor ordered the dukes to be called back, and, with the consent of the German princes, bestowed on them the investiture of that duchy. At this assembly also appeared Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, deceased, by a daughter of the emperor Rodolphus. A treaty of marriage had been agreed upon between her and John, son of Henry the emperor, whom the Bohemians had set upon the throne, after having expelled Henry, duke of Carinthia. This marriage having been delayed from time to time under different pretexts, the princess now demanded that the treaty should be fulfilled, or cause shewn why the nuptials should not immediately be solemnized. Count John of Luxemburg was at that time in the seventeenth year of his age, and Elizabeth turned of twenty-two. She was of a tall stature and genteel appearance; but a report had been spread abroad to the prejudice of her chastity, for which reason the emperor had, from day to day, deferred the consummation of the marriage, until the princess, having discovered the cause of this delay, found means to convince him of her innocence (U); upon which the ceremony was performed with great magnificence, in presence of the electors, and other princes and noblemen of the diet.

In this manner Bohemia became the property of the house of Luxemburg, who possessed it for a good number of years without interruption. At present, however, there was a necessity for conquering, before the new married couple could enjoy the kingdom; for Henry, duke of Carinthia, joined by Frederic, marquis of Misnia, had levied a considerable army, taken and garrisoned Prague and Cuttemberg, and exacted a new oath of allegiance from the inhabitants: John of Luxemburg, therefore, could not take possession, except by force of arms. The emperor and the princes furnished him with a strong body of troops, commanded by the archbishop of Mentz, the count palatine of the Rhine, and the counts of Oettingen and Heinsberg, and with these he entered Bohemia. His first operation was the siege of Cuttemberg, which in a little time surrendered; and then he invested Prague, the garrison of which was commanded by the duke of Carinthia and the marquis of Misnia in

(S) Before he was elected emperor, he had signalized himself in a war against the city of Triers, on account of their having refused to pay certain tributes and duties, to which the family of Luxemburg had a claim. He not only succeeded in this enterprize, but, when the fee of Liege was vacant, took his measures so effectually, that one of his brothers was chosen archbishop (1).

(U) The princess Elizabeth no sooner understood that her virtue was called in question, than, repairing to the emperor's anti-chamber, she undressed herself before the ladies there present, and approaching Henry in her shift, "Sire (said she, I am informed you entertain some suspicion of my honour, and, on that account, delay my marriage with the prince your son. Conscious therefore of my own innocence, I have taken the liberty of presenting myself in this manner, to intreat your imperial majesty will order me forthwith to be examined by matrons, whose testimony will soon refute the malice of my enemies, and redound to the triumph of my character." The emperor complied with her request, and she was committed to the care of some ladies and midwives, who unanimously declared her an unspotted virgin; upon which the marriage was solemnized (2).

a person, who made a very vigorous defence, until the burghers, incensed at some outrages committed by the soldiers, opened the gates to the besiegers, who soon became masters of the city. The duke and marquis, thus betrayed, took refuge in the fort of St. Wit, where they capitulated with king John, who permitted them to retire to their own dominions. The states were immediately assembled, and the coronation of John and Elizabeth was performed by the archbishop of Mentz, assisted by the bishops of Prague and Olmütz, amidst the acclamations of the Bohemians <sup>1</sup>.

THIS affair being settled, it was resolved that the emperor should make a journey into Italy, and orders were given for raising the troops necessary to attend him in this expedition. Mean while he ordered the body of Albert, together with that of his predecessor Adolphus, whom he had slain, to be carried to Spire, and interred in one day, he himself assisting in person at the funeral <sup>2</sup>. Then he sent a splendid embassy to Clement V. composed of the bishops of Basil and Coire, Amadeus, count of Savoy, John Dauphin, count d'Albon and Vienne, Gui, count of Flanders, John, count of Sarbruc, and doctor Simon de Marville, who repairing to Avignon, delivered their credentials to the pope, together with the decree of the election, which were very courteously received. His holiness acknowledged Henry as king of the Romans, promised to crown him emperor at Rome, and received the oath from these deputies, who swore, in the name of their master, that he never would make the least attempt upon the life or honour of the pope; that he would never enact any law in Rome, without the consent of his holiness; that he would restore all the lands belonging to the church; that he would exalt the holy see, defend all her rights, and take the accustomed oath at his coronation <sup>3</sup>.

DURING the reign of Albert I. Everhard, count of Wurtemberg, had molested the imperial cities of Suabia, and now, since the death of that emperor, had continued to exercise such violence against them, that they were obliged to complain of his conduct at the diet of Spire. The count, being summoned to appear and answer to the charge, came attended with such a large body of troops, as gave umbrage to the emperor and the princess, who, nevertheless, endeavoured to compromise the affair; but he rejected their advice, and retired, without having listened to any terms of accommodation. He was therefore put to the ban of the empire <sup>4</sup>; and a body of troops being raised to reduce him to obedience, the lord of Vinsberg was invested with the command, and in a little time subdued almost all the dominions of the count, who escaped into the territories of the marquis of Baden, with whom he lived till the death of the emperor, after which he, without difficulty, obtained possession of his estates.

AMONG other regulations for establishing the peace of the empire, Henry, at this period, by public decree, expelled the Jews from all the provinces of Germany, on account of the mischiefs which attended their usury and extortion; for they farmed the taxes of almost every prince at a low rate, and levied them with such severity and rapaciousness, as rendered them odious and detestable to the people. At the same time he, in conjunction with Philip the Fair of France, solicited the pope to abolish the order of templars, who not only imitated the Jews in their usury, but were accused of the most licentious debauchery, and all sorts of enormity. Clement, however, was deaf to their remonstrances, and refused to take any steps to the prejudice of an order, which had done such signal service to the cause of religion <sup>5</sup> (X).

As no emperor, since the death of Frederic II. had repaired to Italy, the rights of the empire in that country were all gone to wreck. Every nobleman had erected himself into a petty sovereign, and the Guelphs and Gibelines butchered one another without humanity or remorse. Pope Clement V. who had been the chief cause of Henry's election, urged him, with unceasing importunity, to go in person and quell the disturbances in Italy; and the Gibelines, who were imperialists, solicited him to the same effect, that they might be supported against their enemies. He now, therefore, convoked a diet at Frankfort, in order to deliberate upon proper measures for maintaining the tranquillity of the empire in his absence. His son John, king of Bohemia, was appointed vicar; and the office of his coun-

(X) This order was instituted at Jerusalem, in the beginning of the twelfth century, for the defence of the holy sepulchre, and the protection of Christian pilgrims. They were first called the Poor of the Holy City, and afterwards assumed the appellation of Templars, because their house was near the temple.

After the ruin of the kingdom of Jerusalem, about the year 1186, they spread themselves through Germany, and other dominions of Europe, whither they were invited by the liberality of the Christians; but their morals were soon corrupted by the riches they acquired; their lives became scandalous, and their pride insupportable. Among other pranks of the most shameless debauchery, they were taxed with having renounced the Christian religion, and with spitting in derision on the cross at all their meetings (1).

sellor given to the count of Henneberg, together with the dignity of prince, confirmed by the assembly. The treaty, which Henry's predecessors had made with France, was renewed; and the states promised to second the emperor's enterprize with their whole power. But that he might not alarm the Italians, he sent deputies before him to the cities of Lombardy with letters, importing, that he would march into Italy, not as an enemy, to ruin the subjects, and enrich himself with the spoil, but as a friend, coming to administer justice, repress disorders, redress grievances, and re-establish the provinces in the full and free enjoyment of their antient rights and privileges.

The pope endeavours to thwart his measures.

The state of Italy and Rome.

HAVING taken these precautions, he set out for Italy with the troops, which had been granted him by the states of the empire, being accompanied by the dukes of Austria and Bavaria, Baldwin, archbishop of Triers, the bishop of Liege, the counts of Savoy and Flanders, and other noblemen, together with the militia of all the imperial cities. Pope Clement, at whose earnest sollicitation this journey had been undertaken, changed his opinion, as soon as he saw Henry set out with sufficient forces to re-establish the authority and sovereignty of the empire in Italy, and set on foot divers secret negotiations to prevent his march. He committed the government of Rome to Robert, king of Apulia, or Naples, with whom he engaged in alliance against the emperor; and that prince sent thither his brother John, with a good body of troops, at the same time joining in a confederacy with the cities of Florence, Bologna, Sienna, Lucca, Cremona, Padua, Brescia, and some others; which being strongly garrisoned, and well provided with munitions of war, resolved to hold out against the emperor. Rome was divided into two factions; that of the Colonnas, which declared for the emperor, had seized upon St. John of Lateran, the amphitheatre, and some other principal parts of the city, distinguishing themselves by the old word Gibeline, and giving the appellation of Guelphs to the other party, which had declared for prince John, and secured the capitol, the castle of St. Angelo, and the Vatican.

A. D. 1311.

Henry receives the submission of several cities in Italy.

THE emperor having, according to the custom of his predecessors, dispatched envoys to the cities of Italy, to intimate his journey, and prepare provisions and necessaries for his court and army, he set out, in the month of September, from Lausanne, where he had received a deputation from the Gibeline faction. Crossing mount Cenis, he staid ten days at Turin, and having appointed a governor for the empire, repaired to the city of Asti, where he changed the magistracy, and gave the government to one Nicholas Bonsignori. Here he staid two months waiting for his army, with which he marched to Casal and Vercelli, where the inhabitants took the oath of allegiance, and submitted to the appointment of the German governors. He was likewise joyfully received by the city of Milan, and other towns of Lombardy, of whom he exacted considerable sums of money on account of arrears.

Guy de la Torre forms a conspiracy against the emperor's life.

NOTWITHSTANDING the great honours that were paid him by Guy de la Torre, chief of the Milanese, and governor of the city, he deprived him of his office, which was conferred upon Matthew Visconti, his professed enemy; and indeed Henry favoured the Gibelines with such partiality, as disquieted all people of moderation, and was of great prejudice to his own affairs. It was in consequence of this disgust that the iron crown, kept at Monza, could not be found for his coronation; so that he caused another of steel to be made, with which he was crowned, together with his empress, by Gaston de la Torre, archbishop of Milan; and after the ceremony created two hundred knights.

GUY DE LA TORRE, exasperated at the emperor's behaviour towards him and his party, resolved to make an attempt upon Henry's life, and with some of the Guelphs actually concerted a scheme for assaulting him in his palace, during the execution of a malefactor without the walls, which, they did not doubt, would attract the curiosity of the Germans, so as that they would crowd to the place, and leave the emperor almost quite unguarded. Matthew Visconti having luckily received intimation of this plot, communicated the whole contrivance to Henry, who took his measures in such a manner, that, when the conspirators assembled to execute their design, they were suddenly attacked and cut in pieces by a body of troops prepared for that purpose. As for Guy de la Torre, he escaped, with some of his family; but his house was razed to the ground, and his effects confiscated for the use of the emperor.

NOTWITHSTANDING this miscarriage, he still continued to project plans for Henry's destruction, and even engaged the emperor's own chancellor in another design against his life. That perfidious wretch sent letters, sealed with the imperial seal, to the magistrates of Lombardy, commanding them, at an appointed time, to murder all the Germans who were in garrison among them; and the execrable scheme would, in all probability, have been executed, had not a German knight happily intercepted one of the letters, and boldly expostulated on the subject with Henry, who being informed of the particulars, caused his chancellor to be apprehended immediately, and among his papers found one of the letters not yet a expedited. Far from attempting to exculpate himself, this miscreant confessed the crime, The chancellor owning, that being a Guelph of the race of the Turriani, massacred at Milan, he had entered convicted of into the emperor's service with no other view but that of destroying him with the first favourable opportunity; and that he had before poisoned several waggon loads of wine destined perfidy, and for the German army, though that scheme did not take effect. Henry, amazed and confounded at the villainy and boldness of this traitor, condemned him to be burnt alive, and the sentence was executed accordingly <sup>committed to</sup> <sup>the flames.</sup>

CREMONA was the first place that ventured to oppose the emperor, and that he took by force, and fleeced accordingly. Parma, Vicenza, and Placentia made peace with him upon reasonable conditions. Padua paid an hundred thousand crowns, and received an imperial officer as commander of the city. The Venetians presented his majesty with a large sum of money, an imperial crown of gold enriched with diamonds, and a vermilion chain of very curious workmanship. Brescia made a desperate resistance, and sustained a very severe siege, in the course of which Waleran of Luxemburg, the emperor's brother, was slain <sup>Brescia is be-</sup> <sup>sieged.</sup> by an arrow, and Henry's army diminished to such a degree, that the inhabitants marched out, under the command of their prefect Tibault de Drussati, and gave him battle. After a very obstinate engagement, in which the emperor was knocked off his horse, and almost killed, the Germans, animated by the danger in which they saw their sovereign, charged the Brescians with such redoubled fury and impetuosity, as bore down all opposition, and compelled them to retire into the city with great loss. Tibault, who had fought with incredible valour, was found upon the field not yet dead, though grievously wounded; and being carried to the place where the emperor stood, Henry reproached him with his perfidy, ordered him to be tore asunder by four horses, then his quarters were exposed upon the wheel, and his head fixed upon a pike before the gates of the city. And indeed this punishment, severe as it was, seems to have been no more than adequate to his treachery and ingratitude; for two years before this event, when he was banished from his native country, he had come to Spire, and implored the protection of Henry, who received him with great hospitality, and knighted him with his own hand; yet, unmindful of these favours, he afterwards joined the Guelphs, and was the person who excited the Brescians to revolt against his benefactor. His townsmen, in order to revenge his death, hanged fifty German prisoners upon their walls; a circumstance which incensed the emperor to such a degree, that he was resolved to humble them, or perish in the attempt. Thus determined, he redoubled his efforts, and repeated his attacks with equal vigour and perseverance, until the besieged were, by the enemy without, and famine within, reduced to the utmost extremity. Then they had recourse to his clemency, and presented themselves before him barefoot, with halters about their necks; a spectacle which he could not behold unmoved. He accordingly granted them their lives, on condition they should pay sixty thousand crowns, and deliver one hundred hostages, chosen from their principal citizens; but, at the same time, he ordered their walls and fortifications to be demolished, and entered in triumph the breach he had made. From hence the emperor, after having appointed governors in that city, Verona, Parma, Mantua, marched directly to Genoa, where he was splendidly received and entertained by the city. <sup>Surrenders at</sup> <sup>discretion, and</sup> <sup>is dismantled.</sup>

By this time Henry's successes in Lombardy had greatly alarmed the pope, who began to fear, that he would not only reduce all the Italian towns and states to his obedience, but also take advantage of Clement's absence to fix the seat of his empire at Rome. It was from this apprehension that, although he had sent a commission to five cardinals to crown the emperor, he now exerted all his endeavours to traverse his success, in concert with Robert, king of Naples, who formed a confederacy among the towns of Florence, Bologna, and Lucca, and ordered his brother John, prince of Morea, to march with a body of forces to Rome, to oppose the emperor's entrance into that city, and act as the ally and protector of the Ursini, who headed the faction of the Guelphs. Mean while he sent a deputation to the emperor at Genoa, to declare, that his sole view of detaching his brother to Rome, was to honour the entry of his imperial majesty; and that he was sincerely disposed to cultivate and cement a friendship with his imperial majesty, by means of a match between his son, the duke of Calabria, and Katherine of Luxemburg. <sup>Henry is amu-</sup> <sup>sed by Robert,</sup> <sup>king of Naples</sup>

Tho' Henry was for some time amused by the dissimulation of this prince, who endeavoured to protract the negotiation, he would not delay his coronation, but set out from Genoa, where he had been joined by the cardinals appointed to perform that ceremony; but before he began his march, he sent ambassadors to the prince of Morea, who, in conjunction with the Ursini, had taken possession of part of the city, to give notice of his approach, that all obstacles to his entry might be removed. At length the Neapolitan thought proper to pull off the mask, after having amused the envoys for a considerable time, on pretence of sending to his brother for further orders, and declared, that he would oppose Henry's entrance and coronation with all his power. a

Henry presents himself before Rome in order of battle;

MEAN while the emperor continued his march, and, on his arrival at Pisa, was, by a messenger from the Colonnas, entreated to advance to Rome with all expedition. In compliance with this request, he proceeded with great diligence, and presented himself in order of battle at the Ponte Mola, where he imagined they would dispute his passage; but the prince of Morea had withdrawn his troops from that quarter, so that the imperialists entered almost without opposition, and were lodged in different parts, with strict orders to be upon their guard against all attempts of the enemy.

and is crowned in the church of St. John of Lateran.

The basilicon of St. Peter's, in which the emperors were usually crowned, being in the hands of the Ursini faction, Henry proposed, that he should receive the imperial crown in the church of St. John of Lateran; and tho' the cardinals at first refused to comply with his desire, on pretence that it was contrary to custom, and exceeded the bounds of their commission, such was the deplorable situation of Rome, divided and distracted between two implacable factions, which filled the city with carnage and consternation, that they were at length prevailed upon to embrace the expedient; and he received the crown with the usual ceremonies, amidst the acclamations of the people, who looked upon this event as the only means of being delivered from such oppressive guests. b

Makes an abrupt departure from the city.

UPON this occasion, instead of making largesses, according to the custom of his predecessors, he demanded money of the Romans; who were so much provoked at this unusual imposition, that many of the citizens joined his enemies, who were in possession of the strongest places in Rome, and a tumult ensued, in which the emperor lost about two thousand men; and was besides so straitened by want of provision and money, that he could no longer subsist in Rome. c

HENRY having, after his coronation, exerted his endeavours to remedy the disorders of Rome, resolved to take vengeance on the king of Naples, who had duped him in such a perfidious manner, and for that purpose concluded a treaty of alliance with Frederic II. king of Sicily, brother of James II. of Arragon, importing, that as soon as the emperor should have made himself master of Tuscany, he should invade the kingdom of Naples by land, while the Sicilian fleet should attack the maritime places.

THE pope, willing to prevent the consequences of this rupture, wrote to the cardinals who had crowned Henry, desiring they would effect an accommodation, or at least command both parties to agree to a truce, inasmuch as they were obliged to obey his commands by the oath of fidelity they had taken, and the benefits they had received from the holy see. d

Besieges Florence without success.

THE emperor paid no manner of regard to this remonstrance; but finding himself incapable to reduce his enemies at Rome, he left the government of the city to the Colonnas, and repaired to Tivoli; from thence, taking his route through the territory of Perugia, which he had laid waste with fire and sword, he arrived at Arezzo, with an intention to attack Florence. He accordingly invested that city, after having taken and demolished some forts in the neighbourhood; but after a fruitless siege of forty days, was obliged to retire to winter-quarters. In the spring, he convened all the princes of Italy at Pisa, and decreed, that they should punctually and annually pay the accustomed tribute; and after mature deliberation upon the acts of hostility, which had been committed by Robert, king of Naples, upon the empire, he summoned him to appear as his feudatory. Robert refusing, was put to the ban (Y), his kingdom being bestowed upon Frederic, king of Sicily, who was in the emperor's interest. The pope, in consequence of these proceedings against his ally, wrote letters to the emperor, earnestly exhorting him to listen to an accommodation; but they happened to produce the contrary effect: for being couched in the stile of a sovereign who c

(Y) The Florentines surrendered the sovereignty of their territory, for the term of five years, to Robert, on condition he would protect them from the resentment of the emperor; the inhabitants of Lucca, Pistoria, and Prato, submitted to him on the same terms; and the pope conferred upon him the government of Ferrara. Henry was extremely mortified to see the power of his enemy daily increasing; and his resentment glowed with the greater ardour, when he learned, that the Neapolitan galleys had attacked his vessels in the harbour of Pisa, after having ravaged the islands of Gorgonia and Capraia. He therefore denounced a sentence against him as a child of perdition, which, for the entertainment of the reader, we shall repeat: "We declare Robert, who calls himself

" king of Naples, divested of the authority, honours, and " immunities, which he enjoyed: we deprive him of the " provinces, counties, cities, castles, townships, and

" empire for ever, on pain of losing his head, if he shall " presume to remain in it contrary to our will, or to re-

- a writes to his vassal, Henry was incensed at his insolence, and, in order to manifest his resentment, joined his forces with those of Frederic, king of Sicily, in order to attack the dominions of Robert both by sea and land. He had been in great distress for want of forces, because those he expected from Germany were retarded by the war which his son John was obliged to maintain against the duke of Carinthia, who had renewed hostilities, and ravaged Moravia. At length, however, a reinforcement arrived with his brother, who was archbishop of Triers, and a powerful armament being fitted out for his service by Frederic of Sicily and the Genoese, he was flushed with the hope of making a complete conquest of Naples. The king of France, alarmed at these preparations, began to fear that, should Henry succeed in this enterprize, and reduce the towns of Italy, he would reclaim Provence and
- b some other domains, which formerly belonged to the empire : he therefore complained to the pope of the violent proceedings of the emperor, who intended to dispossess Robert of the patrimony of his ancestors, and to trouble the repose of the church, so as to hinder the princes of Europe from going to the Holy Land, according to the resolution taken in the council of Vienne. In consequence of this remonstrance, the pope issued a bull, forbidding all persons whatever, on pain of excommunication, to invade Naples by sea or land, on any pretence whatsoever : but this prohibition had little weight with Henry, who sent a splendid embassy to explain his motives to the king of France, who was satisfied with his explanation ; and then began his march towards the territory of Sienna, with a view to enter Robert's dominions. Though his health was extremely precarious, he was resolved to
- c be personally present in this expedition, and advanced as far as Bonconvento, where all his fine schemes for the establishing the imperial authority in Italy ended with his life (Z). His body was carried back to Pisa, and interred with great pomp in the cathedral church, amidst the inexpressible sorrow of all his followers, after he had reigned four years seven months and eighteen days*.

He engages in an expedition against Robert king of Naples, and dies at Bonconvento.

His character,

- d Thus died Henry VII. in the 51st year of his age, a prince who had the reputation of being valiant, politic, just, affable, and devout. He was well made, though thin ; his complexion was florid, and his hair of a sandy colour : he had a small defect in his right eye, his nose and chin were long, his speech was slow, and his stile concise : he had an air of majesty, mingled with great complaisance. Nothing gave him so much pain as to be obliged to treat with his subjects. He abhorred the names of Gibellines and Guelphs, and loved to command as sovereign. In his youth he had, by means of the pope's dispensation, married Margaret, daughter of John, duke of Brabant, his own cousin. By this princess, who died at Genoa, he had prince John, of whom mention hath already been made, and four daughters, namely, Beatrice, wife of Charobert, king of Hungary ; Mary, queen of Charles the Fair of France ; Agnes, matched with Rodolphus, count palatine of the Rhine ; and Katherine, married to Leopold, duke of Austria.

(Z) He is said, by some authors, to have been poisoned by a Dominican, whose name was Bernard Politian, in administering the sacrament, which the emperor frequently received. This monk is supposed to have been hired by his own countrymen the Florentines, to perpetrate this execrable action. Several writers have endeavoured to vindicate the order from such an aspersion, and to prove that Henry died of a complication of distempers ; they have even produced a letter written by his own son, in which he acquits the monks of all suspicion. Nevertheless, the dispute is still undecided ; and though it is well known that the emperor laboured under an ill state of health when he embarked in this expedition, it is likewise certain, that the report of the poison was generally believed at the time of his death (1).

ligion: they had built the town of Königsberg, in honour of Lewis IX. their good benefactor: the city of Montreal afterwards owed its origin to their industry; and they supported a long and troublesome war against Seth Wan de Pol, duke of Pomerania. This prince, when upon his death-bed, declared his eldest son Mestewin heir to his dominions; but he was deposed by his younger brother Wratislaus, who governed with such insolence and tyranny, that the people were in arms, expelled him from the duchy, and restored his brother. Wratislaus, thus exiled, had recourse to Conrad, marquis of Brandenburg; whose assistance he procured by promising to defray the expences of the war, and leave him in possession of Dantzick, until he should have obtained full satisfaction. On these conditions the marquis took the field, and surprised both town and citadel; but understanding that Mestewin was supplied with a strong body of forces by his brother-in-law Boleslaus, palatine of Kalis, he did not choose to encounter such a powerful enemy; and gave his employer to understand, that if he did not immediately pay the troops, the town must be abandoned to pillage. In this emergency Wratislaus applied to the Teutonic knights, residing at Elbing, offering to surrender his person and dominions at discretion, provided they would expel Mestewin and the marquis: but their hands were then so full, that they declined embarking in the affair, and Wratislaus died of grief at their refusal. Mean while Mestewin and his ally besieged and took Dantzick, which the palatine kept by way of security until his death; immediately after which Mestewin surprised both city and citadel, and drove out the Polish garrison.

HERTMAN, count de Helderingen, grand master of the Teutonic order, having repressed the insolence of the Russians, Lithuanians, Samogitians, and Semigalli, by whose irruptions the knights had been greatly harrassed, marched at the head of an army towards Dantzick, to avail himself of the cession which Wratislaus had made in favour of the order. Before hostilities commenced, however, an accommodation was effected, by the intercession of the pope's legates, who were at that time in Prussia; and by an article of the treaty, the knights were put in possession of the town and citadel, with all their dependencies. They were afterwards possessed by Primislaus, the nephew and heir of Mestewin; and at his death the city fell into the hands of the marquis of Brandenburg, though the citadel continued in the power of Uladislaus, king of Poland. This fortress being besieged by the princes of Brandenburg, who were bent upon making themselves masters of all Pomerania, the Polish governor implored the assistance of the knights, who marching to his relief, compelled the enemy to raise the siege of the citadel, and even relinquish the city itself, both which they kept for their own use, because the Poles could not pay the sum they demanded for their service: nay, they afterwards purchased Pomerelia of Waldemar, marquis of Brandenburg, and the contract was performed by the emperor Henry VII. notwithstanding the opposition of the king of Poland. While the order supported itself in Europe against all its enemies, its interest was ruined in Syria under Conrad de Feuschawang, their grand master, in whose time the city of Acra, where they had established their principal house, was taken by the sultan of Egypt, and the knights that remained obliged to return to Germany.

In the petty wars of the North, as the marquisses of Brandenburg were powerful enough to make either scale preponderate, their alliance was courted by the kings of Denmark and Poland; and Eric VIII of Denmark, in particular, lived in great friendship with these princes, the duke of Mecklenbourg, and the other noblemen of Lower Saxony. Having invited his allies to a tournament at Rostock, the inhabitants of that city, jealous of their liberty, refused to admit so many princes within their walls: an affront which his Danish majesty resented so highly, that he equipped a powerful fleet and landed in Wandalia, where he was joined by the duke of Mecklenbourg, and the other noblemen, who had jointly sustained the insult. Then they invested the city of Rostock, and hampered it in such a manner, that the people, driven to despair, murdered their magistrates and submitted to Eric, who bestowed it as a proprietary fief upon the duke of Mecklenbourg, by an authentic deed, which was confirmed by the inhabitants in the most solemn manner.

The templars are persecuted, and their order abolished.

ABOUT this period, the templars who resided in Germany were, in consequence of the abolition of their order by pope Clement at the council of Vienne, distributed in different monasteries to do penance, with a moderate pension from the revenues of the order; and the lands and houses they possessed in Lorraine were given to the hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem; but in the other provinces, their lands were resumed by the noblemen to whose families they originally belonged.

The competition between Lewis of Bavaria and Fre-

THE few templars who resided in Bavaria and Austria were not disturbed; for these provinces were otherwise employed in a war, occasioned by a competition for the guardianship of the children left by Stephen, duke of Bavaria. This province formerly belonged to Otho, duke of Lower Bavaria, brother of Stephen, who had been elected king of Hungary: but a he did not survive his brother many months, and declared in his last will, that the tutorage and regency of the dominions belonging to his nephews devolved to Lewis of Bavaria, now become duke by his death. This right was contested by Frederic, duke of Austria, who, by presents and promises, gained over some of the noblemen of the province to his interest; and notwithstanding the repeated endeavours of the landgrave of Thuringia, to reconcile these two rivals, they were so exasperated against each other, that they had recourse to the decision of arms, and each competitor took the field at the head of a formidable army.

b THE duke of Bavaria having received advice that the body of Austrians, on their way to join Frederic, had halted at Gamelsdorf, five leagues from Mosburg, detached a part of his best troops to beat up their quarters; and a battle ensued, in which the Austrians were routed and cut in pieces; so that Frederic, finding himself without resource, was fain to sue for peace. Lewis, exclusive of his private hatred to the duke of Austria, had another view in continuing the war, namely, that of seizing the dominions of the antient house of Austria, to which he had pretensions: but considering that the scheme might interfere with his design of mounting the imperial throne, which was now vacant, he agreed to hold a congress at Salzburg, where Wickard, archbishop of that see, and Henry of Carinthia, acted as arbiters of the peace; and an accommodation was effected; in consequence of Frederic's renouncing all right to the guardianship and regency; and promising to restore the booty and prisoners which he had acquired in the course of the war.

c THE disorders and dangers which had already begun to interrupt the commerce of Germany, even in the life-time of Henry VII. increased to such a degree after his death, that certain cities of the Rhine were obliged to enter into an association with the prince palatine Rodolphus, duke of Bavaria, who signed an instrument in his own name, and that of his brother Lewis, for their mutual security against highwaymen, and their protectors or relations, who might attempt to revenge the death of such as should fall a sacrifice to justice, by committing outrages on the inhabitants of the cities where they had been executed. This confederacy was formed during the interregnum, which continued from the 24th of August, when Henry died, to the 18th of October in the following year. All that intermediate time being employed in the intrigues of Frederic, duke of Austria, and Lewis, duke of Bavaria, who, though first cousins, and grandchildren of the emperor Rodolphus I. now set up for the throne in opposition to each other.

d THE long vacancy in the empire was owing to several concurring causes. Henry, duke of Carinthia; disputed with John of Luxemburg, not only the title of king of Bohemia, but also the quality of elector, which last was likewise contested between John and Rodolphus, dukes of Saxony; for the number of electors was not yet regulated: and in the elections of William of Holland, and Alphonso of Castile; two princes of the house of Brandenburg had given their suffrages; nay, two of the Bavarian family had voted for Richard duke of Cornwall. Some of the princes were of opinion, that the right was inherent only in the elder branch of the electoral house; but this affair, though often discussed, was never determined till the reign of Charles IV. by the famous constitution called the Golden Bull.

e EXCLUSIVE of these civil divisions, Germany groaned under all the miseries of plague and famine, by which whole towns were unpeopled, and provinces left in desolation. The rich fled for refuge into other countries, while the poor perished by hunger or disease; the wolves and other beasts of prey, compelled by famine, quitted their savage haunts, and rushing into the villages, destroyed all who fell in their way. The air was tormented with storms and tempests, the lands were deluged with torrents of rain, and cataracts of water bursting from the mountains, and sweeping trees, animals, and houses, before them with incredible impetuosity; and the earth was convulsed with dreadful shocks, that seemed to shake it from the center.

f THESE calamities obliged the princes to shut themselves up in their castles; so that the election of a king of the Romans was for some time delayed: but these evils were no sooner alleviated, than the competitors renewed their cabals, and canvassed with equal industry for the imperial throne. At length, however, Peter, archbishop of Mentz; Baldwin, archbishop of Triers, who was count of Luxemburg; and brother to the late emperor; Henry of Virtemberg, archbishop of Cologne; John, king of Bohemia, son of the late emperor; Rodolphus, count palatine of the Rhine, and Lewis, duke of Bavaria, his brother; Volmar, marquis of Brandenburg; Rodolphus, duke of Saxony, son of Albert II. and Eric, duke of Lower Saxony, assembled at Frankfort, in order to deliberate upon the choice of an emperor, when a schism happened among the electors (A). Those of Mentz, Triers, Bohemia, and Brandenburg, denburg, declared for Lewis, duke of Bavaria, who was then in the city; while the archbishop of Cologne, the count palatine, and the duke of Saxony, adhered to Frederic, duke of Austria, who had taken up his quarters at Saxenhausen, on the other side of the river. Lewis immediately set out for Aix-la-Chapelle, where he was crowned by the archbishop of Mentz; and the other electors conducted Frederic to Bonn, where he received the crown from the elector of Cologne. After this double coronation, these two emperors exerted themselves in gaining over the imperial cities, and in procuring advantages, each to the prejudice of the other. Besides those we have already mentioned, Lewis had engaged in his party several bishops and counts, particularly those of Westphalia, to whom he granted sundry privileges.

The city of Cologne, although its archbishop was of the contrary faction, together with the towns of the Lower Rhine, as far as Seltz, espoused his cause. As for Frederic, he was acknowledged by Seltz, and all the other cities of the Higher Rhine, except Berne and Soleure, which remained neuter. This dispute, which involved the whole country in civil war and confusion, and had like to have ruined the empire intirely, was maintained in mutual ravages for several years, until the two rivals gave battle to each other, in order to decide the contest at once.

Lewis.

WHILE Frederic, flushed with pride and ambition, and confiding in the power, magazines, and affluence, which he inherited of his father, exerted all his endeavours to anticipate and drive his rival from the imperial crown, one Truchses of Alzein attempted to assassinate Lewis, in hope of ingratiating himself with the duke of Austria by this execrable action.
With this view he and his accomplices repaired to Oppenheim, where the emperor resided with the archbishop of Mentz; but Lewis, having received notice of their design, took measures for their being apprehended. They were accordingly taken, tried, convicted, broke alive upon the wheel, and their quarters exposed in terrorem of all traitors.

Austria ravages the country

MEAN while Leopold of Austria, zealous for the glory of his brother Frederic, assembled an army, and marched towards Spire, whither Lewis had advanced; but this last intrenching him so strongly that he could not be attacked with any probable hopes of success, Leopold, having ravaged the country, took the route of Augsburg, crossed the Black Mountains, passed the river Lech, and entering Upper Bavaria, surprised and set fire to Landsparg. Frederic, supposing that the inaction of Lewis proceeded from his weakness, began to look upon him with contempt, and, instead of pursuing the advantages he had gained, amused himself at Basil with the ceremony of a double match between him and Elizabeth of Arragon, and between his brother Leopold and Katherine of Savoy.

Lewis negotiates a treaty with the Swiss,

WHILE he trifled away his time in these nuptials, which were celebrated with great magnificence, Lewis was employed in negotiating a treaty with the Swiss cantons, which he knew to be the natural enemies of the Austrian house: but although part of them had already acknowledged him as emperor, they were very scrupulous of taking up arms in his favour, and before he could remove their objections, Leopold endeavoured to prevent the alliance.
On pretence of assisting the abbot of the hermitage of the virgin Mary, who had excommunicated the Swiss, in consequence of a dispute concerning the limits of their territories, he advanced with an army of twenty thousand men against the cantons of Switz, Ury, and Underwald, which were confederated for their mutual defence. As their whole force did not exceed one thousand six hundred men, they had recourse to the policy of war; and knowing the enemy must necessarily pass through a narrow defile, they posted part of their troops upon the mountains near Morgarten, from whence they rolled down such a quantity of huge stones upon the Austrians, that great numbers of them were killed and wounded, and the whole army put in confusion; then the Swiss fell upon them with great fury, and drove them out of the canton with terrible slaughter. Such exploits of valour were performed by the Swiss upon that occasion, and so much depended upon the fortune of the day, that the fight of Morgarten may be compared to the battle of Marathon, which ascertained the liberty of Greece; and it certainly gave rise to the Helvetic union: for the alliance, which the three cantons had made for the term of ten years only, was now converted into a perpetual league, in which the others occasionally engaged.

Lewis and Frederic.

FREDERIC, in the mean time, besieged Esslingen on the Neckar; and Lewis coming to the relief of the place with a body of troops which he had received from Bohemia, a battle was fought with great obstinacy, until night parted the combatants; so that neither side could claim the victory: for although Lewis sustained the greatest loss, his rival was so weakened by the engagement, that he was fain to raise the siege, and retire. Thus the two competitors maintained the war with various success, endeavouring to acquire new friends, and strengthen their different factions, by favours and grants, which both bestowed in quality of emperor.

a IN the midst of this contention, John XXII. being raised to the papacy, both princes strove to obtain his good graces, and both were disappointed in their expectation; for tho' he amused each party with flattering promises, he would confirm neither, but resolved to take the advantage of their division for extending his own power in the empire, and ruining the party of the Gibelines in Italy. Pope John XXII. makes encroachments upon the imperial crown.

b WITH this view he published the constitutions of pope Clement V. in which that pontiff declared, that the empire is dependent on the Roman church, and that the emperors, in receiving the crown, ought to take the oath of allegiance to his holiness. Then he issued out a bull upon his own authority, annulling the offices of the vicars or lieutenants, whom the emperor Henry VII. had appointed in the different cities of Lombardy, declaring, that as the imperial throne was now vacant, the government of the empire belonged to the pope alone, as successor of St. Peter, to whom was granted all power on earth as well as in heaven; forbidding all persons, of what rank or quality soever, whether royal or patriarchal, to assume the quality of vicar, or any other office or dignity of the empire, without his permission, on pain of personal excommunication, and an interdiction on his lands and territories; and, lastly, nominating Robert, king of Naples, vicar of the empire in Italy. Not contented with these arbitrary proceedings, he summoned the two competitors for the empire to appear at his tribunal, that he might hear their different pleas, and determine to which of them the empire should belong.

c THE Gibelines, far from being intimidated by his threats, still kept possession of their posts and dignities; and the pope, incensed at their contempt of his authority, declared openly for the Guelphs; and the civil war was renewed in Italy with infinite rancour and animosity. The Gibelines espoused the cause of Lewis, which was likewise supported by Frederic of Arragon, king of Sicily; and the Guelphs, reinforced by Robert, king of Naples, attached themselves to the interest of the duke of Austria. Matthew Visconti, the most powerful of all the Gibelines, made himself master of Milan, taking to himself the quality of prince and lord of that city, for Lewis of Bavaria, king of the Romans. He reduced Pavia, Novara, Placentia, Alexandria, and several other cities; and, notwithstanding a sentence of excommunication thundered out against him and all his adherents by the pope, he undertook the siege of Genoa, where the Guelphs prevailed, which he maintained, with the assistance of the families of Doria and Spinola, for the space of two years; during which the place was several times relieved by Robert, king of Naples, and the joint efforts of the pope and Florentines, until the army of the besiegers being reduced to an inconsiderable number, he was obliged to relinquish the enterprize <sup>a</sup>. A. D. 1317. The Gibelines declare for Lewis, and the Guelphs for Frederic.

d FREDERIC of Austria, seeing the strength of his rival daily increasing, began to be apprehensive of his growing power, especially as he now presumed to act upon the offensive, and had actually made an incursion into Austria. Thither he was followed by Frederic, who obliged him to pass the river Inn, and the two armies came in sight of each other near Muldorf. Here the duke of Austria, perceiving himself inferior in power to his adversary, proposed, that their difference should be decided by a combat between fifteen of each side; and his proposal being embraced by Lewis, the champions were chosen, and engaged in presence of both armies with such fury, that in a very little time there was not one of them alive. This was but the prelude to a general action, which lasted from the morning till the afternoon, when the Austrians were worsted, and obliged to repass the river in the utmost disorder; while Leopold, who advanced on the side of the Lech, at the head of a body of cuirassiers, in order to surround the Bavarians, understanding his brother's defeat, and the dispersion of his army, retreated with great expedition into Suabia, where he employed himself in making new levies. Visconti besieges Genoa.

e NOTWITHSTANDING the great loss which Frederic sustained on this occasion, he found means to repair it in a very short time, and joined his brother, who was reinforced by Ulric, count de Ferrera (B), and John, bishop of Straßburg. By this juncture, the archdukes were in a condition to appear again in the field against Lewis, though supported by the archbishops of Mentz and Triers, and the king of Bohemia. While they faced one another on different sides of the Brusch in Lower Alsace, Lewis sent a trumpet to defy Frederic to battle, A. D. 1319. Frederic is defeated at Muldorf.

(B) This Ulric, count de Ferrera, died without male issue, but left two daughters, Jane and Ursula. The former was married in the sequel to Albert II. archduke of Austria, surnamed the Sage, or the Lane. This prince being bishop of Passau, represented to the pope, that his four brothers, archdukes of Austria, were dead without male issue, and obtained a dispensation to marry Jane, with whom he acquired the extensive county of Ferrera, which the house of Austria continued to possess till the peace of Munster; for Ursula ceded all her right in consideration of eight thousand marks of silver. Thus Aljane gave a wife to the archduke Albert, who continued the line of the house of Austria, when it was almost extinct by the death of the other sons of Albert, king of the Romans (1).

in consequence of which defiance, this last immediately quitted his intrenchments, drew up <sup>a</sup> his army in order of battle, and even passed the river, in order to attack the enemy, with such resolution, as struck a panic into the Bavarians, who retreated with great precipitation, and were pursued for three days, until they took shelter under the ramparts of

NEXT year Frederic and Leopold went in quest of Lewis into his own country of Bavaria; and he not being in a condition to oppose them in the field, betook himself to his strong places, leaving the open country a prey to his enemies, who lived at discretion, and ravaged it for a considerable time <sup>1</sup>.

The pope invites Philip de Valois into
Italy,

IN a little time after the Bavarian was freed from these troublesome guests, he sent a body of horse to the assistance of the Gibelines in Italy; and the pope perceiving the affairs of the Guelphs upon the decline, invited Philip de Valois, nephew to the king of France, to come to their assistance, in which case he would declare him general of the holy see. Philip accepted of the dignity, and began his march into Italy, at the head of a number of French volunteers, on the promise of being joined at Ast by cardinal Paget with eight hundred horse, and of receiving reinforcements from the king of Naples, and the cities of Bologna, Sienna, and Florence. But this expedition was ruined by his inexperience and precipitation; for advancing to Mortaro, in his way to Vercelli, with fifteen hundred horse only, he was cut off from the rest of his army by Galeazzo Visconti, and obliged to solicit a conference, in which he agreed to relinquish his enterprize, and actually returned to France with disgrace.

THE pope, baffled in his hopes from this quarter, had recourse to Frederic of Austria, <sup>c</sup> whose election he promised to confirm, provided he would deliver Italy from the tyranny of the Viscontis; and this prince detached his brother prince Henry, with two hundred horse, to the assistance of the Guelphs: for by this time John XXII. had published a crusade against the Gibelines. Matthew Visconti, however, who was equally politic and brave, found means, by artful remonstrances, to convince the duke of Austria, that he acted contrary to his own interest in supporting the Guelphs, who were the declared enemies of the empire, against the Gibelines, who had always been its unshaken adherents. To these representations he added some valuable presents; in consequence of which Frederic recalled his brother, on pretence that the Guelphs had refused to put him in possession of Brescia <sup>k</sup>.

HENRY, on his return, joined his brother Frederic, who had made a second irruption <sup>d</sup> into Bavaria, and acquired a considerable booty, with which he might have retired before the arrival of Lewis, who was employed in assembling all the forces he could bring together; but disdaining, perhaps, to make a retreat, which might be construed into the effect of fear, he, though inferior in number, resolved to remain in Bavaria, and cantoned himself between the Iser and the Inn, where he received a reinforcement from the Austrian nobility: but he was not yet joined by his brother Leopold.

LEWIS, whose army amounted to thirty thousand effective men, under the different commands of the king of Bobemia, the burgrave of Nuremberg, and other experienced chiefs, passed the Inn, and encamped near Frederic, in the plain of Vechivis, between Muldorf and Oettingen (C). They engaged upon St. Michael's-day, and fought with great obstinacy, till <sup>e</sup> at last Frederic, having obliged his enemies to give ground, began to congratulate himself upon the victory, when an experienced officer belonging to the Bavarian side, found means to rally the fugitives, and bring them back to the charge with redoubled fury (D); so that their first giving way seemed no other than a feint to disorder the enemy. By this very circumstance Lewis gained the battle. The first prisoner that was brought to him was Frederic's brother, duke Henry, dangerously wounded; then the burgrave of Nuremberg presented to him Frederic himself, who, after having fought with amazing valour, and killed fifty men with his own hand, had surrendered, when he found himself abandoned by all his troops <sup>1</sup>. The duke of Lorrain was likewise taken prisoner on this occasion. Lewis ordered the pursuit to be stopped, and sent Frederic prisoner to the castle of Transnitz, where he <sup>f</sup> remained in confinement for three years <sup>m</sup>.

(C) While they lay fronting each other, Lewis sent an herald to tell Henry, that in three days he would give him battle: an intimation which was so agreeable to the Austrian, that he presented the messenger with a curious sword. On the eve of the battle, he detached an Hungarian captain to reconnoitre the enemy, and bring an account of their numbers; and this officer brought him word, that there was enough to kill, enough to be taken, and enough to run away (1).

(D) The name of this captain was Seyfrid Schwepperman. After the battle, while Lewis and his officers sat at table, the steward told his imperial majesty, that there was nothing for dinner but eggs, and of these but a small number; upon which, Lewis ordered one to be given to each guest, and a couple to Schwepperman; adding, "If I lie in my own camp to-night, it will be intirely owing to Seyfrid (2).

a MEAN while duke Leopold advanced, by long marches, with a body of troops, from Suabia; but hearing of the defeat and captivity of his brothers, he retreated in a great hurry to his own fiefs on the frontiers of Switzerland, and derived sufficient time to intrench himself on the mountains, from an accident that happened to Lewis, who was taken ill, and fell from his horse, while he was in pursuit. Though disabled for the present by this misfortune, he detached Albert Humelion de Lechtenburg, in quality of landvoct of Alsace, many places of which province submitted to the conqueror. Nevertheless, Leopold made shift to continue the war in that country, where many severe skirmishes were fought, with various success. He likewise solicited the pope, and the king of France, to employ their credit for the enlargement of his brothers; but all that he could obtain was the liberty of Henry, who b did not long survive his release. As for the duke of Lorraine, he was, at the desire of Charles the Fair, dismissed, after having taken an oath, importing, that he would never more engage in the cause of the Austrian princes.

LEOPOLD, thus disappointed in the hopes he had conceived from his arms, as well as from his neighbours, attempted to excite a revolt among the Bohemians against their king John, who was his declared enemy. That kingdom was full of malcontents, including not only those who were disgusted at the weakness, sloth, and debauchery of their prince, but also such as adhered to the party of Henry Lipa, a factious insolent minister, who, for his maladministration, had been banished, returned, raised disturbances, and been imprisoned in the fortress of Prague. His partizans, who were both numerous and powerful, had written a letter to the king, demanding his release, and threatening, in case of a refusal, to c destroy the country with fire and sword. Leopold seized the opportunity of marching with his troops to the frontiers, and, in all probability, might have wrested the crown from the legal possessor, who was very ill beloved, and worse obeyed, by his subjects. But the scheme was frustrated by a reinforcement which John received from the archbishops of Triers and Mentz, who headed their troops in person, and effected an accommodation between the king and the discontented nobility. Lipa was set at liberty in consequence of this agreement; yet he seized the first opportunity of John's absence to re-imbroid the state, by means of fomenting a jealousy between the queen dowager and reigning princess; nay, when the king returned to his own dominions, this indefatigable incendiary alienated his affection d from his wife, by possessing him with a notion that she was privately engaged in forming cabals to dethrone her husband, and raise her son to the throne. The king, alarmed at these false insinuations, sent the young prince to be educated in France, at the court of Charles the Fair, and, terrified at the thoughts of a rebellion in Bohemia, resolved to exchange his crown for the palatinate of the Rhine, which was by this time in the hands of the emperor<sup>n</sup>.

For all the princes of the empire, who had favoured the party of Frederic, seeing him totally ruined by this overthrow, reconciled themselves with Lewis, and owned him for legitimate emperor, and those that scrupled to submit voluntarily, were compelled by force. But his chief resentment was expressed against Rodolphus count Palatine, his own brother, e who had favoured the election of Frederic, and afterwards supported his faction. He was driven from his territories, and obliged to retire, with his family, into England, where he died in extreme poverty.

LEWIS, who seized upon his territories, assented to the proposal made by the king of Bohemia, and ordered an act of exchange to be expedited, by which he obliged himself to guarantee the Palatinate to John of Luxemburg, and his heirs. This deed was no sooner known, than it filled all Bohemia with alarm: the estates of the kingdom assembled, and declared the exchange void, and injurious to the nation; nay, so much were they incensed against John, that they resolved to shake off the yoke of the house of Luxemburg, and proceed to the election of a new sovereign. In this dilemma, John had recourse to the emperor, who f repaired to Prague in person, and having ineffectually used all his endeavours to reconcile the states to the exchange, he cancelled the original act; and the Bohemians, pacified by this sacrifice, took a new oath of allegiance to their king, whom they promised to support against all his enemies<sup>o</sup>.

THESE civil commotions being appeased, Lewis convoked a diet at Nuremberg, in order to deliberate upon measures for securing the tranquillity of the empire; and in this assembly, among other wholesome regulations, a statute was enacted against provisors, who, in a clandestine manner, should obtain the reversion of benefices from the church of Rome; a practice which had been shamefully abused by pope John XXII. to whom the noblemen, vested with the right of presentation, had often complained, without having received the least redress. His holiness was extremely chagrined at this new law, which served to augment g the rancour of his hatred against Lewis, tho' he would not venture to complain aloud, because he knew the nobility and clergy were resolved to support the edict<sup>p</sup>.

AFTER the death of Rodolphus, his children were recalled, and their inheritance restored; though Lewis rendered the electoral dignity alternative between his family and theirs, on condition that they should be the first to enjoy it. He likewise, with the consent of the states and princes of the empire, united to his family the marquisate of Brandenburg, vacant by the death of Waldemar II. and John IV. who was the last marquis of Brandenburg of the posterity of Otbo I. count of Anhalt (E).

BESIDES these acquisitions, Lewis, by espousing Margaret, daughter of William, count of Hainault and Holland, attached to the house of Bavaria those two counties, together with Friezland and Zealand, which it preserved during the best part of a century; and he might have likewise made himself master of other rich domains, had he, in imitation of Rodolphus, cultivated the popes, so as to render them propitious to his designs; but he had the misfortune to be ever at variance with the see of Rome, in supporting the rights of his crown, and the canonicity of his election.

appease pope
John XXII. who publishes a bull against him.

HAVING now nothing to apprehend in Germany, he resolved to employ his whole attention in striving to appease pope John XXII. for by this time Galeazo Visconti, who succeeded to the command of the Gibelines at his father's death, had been expelled from Milan by the Guelphs; and the chiefs of the emperor's party at Verona and Mantua had done homage to the pope, and received absolution from the hands of the legate, cardinal Bertrand de Paget. To this prelate, who resided at Placentia, the emperor sent some officers, to desire a cessation of arms might be granted to the Gibelines; but the cardinal treating them with insolence and contempt, they repaired separately to Lucca, Pastora, Mantua, and Verona, where they tampered so successfully with the inhabitants, that all the Gibelines of these cities united under the conduct of count Bertholdi, and marching to Milan, made themselves masters of that city, almost without resistance.

of the bull.

THE pope, incensed at this transaction, resolved to proceed against Lewis without further reserve, and forthwith published a monitory, in which he declared, that the imperial dignity commenced a fief of the holy see that very day on which the empire was by the Romans transferred from the Greeks to the French, in the person of Charlemagne; because at that time it was decreed, that the election of an emperor should never take place until after it should be approved and confirmed by the pope, who was the father and prince of all Christendom. He added, that, when the empire was vacant by death or otherwise, it belonged to the pope alone to provide another, and to take care of the administration during the interregnum; and even while the election remains contested between two competitors, his holiness alone has the sole power to decide the dispute, and to exact the oath of fidelity of the prince, to whom he shall have adjudged the empire, in quality of viceroy or lieutenant of Him, who is emperor of heaven and earth; for as the soul commands and governs, and the body is bound to obey its orders, so those things, which are frail and perishable in Christianity, ought to be subject to those that are celestial and eternal; that the prophane should be subjected to the holy, and the corporeal to the spiritual; a regulation that will take place when the pope, by his own authority, shall dispose of both dignities, when the church shall prevail, and the empire, and all other powers, humble themselves before her, and submit to her laws. He therefore concluded, that as the princes of Germany had been divided ever since the death of Henry VII. and elected two princes, each of them pretending to the crown, he alone had the right to decide the contest, and, in the mean time, to govern the empire; and as Lewis had encroached upon his rights, he commanded him, by virtue of that power which he derived from heaven, to lay aside the imperial dignity, and desist from exercising the functions of an emperor, without pretending to resume them, until he should have obtained the express permission of his holiness; who, in the mean time, laid injunctions upon all patriarchs, bishops, priests, nobles, and commons, to abandon and withdraw their obedience from the usurper<sup>a</sup>.

protests against the bull, which he answers article by article.
A. D. 1324.

THIS bull was no sooner published, than the emperor assembled all the learned men of Germany, both of the clergy and laity, to examine and give their opinions of that performance. They accordingly concluded, that it was unjust, unreasonable, contrary to the Christian religion, and that he ought to call a general council. The emperor followed this and the princes of Anhalt, as branches of the antient house of Brandenburg, remonstrated against this alienation, especially as there was no account of Waldemar's death: but these representations having no effect upon the emperor or the states, they entered a solemn protest against the investiture which was conferred upon young Lewis, and refused to assist at the ceremony (1).

- a advice; and having protested against the bull, which he answered article by article, reproaching the pope himself as a favourer of heresy, since he endeavoured to abolish the sovereign power of princes, which was established by God, he signified his appeal with all the requisite formalities. He sent envoys to Avignon, with this vindication of himself, and to desire his holiness would suspend his censures until he could receive the advice of the princes of the empire: but all the favour he could obtain was a delay of two months, at the expiration of which he issued another monitory, complaining, that Lewis had made no use of this indulgence, and declaring, that he would proceed to publish the sentence of excommunication pronounced against him, if he would not, within the term of three months, resign the title of king of the Romans, and withdraw his protection from the Viscontis, and other enemies of the church.

- b LEWIS was too jealous of the independency of his crown to be swayed by this remonstrance; and the pope's menaces seemed the less terrible, as the Viscontis had just defeated the army of the church, and carried the general prisoner to Milan; an incident, in consequence of which his holiness renewed the censures against that family, and even caused a new crusade to be preached against them, and all their adherents. The emperor therefore, resolving to pay no further regard to the church of Rome, appointed vicars in Italy, and reinforced the Gibelines in such a manner, that they gained several advantages over their enemies; while in Germany he exerted his endeavours to reduce Leopold of Austria, who still refused to acknowledge his authority, or surrender the imperial ornaments, which he kept in the strong castle of Burgaw in Alsace. This fortress was accordingly invested by the imperial troops, who had made some progress in the siege, when Leopold, marching to its relief, defeated the rear of the Bavarians, and compelled them to abandon the enterprize.

He disregards the pope's menaces; supports the Gibelines in Italy.

- c THE three months prescribed by pope John being elapsed, he proceeded to the excommunication of Lewis, which was no sooner known in the empire, than the princes and states assembled at Ratisbon, where the emperor was requested to take care that the imperial dignity should not be trampled upon, nor the Germanic liberty reduced to bondage. There also it was decreed, that the proceedings of the pope should be deemed abusive and void; and that all those who paid the least regard to his bulls, should be punished as perturbators of the public peace, and enemies of the empire.

Besieges Burgaw in Alsace.

- d AT this assembly Lewis, in a distinct apology, justified every part of his own conduct, and produced thirty-six articles, in consequence of which he affirmed, that the pope ought to be deposed; and again appealed to a general council, desiring that it might be convoked, with all convenient speed, in a place of safety" (F).

- e THIS step being taken, he published the holding of tournaments at Frankfort and Nuremberg, where there was a vast concourse of noblemen and knights, a great number of whom he, by his liberality, engaged in his interest, and many private treaties were made, by which they bound themselves to supply him with troops, to frustrate the efforts of the house of Austria. But this expedient proving ineffectual, he had recourse to the princes of the empire, and a confederacy was formed in his favour by the king of Bohemia, the archbishop of Triers, Ferry, duke of Lorraine, and Edward, count de Barr, who engaged to furnish a certain proportion of troops, to be maintained at their own expence; and each prince obliged himself to head his forces in person. In consequence of this treaty, which was concluded at Reenich upon the Moselle, the city of Metz was besieged, and in a little time surrendered upon capitulation, the articles of which were very unfavourable to the inhabitants, who bought their pardon with a very large sum of money.

A. D. 1325. Forms the confederacy of Reenich.

- f AGAINST this powerful association the pope resolved to raise a competitor, that should be able to dispute the empire with Lewis, and actually negotiated with Leopold of Austria, and some other German princes, for electing Charles the Fair king of the Romans. Frederic of Austria promised to resign his pretensions in favour of the French monarch; the king of Bohemia, the electors of Saxony, Cologne, and Mentz, being tampered with, seemed willing to concur in any scheme that would restore peace to the empire; and Leopold, mistaking this favourable disposition for a fixed resolution, desired the pope would give Charles to understand, that it would be necessary for him to have a personal conference with the German princes. Bar sur Aube was the place pitched upon for this interview, and thither did Charles repair with a magnificent equipage;

(F) In order to combat the pope's authority, Lewis employed the pens of Marsilius of Padua, and John of Ghent, two famous doctors, and schismatic Cordeliers, who, in the emperor's name, wrote a number of defamatory libels against John XXII. styling him an unjust persecutor of the innocent, a destroyer of the holy see, a violator of the canons, author of discord, perturbator of the empire, and a prevaricator of the laws, who despised the poverty of Jesus Christ, and his sacraments (3).

but the German princes, who had given no positive promise, would not quit their own dominions; so that Leopold was the only person who waited upon the king of France; and that monarch was so chagrined at the disappointment, that he quitted the pursuit, and left Lewis and the pope to battle each other<sup>1</sup>. Leopold, notwithstanding this miscarriage, would not abandon his enterprize; but assembling all the princes who opposed Lewis at Rens near Coblentz, where the pope's nuncios, and the envoys of France, were present, he proposed, that in order to quiet the troubles of Germany, Charles the Fair should be elected emperor. This proposal was strenuously opposed by Berthold de Bucheck, commander of the Teutonic order, and afterwards bishop of Straßburg; and the French envoys declared their master would never consent to wear a crown which belonged to Lewis of Bavaria<sup>2</sup>. This succession of disappointments obliged Leopold at last to listen to the advice of his friends, who exhorted him to desist from all opposition, and surrender to Lewis the imperial ornaments: he accordingly sent to that prince the lance, sword, and crown of Charlemagne, together with the other ensigns of royalty, in expectation of seeing his brother Frederic released. Lewis received these symbols with great indifference, and still refused to set the duke of Austria at liberty, until he found his conduct was blamed even by his own adherents.

Leopold of Austria sends the imperial ornaments to Lewis, who makes peace with the princes of Austria.

THE archbishop of Mentz, shocked at such violent proceedings, which intailed misery and devastation on the empire, begged the emperor to consider, that Germany had never been so much united within itself, but that the popes, by their intrigues, had found means to disturb its repose; and observed, that the most salutary measure he could take in the present conjuncture, would be to make an accommodation with his enemies, and especially with the princes of Austria. In consequence of this advice, proposals of peace were made to Frederic, who was, by this time, heartily tired of his confinement; and it was agreed between them, that Frederic should be set at liberty, on condition of his renouncing all claim and title to the imperial dignity during the life of Lewis. This treaty being afterwards executed, the two princes met at Mourpach, where they were personally reconciled to each other<sup>3</sup>; and Frederic, as a proof of his sincerity, promised, by an authentic deed, that the princes of the house of Austria should never pretend to the imperial crown, when any prince of Bavaria should be competitor (G).

THERE was no great likelihood, however, that the articles of this accommodation would be inviolably observed; for the pope absolved Frederic from his oath, as an obligation laid upon him by compulsion, while he remained in captivity, and even promised to confirm his election. Frederic himself, and his brother, seemed to consider the treaty in the same light, and waited only for a convenient opportunity of acting openly against the emperor. But, before the necessary preparations could be made, Leopold was seized with a fever, of which he died in Alsace; and with him expired the hopes of Frederic, whose personal activity was destroyed by a malady which he had contracted in prison. Besides, he was greatly embarrassed by the pretensions of his brother Otho, who claimed an equal share of the succession of Leopold; though this dispute was afterwards referred to the decision of John, king of Bohemia<sup>4</sup>.

By this peace Lewis found himself at leisure to mind the affairs of Italy, to which he was resolved to apply himself in earnest, not only with a view of being crowned at Rome, but also to fortify the party of the Gibelines against the pope, and the king of Naples, who, for the relief of Florence, which was besieged by Castruccio in the name of the emperor, had set on foot a considerable army, almost wholly composed of French and Gascons. The Gibelines, far from being discouraged at the fulminations of the pope against Lewis, were rather animated by them to maintain their party against the Guelphs, whose chief and patron was king Robert. Besides, the Romans had driven the creatures of the pope out of the city, and signified to his holiness, that, if he would not come and reside at Rome, they would take care of their own affairs. It was on account of his refusing to satisfy them in this particular, that they pressed the emperor to come and receive the crown at Rome.

(G) This condition, though mentioned by Aventinus, Heiss, and other writers, seems contradictory to the terms of the treaty, the first articles of which import, "That duke Frederic shall renounce his claim to the empire; that he shall deliver up to Lewis the title of his election, if it could be called a title; that, during the life of the emperor Lewis, he should not aspire to the empire; and that, if ever the pope should solicit him to renew his claim, he should not hearken to his solicitations (4)."

a he was met by the chiefs of his party, the deputies of the towns, and the enemies of the pope, who received him as the deliverer whom they had so long and eagerly expected c.

HERE he convoked a diet, at which were present Cau de l'Ascala, Passarini, Visconti, Gui de Tarlata, bishop of Arezzo, deputies from Castruccio, and Frederic, king of Sicily, together with other chiefs of the Gibelines, and a crowd of schismatic Franciscans, with whom Lewis was always surrounded. In this assembly, the emperor took an oath to go to Italy, from whence he would never return until he should have received the imperial crown at Rome; and here he ordered the pope to be excommunicated as an heretic, unworthy of filling the pontifical throne d.

b FROM thence he repaired to Milan with the empress queen, where he was crowned king of Italy by the bishop of Arezzo, as the archbishop of Milan resided in Genoa, and refused to perform the ceremony, on pretence of the emperor's being excommunicated. The arrival of Lewis in Italy put the factions of the Guelphs and Gibelines in great commotion; the Guelphs sent envoy after envoy to press the king of Naples to march to the relief of Tuscany; Rome was divided between the partizans of Lewis and the pope's adherents; and there was a third party that refused to declare themselves for either, until the imperial faction having gained the ascendancy, compelled them to relinquish their neutrality, and side with Lewis. Thus reinforced, they elected Sciarra Colonna captain of the people, and sent ambassadors to Avignon, to summon the pope to come and reside at Rome, otherwise they would receive Lewis of Bavaria as their sovereign. His holiness was solicited to the same effect by the king of Naples, as senator of Rome; but he did not think proper to trust himself in a city where he had such powerful adversaries: he contented himself with exhorting the Romans to preserve their fidelity to their pontiff, and shut their gates against Lewis, whom he represented as an enemy to God and man. At the same time he directed his legate John d'Ursini, who resided at Florence, to publish new bulls against the emperor, and, by his personal presence, to keep the peace at Rome. In obedience to this order, the legate advanced towards that city, in hope of effecting a reconciliation between the Romans and Robert king of Naples, who had lately attempted to introduce his brother the prince of Morea, at the head of a thousand horse, to support the faction of the nobles. As the people shut their gates against this body of troops, the prince ravaged the territory of Viterbo, and some Genoese galleys, in the service of Robert, surprized the port of Ostia; so that the Romans, being extremely incensed against his Neapolitan majesty, would listen to no terms of accommodation. The legate, finding he could make no progress in the way of negotiation, joined the prince of Morea, who, entering the city by surprise, took possession of the church and quarter of St. Peter, and cut in pieces all those who opposed his arms. Next morning, however, the people ran to arms, sounded the alarm, assembled at the Capitol, from whence they marched to the gate possessed by the Neapolitans, which they attacked with such fury, that, after an obstinate and bloody dispute, the prince and legate were obliged to abandon the city in the utmost disorder, and retreat for shelter to Ostia.

c THESE transactions were very favourable to the emperor, who, having quitted Milan, held a diet at the castle of Orzi, in the Brescian; then he advanced into Tuscany, from whence he sent ambassadors to prepare for his reception at Pisa; but the inhabitants of that city refusing to receive him, because he lay under the sentence of excommunication, he besieged the town, which he compelled to surrender at discretion: then he entered in triumph, extorted a very large sum of money from the citizens, and, during his abode in this place, renewed the sentence which the emperor Henry VII. had pronounced against Robert, king of Naples, as a rebellious subject of the empire e. On the other hand, the pope published a new bull of excommunication and privation against Lewis, and forbade all persons, of what quality soever, under the most severe penalties, to furnish him with the means of subsistence. Notwithstanding this prohibition, the emperor began his march from Pisa, along the coast, towards Rome, without meeting with the least opposition from the king of Naples, who, supposing that the intention of Lewis was to invade his kingdom, and act in conjunction with Peter, king of Sicily, retired, in order to defend his own dominions. At Viterbo, the emperor received a deputation from the Romans, with whom he adjusted the articles of his entry, which was performed with great splendor. The governor and senators came forth to meet him and the empress, whom they conducted to the palace of St. Peter, where he staid four days with the princes of his train (H). Then he removed to Santa Maria Major, where Sciarrra Colonna presented him with the keys of the city and fortresses, which he garrisoned with his troops. In a few days, he and the empress were crowned in the church of St. Peter with great magnificence, the ceremony of the unction having been performed by the bishops of Venice and Aleria, who, as well as Lewis, had incurred the sentence of excommunication. In a word, the emperor, by his liberality and courteous behaviour, gained the affection of the Romans to such a degree, that his enemies durst not even avow their animosity or discontent <sup>a</sup>.

THE pope, finding himself disappointed in all the measures he had taken to prevent the coronation of Lewis, concerted other schemes for diminishing his power in Italy: for this purpose, he, by his emissaries, tampered with the governors of Viterbo and Ostia, who had actually agreed to receive Neapolitan garrisons in these places; but Lewis, being timely informed of their designs, sent forces to secure the towns, and apprehend the traitors, who were brought prisoners to Rome. <sup>b</sup>

the pope to such a degree,
that he is re-

THE emperor resided nine months in the capital, during which he set every thing to rights, and restored the repose of Italy, while the pope renewed his bulls of excommunication and deposition against him, refusing to listen to any proposals of accommodation, unless the emperor would divest himself of his sovereign authority, and, as a private person, submit to the sentence he should pronounce upon his election. In a word, he treated him with such indignity, that Lewis lost his patience, and resolved to be revenged upon him, by choosing another pope. In order to pave the way for this measure, he convoked a numerous assembly at Rome, where the pope was degraded, on pretence of his being an heretic, and a deserter of his flock; and all the subjects of the empire were prohibited from owning him as the head of the church. He afterwards published a decree, by which all the bishops, particularly the pope, were forbid to absent themselves from their see longer than three months, or to go farther than two days journey, without the consent of their chapters; and that, after having been recalled three times without returning, they should be no longer owned as bishops, but a new election take place, in the same manner as if they were dead; and, in consequence of the first decree, by which all heretics were made guilty of a capital crime, he pronounced sentence of death upon James of Cahors, so he named pope John XXII. as a person convicted of downright heresy and treason, for having encroached upon the rights of the empire (1), by discarding the emperor's officers, and supplying their places by his own authority <sup>c</sup>.

THESE steps were no more than the preludes of the emperor's vengeance; for afterwards, assembling all the most considerable persons of his own court, as well as of the city of Rome, he set Pietro de Rainaucci, a Cordelier, upon a low chair on his left hand, ordered the assembly to be asked three times, whether or not they would receive this same Father Peter as pope? and being answered in the affirmative, he invested him with the papacy, putting the ring upon his finger, and the cloak upon his shoulders <sup>d</sup>. Then placing him upon his right hand, in the pontifical chair, he saluted him by the name of Nicholas V. took him by the hand, and conducted him to the chair of St. Peter, where this new pope celebrated mass, and bestowed the papal benediction upon the people. Some days after this ceremony, Lewis, in order to give more authority to Nicholas, was crowned again on the feast of Pentecost. <sup>e</sup>

JOHN was no sooner informed of the elevation of Peter, than he excommunicated the antipope, and all those who were present at the ceremony, except the poet Petrarch, whom he revered on account of his genius. Nor was Nicholas less active in returning these hostilities; for he published two bulls, confirming the deposition of John, and declaring, that all his adherents, whether ecclesiastic or lay, should be punished as heretics. a of this bull, two persons actually lost their lives at the stake; and pope John was burnt in effigy.

THE emperor had resolved to recover the rights and dominions of the empire, which Robert, king of Naples and Apulia, had usurped by order of the pope: but having delayed this enterprize until Robert had time to put himself in a posture of defence, he was obliged to postpone the execution of his purpose: for when he marched out of Rome on the expedition, he found Robert strongly fortified in the Campania, and, in his attempt upon the province of Labour, had the mortification to see his troops several times repulled; nay, as the Neapolitans, by being masters of Ostia and Anagni, commanded the whole course of the Tiber, Lewis was so hampered for want of provisions and ammunition, that he could not help returning to Rome, where his presence occasioning a great scarcity, the people began to murmur, and their discontents being fomented by the cardinal d'Ursini, broke out into open rebellion. The emperor, whose troops had been worsted both within and without the city, seeing it would be impossible for him to resist a mutinous populace, as well as the Neapolitan troops, sent his pope immediately to Todi, under a strong escorte, whither he himself afterwards retired; and he had no sooner quitted Rome, than cardinal Ursini entered the city and harangued the people, who now acknowledged John as their lawful pontiff, and renounced the antipope and the emperor with all the marks of detestation and abhorrence.

MEAN while Lewis had an interview with Peter, the son of Frederic king of Sicily, at Corneto, where he bitterly complained, that his Sicilian majesty had been the cause of all his miscarriages, by failing to send the fleet, and a sum of money, which he had engaged himself by treaty to furnish; and Peter, finding him so ill disposed towards a continuance of the war, set sail on his return to his father's dominions, but was overtaken by a violent tempest, which destroyed the greatest part of his fleet.

Lewis retires to Corneto.

FROM hence the emperor repaired to Pisa, whither he was followed by Nicholas, and there he spent some months, during which he re-published his decree against pope John, and received an embassy from the Algerines, who craved his protection, in consideration of which they promised to assist him with fifty vessels well manned, and a very large sum of money. They were graciously received, and Lewis, in all probability, would have availed himself of the proposal, had he not found a more honourable resource in the friendship of the king of Bohemia, who promised to march to his assistance, at the head of a victorious army, with which he had conquered Lithuania for the knights of the Teutonic order. But, before he could execute his intentions in favour of Lewis, that prince, finding himself destitute of troops, and abandoned by the greatest part of his friends in Italy, whom he had disobliged by his violent proceedings, was obliged to retire into Bavaria, in order to re-establish his affairs.

Receives an embassy from the Algerines. A. D. 1329.

His back was no sooner turned, than the Pisans reconciled themselves to the see of Rome; the Romans recalled the cardinal legate, and put themselves under the auspices of pope John; the cities of Todi, Viterbo, and Pistoria, followed the example; the Visconti renounced the emperor's party, and received absolution from the holy see; and the antipope Nicholas, finding it impossible to conceal himself longer at Pisa, submitted to John, who, having received his abjuration of the papacy, absolved him of his crimes, and imprisoned him for life.

Nicholas submits to pope John. A. D. 1330.

HAVING thus far succeeded in detaching almost all Italy from the interest of Lewis, and in making himself master of the person of his competitor, he still continued to press the German princes to a new election; but by this time they were so tired with civil discord, that his remonstrances were altogether disregarded; and even those princes who had opposed Lewis in the beginning, now expressed a desire of seeing him peaceably established on the imperial throne. In order to manifest his own pacific disposition, he sent an embassy to the pope, to sue for a reconciliation with the holy see, in consideration of which he promised to retract every thing he had done, said, or decreed, against his holiness. But all his advances were treated with disdain by John, who, far from granting his request, wrote two letters to the king of Bohemia, exhorting, and even commanding that prince, as a son of the church, to depose Lewis, and proceed to a new election.

Lewis sends an embassy to the pope;

who tampers with the king of Bohemia. A. D. 1331.

THESE remonstrances seem to have had no effect at first upon the Bohemian, who declared for the emperor, and marched into Italy as his lieutenant, at the head of an army, with which he reduced almost all the cities of Lombardy under obedience to the empire.

ELATED with this success, he began to harbour notions very different from those with which he crossed the Alps; and the pope, being well acquainted with his disposition, flattered his ambition so effectually, that, by the means of his legate, Bertrand de Poyet, the king of Bohemia engaged with him in a private treaty against the emperor. The nature of this agreement having transpired, alarmed both Guelphs and Gibelins to such a degree, that they united against the Bohemian; and the emperor, being suspicious of his fidelity, resolved to cut out such work for him at home, as would soon recall him from Italy: for this purpose he excited against him Frederic, marquis of Misnia, Otho, duke of Austria, by this time reconciled to the house of Bavaria, Uladislaus, king of Poland, and Charobert, king of Hungary, who attacked his dominions at the same time, under various pretexts <sup>1</sup>.

He returns to Germany, and defeats all his adversaries.

JOHN of Bohemia, being informed of these transactions, left his son Charles as vicar in Italy, and marching into Germany, defeated all his adversaries one after another. Then repassing the Alps, in order to succour his son against the Guelphs and Gibelines, came up just as the young prince had obtained a complete victory; after which, he carried him in triumph to Prague, where, beginning to be jealous of his son's reputation, he bestowed upon him the marquisate of Moravia, that he might have a pretence for removing him from the capital of Bohemia <sup>m</sup>.

MEAN while the pope employed his artifices so successfully with Otho of Austria, that this prince abandoned the emperor, submitted his dominions to the holy see, and declared himself vassal to the church of Rome. Nevertheless Italy groaned under the utmost misery and desolation; for although the Guelphs and Gibelines joined against the Germans, they still maintained a civil war among themselves with the most implacable resentment, and a number of private noblemen erected themselves into petty tyrants during this period of confusion <sup>n</sup>.

The king of Bohemia marches to the assistance of the Teutonic knights.

WHILE Lombardy suffered such a complication of disorders, John, king of Bohemia, marched to the assistance of the Teutonic knights, who had been worsted by the Poles, and penetrating as far as Cracovia, undertook the siege of that city, which the inhabitants defended with great obstinacy, until they were compelled by famine to demand a capitulation, which was soon succeeded by a treaty of peace, effected under the mediation of the king of Hungary. Otho of Austria, who was now become a partizan of the pope, being joined by the bishop of Constance, took this opportunity to besiege Colmar, which held for Lewis of Bavaria, and actually invested it with an army of thirty thousand men; but it was gallantly defended by the marquis of Baden, until the emperor marched to its relief with a strong body of troops, furnished by the king of Bohemia, who had found means to justify his conduct to Lewis, and by the count of Wirtemberg; so that Otho, losing all hope of succeeding in his enterprize, and perceiving that he himself was no other than a dupe to the see of Rome, resolved to make peace with the emperor, which was ratified accordingly. Now Lewis began to govern the empire in peace, though the public tranquillity was often invaded by feuds and animosities among the noblemen and cities, which produced all the terrible effects of a civil war, until they were restrained by associations like that of Straßburg, Friburg, and Basil, which, about this time, formed a league for their mutual defence <sup>o</sup>.

He is twice defeated near Verona.

A. D. 1333.

NOTWITHSTANDING the success of Lewis in Germany, pope John would not desist from his intrigues; but having confirmed John, king of Bohemia, in his interest, during an interview which he had with this prince at Avignon, he prevailed upon him to march into Italy, in order to support the concerns of the holy see against Robert, king of Naples, who was now become his most inveterate enemy, and the Viscontis and Escoli, who had joined his Neapolitan majesty, because they found their account in fishing in troubled waters.

ACCORDINGLY the Bohemian, being reinforced by a body of French troops, passed the Alps, as the champion of the church, engaged the enemy near Verona, was twice defeated, and returned to Germany, having lost his troops, money, and reputation.

Pope John dies at Avignon.

THE emperor, mean while, remained in peace at Munich, without having any share in these transactions; but as the pope solicited, without ceasing, the German princes to revolt against his administration, and he himself, as well as a number of his friends, lay under the censure of the church, he resolved to assemble a council, in order to stigmatize and depose that restless pontiff, as a tyrant and heretic (K); but he was anticipated by death, which overtook his holiness in the ninetieth year of his age. This turbulent pope left immense treasures, and was succeeded in the papacy by James Dufour, surnamed the White Cardinal, who assumed the name of Benedict XII. <sup>p</sup>.

THIS new pope seemed to tread in the steps of his predecessor, and even confirmed all the bulls which John had issued against the emperor, who did not so much regard these impotent fulminations, as he had affairs of greater importance to engross his attention. John of a Luxemburg, second son of the king of Bohemia, had married Margaret, surnamed Great Mouth, heiress of Carinthia; and this princess accusing her husband of impotence, the marriage was dissolved by the bishop of Frisingen. Thinking herself at full liberty to dispose of her person, she espoused the margrave of Brandenburg, son of the emperor, who readily consented to a match which added Tyrol and Carinthia to his family; and this contract produced a war between the houses of Bavaria and Bohemia, which, after having been maintained for a whole year, with various success, was terminated by a very singular accommodation, in consequence of which young John of Luxemburg renounced all claim to his wife, and ratified her marriage with the margrave.

b THIS war being finished, Lewis exerted all his endeavours to appease the domestic troubles of the empire. The magistrates of Strasbourg finding themselves interrupted in their commerce by the incursions of Walter lord of Schwanau, who distressed them from the castle of Erstein, of which he was in possession, joined in an association with Bâle, Friburg, and all the imperial cities of Alsace, in order to reduce this formidable neighbour. Their first attempt was against Erstein, which they took at the very first assault; then they invested the strong fortress of Schwanau, situated on the bank of the Rhine, and, although Walter defended it with incredible valour for the space of three months, it was at length taken and demolished, but not before Walter had made his escape in the habit of a peasant.

c THE next disturbance was occasioned by Berthold bishop of Strasbourg, who refused to do homage to the emperor, because he was excommunicated, and ravaged the country belonging to the count de Wirtemberg, who was his declared enemy, being joined by a reinforcement of troops sent by the duke of Lorraine and bishop of Metz. He took several castles, and began to form schemes of importance upon some of the imperial towns; so that the emperor was obliged to take the field in person; but, finding Berthold strongly posted, he listened to the first overtures of peace, which was granted almost on the bishop's own terms, because he knew him to be an experienced warrior, and understood that he was on the brink of concluding a peace with the princes of Austria.

d LEWIS being informed of a misunderstanding between Philip of France and Benedict XII. on the subject of the crusade, resolved to seize this opportunity of being reconciled to the holy see, and with that view sent an embassy, with submissive letters, to the pope at Avignon, who received them very graciously, and expressed a desire of terminating the long quarrel which had subsisted between Lewis and the see of Rome. A negotiation was accordingly set on foot, but the pope's favourable intentions were defeated by the remonstrances of the kings of France, Naples, and Bohemia, who protested that, in case Lewis should be absolved from the censures of the church, they would take measures for electing a new king of the Romans.

e MEAN while Philip of France and Edward of England being on the eve of a rupture, these two princes employed all their art and insinuation to acquire partizans in Germany: the English monarch formed a strong alliance among the princes of Germany, at the head of which was the emperor himself, who created Edward vicar of the empire, and trusted so much to the strength of this new league, that he recalled his ambassadors from Avignon, and broke off the negotiation with Benedict: nevertheless, he wrote a letter to the pope, complaining of the king of France, as a violator of treaties, inasmuch as he had seized several fiefs belonging to the empire, in the diocese of Cambray, and solicited his holiness to assist him in making war upon that monarch.

f BENEDICT, instead of complying with this singular desire, exerted all his abilities to produce a rupture between Lewis and Edward, to procure intelligence to Philip de Valois, and to excite a spirit of jealousy in the German princes against the ambitious Englishman; nay, he even detached Henry duke of Bavaria from the interest of Lewis, whom he renounced as an excommunicated heretic.

THE pope's conduct on this occasion was chiefly influenced by his dependence upon Philip, who, in order to counterbalance the alliance of Edward, secured the assistance of the kings of Bohemia and Navarre, as well as of the duke of Lorraine and count of Savoy: and the spirit of pope John still reigned in the factions he had fomented against the emperor. John king of Bohemia, elated with the hope of the imperial crown's devolving to his son Charles of Luxemburg, in consequence of the assurances which he received from France and Rome, had fortified himself with the alliance of the kings of Hungary and Poland, and raised a powerful army in order to carry the war into the bowels of Bavaria; but the emperor assembling his troops, harassed him in such a manner, and pursued him so closely, that he was obliged to hazard a battle, in which, after an obstinate and bloody dispute, he and his auxiliaries were totally routed. This defeat neither quelled his courage nor diminished his

The estates defend the rights of the empire against the pretensions of the pope.

Berthold bishop of Strasburg at length does homage to the emperor.

LEWIS, notwithstanding all the repulses he had sustained, still endeavoured, with all his might, to retrieve the affection of the holy see, in the person of Benedict, who rejected his advances, for fear of disobliging the king of France. The princes of the empire, ecclesiastic as well as secular, assembling at Spire, declared the empire independent of the pope, and Lewis of Bavaria lawful emperor: then they sent deputies to Benedict, desiring he would annul the sentences of his predecessor, otherwise they would proceed against him in another manner: and the pope refusing to give them satisfaction, a diet was convoked at Frankfort, wherein that famous constitution was made in form of a law, by which the independence of the empire was for ever established* (L).

LEWIS next year, by his own authority, took off the interdiction which had been laid against him by pope John XXII. and expelled from their churches all those who refused to submit to his order. Copies of the manifesto published by Lewis in his own vindication, containing the steps which had been taken in the diet, were sent to Benedict by Berthold bishop of Strasburg, who represented his own inability to cope with the emperor, and desired the pope would allow him to do homage to that prince, otherwise he should be destroyed. This permission was granted by Benedict, who now began to perceive that he had carried his resentment too far, and Berthold went to Spire, to do homage to the emperor, who invested him with the temporalities of his diocese†. To this condescension the bishop was in a great measure determined by the remonstrances of Albert, surnamed The Deformed, duke of Austria, who wished to see the troubles of Alsace appeased, that he might have a fairer opportunity of acting against the Swiss, whom he had resolved to subdue.

He accordingly assembled all his forces and those of his allies, composing an army of forty thousand men, with whom he passed the Rhine at Schaffhausen, and advanced as far as Kybourg, where his van-guard was defeated by the enemy. Notwithstanding this check, he continued his route as far as the canal of Zurich, where he received the news of fresh disturbances in Alsace, which obliged him to abandon his enterprize, in order to succour the towns of his own dominions.

The Jews massacred in Alsace.

They are protected by the bishop of Strasburg

THESE disorders were occasioned by a spirit of fanaticism, in consequence of which the lower class of people assembled under the banners of an inn-keeper, distinguished by the appellation of Armleder, who erected himself into a prophet, and persuaded his followers, that, in order to revenge the death of Christ, it was their indispensable duty to extirpate the Jews. In obedience to this doctrine, which was first broached in Franconia, they assassinated great multitudes of that unhappy nation, and the carnage, which extended to Alsace, was so dreadful, that the Jews themselves, driven to despair, augmented the horror of the scene; for, rather than fall into the hands of such inhuman enemies, they made away with themselves, after having murdered their own wives and children, and concealed their riches, which they justly supposed had contributed to their disaster. The deplorable condition of these miserable wretches excited the compassion of Berthold bishop of Strasburg, who being moreover affected with the desolation of his own country, laid waste by that frantic herd of enthusiasts, formed an association with some other noblemen of Alsace, and assembling a body of troops, expelled them from that province. The Jews that remained were permitted to live in peace; and Armleder being taken, was executed as a sower of sedition, and an enemy to the public tranquillity‡.

A. D. 1339: The emperor becomes jealous of the English monarch.

THIS commotion having subsided, the troops of the empire and princes of Germany marched to Mechlin, where they joined the English, commanded by king Edward, who invested the city of Cambray, which was so valiantly defended by the French, that, on the approach of winter, he abandoned the enterprize. He afterwards ravaged Picardy, and offered battle to the king of France, which being declined, he retired into Brabant, and the greatest part of his German allies returned to their own dominions. Indeed, by this time, Lewis began to repent of having conferred the vicariate of the empire upon such a powerful prince, and of having engaged with an ally who drained Germany of her best troops, so that she could not spare a sufficient number to maintain the interest of the empire in Italy, where almost all the cities had made their submissions to the pope. When the princes returned

(L) All the electors, except the king of Bohemia, who was attached to Philip, assembling at Constance, in the territory of Mentz, declared, by a solemn protestation, that he who was elected king of the Romans by a majority of the princes electors, needed not the approbation, confirmation, or consent, of the holy see, to assume the title of king, administer the laws, and govern the estates of the empire (S).

- a from the Low Countries, the emperor assembled a diet, and having represented the posture of affairs in Lombardy, demanded such supplies of men and money, as would enable him to cross the Alps, and punish the revolted towns. But this expedition being found impracticable at the present juncture, when Germany was in a great measure drained of all her funds, he was fain to refer it to a more favourable opportunity. Mean while he was, by the emissaries and intrigues of the French king, so irritated against the king of England, who had neglected to pay the subsidies, and made a truce at Tournay, without his participation, that he abandoned the cause of that monarch, and deprived him of the vicariate, notwithstanding all the protestations and condescension of Edward, who tried every method he could devise to deprecate his anger. Deprives him of the vicariate. A. D. 1340.
- b LEWIS the more readily entered into the views of Philip, as he was flattered with assurances of being reconciled to the pope, by the mediation of that monarch, who accordingly wrote to the pope in favour of the Bavarian; but, in all probability, he was not sincere in his remonstrances, inasmuch as Benedict paid no manner of regard to his interposition. On the contrary, he amused the emperor with evasive excuses, while he disposed of the governments and signories of Italy, as administrator of the empire, which he deemed vacant. About this period, the restless king of Bohemia lost his eye-sight, and made his will, by which he bequeathed Bohemia and Silesia to his son Charles, afterwards emperor, Moravia to John, and Luxemburg, with the lands he had in France in right of his wife, to Winceslaus, born of Beatrice of Bourbon; though this last precaution was useless, for that province was seized by Charles the eldest son, while Winceslaus was yet in his infancy. John king of Bohemia makes his will.
- c IN the course of this same year Lewis was chosen arbiter to decide the quarrels of the house of Denmark. Gerhard count of Rendsburg and Waldemar duke of Sleswic had usurped the crown, which of right belonged to young Waldemar, educated at the court of Munich. But the administration of those usurpers was so odious to the Danish nation, that a general revolt ensued, and count Gerhard was assassinated by Nicholas Jacobi, a nobleman of that country, who chose this method of vindicating the liberty of his nation: then putting himself at the head of the Danish revolvers, he gave battle to the princes of Holstein, and, tho' he lost his life in the engagement, they were entirely defeated, and the lawful heir ascended the throne of his ancestors. The emperor decides the differences which had arisen about the crown of Denmark. A. D. 1341.
- d THIS young prince had been maintained and protected by the emperor, who now called an assembly at Speindow, where an accommodation between the new king and the princes of Holstein was effected, on condition that he should renounce all pretensions to the throne, give his sister in marriage to Waldemar III. and remain in quiet possession of Jutland.
- e ALL these contests being ended, Germany began to enjoy the peace with which she was so seldom blessed, and Lewis took this opportunity to establish wholesome regulations for the continuance of public tranquility. He caused the laws to be regularly executed against vagabonds and criminals of all kinds; he granted his protection to the innocent and industrious, and rewarded merit to the utmost of his power. His mild and prudent administration not only conciliated the affections of his people in general, but also conquered the animosity and prejudices of almost all the princes who had been his enemies; so that they now fought and cultivated his friendship. His court became numerous, gay, and polite; and, in order to render himself more popular, he instituted magnificent tournaments at Munich, after they had been four hundred years discontinued by the princes of Germany. Gives magnificent tournaments at Munich.
- f WHILE the emperor in this manner established his authority on this side of the Alps, his own interest in Italy was almost totally ruined. Pope Benedict dying at Avignon, he was succeeded by Clement VI. a native of France, and archbishop of Rouen, who confirmed by new bulls all the sentences of excommunication pronounced by John XXII. and Benedict XII. and endeavoured to excite all Italy to rebel against the emperor. Lewis, who may be said to have been a martyr to the independency of the empire, as Henry V. had been to the investitures, in order to manifest his own innocence, made advances to the pope, and, even in the midst of these acts of enmity, sent an embassy to him to treat of a reconciliation; but his holiness prescribed such unreasonable conditions, as the ambassadors had not power to accept; upon which they desired he would give them his demands in writing, that they might, upon their return to Germany, lay them before the emperor (M). Lewis having obtained *A. tained these articles, sent copies of them to all the states of the empire, and such a general indignation prevailed against the presumption of the pope, that the princes and states assembling at Frankfort, the articles were openly read, and rejected as an insult upon the honour of the empire, and a second embassy was appointed to wait upon Clement, and desire he would retract them; otherwise, the states would of themselves take such measures on that subject, as they should judge convenient. The pope, more than ever incensed at this instance of disregard, fulminated new excommunications (N) against Lewis and all his adherents; and, being instigated by Philip of Valois king of France, who, though he had made peace with the emperor, wished to see him employed at home, he set on foot and managed underhand intrigues and negotiations, in order to raise a faction among the princes, and induce them to proceed to the election of a new emperor<sup>c</sup>.

As all these steps were taken in favour of Charles of Luxemburg, son of John king of Bohemia, who was one of the most considerable members of the electoral college, and as he had already made sure of Baldwin of Luxemburg, archbishop of Triers, the king's uncle, their chief aim was to secure the other suffrages. The pope had already excommunicated Henry of Verneburg, archbishop of Mentz, because he was in the emperor's interest, and promoted to that see count Gorlack of Nassau, who was devoted to his service. The vote of Walderan of Juliers, archbishop of Cologne, was purchased with eight thousand marks of silver, and that of Rodolphus duke of Saxony for two thousand. These princes assembling at Rientz near Coblentz, elected Charles of Luxemburg king of the Romans, and, as the city of Cologne would own no other emperor but Lewis of Bavaria, he was crowned at Bonn by the new archbishop Gorlack, his election having been confirmed by the pope<sup>f</sup> (O).

THE other princes and states of the empire preserved their fidelity and attachment to Lewis, notwithstanding this schism, which served only to unite them more firmly in his interest; and, some time after this event, his son Lewis, marquis of Brandenburg, attacked and defeated the new king of the Romans in the Tyrol; so that the emperor maintained his dignity and good fortune to the last; and reigned with the love, esteem, and applause of his subjects.

PERHAPS this opposition might have been much more dangerous to Lewis, had not part of the pope's attention been employed on the affairs of Naples, which was conquered by Lewis king of Hungary, in revenge for the death of his brother Andrew, who had married Jane heiress of Naples, and been assassinated by her domestics: and at the same time Clement was greatly perplexed by a very extraordinary revolution in Rome, effected by an obscure notary called Nicholas Rienzi, who being elected tribune of the people, renounced the pope's authority, and restored the form of the antient republic, which, however, did not long subsist.

THE emperor's predecessors were used to move from one imperial city to another, that their courts might subsist at the expence of the inhabitants; whereas Lewis never oppressed his people in this manner; but, except when he was obliged to be present at the diet, staid at home in his own duchy of Bavaria, and generally amused himself at the chace, a diversion which at length cost him his life<sup>g</sup>: for while he one day exercised himself in hunting the bear, he was attacked, it is said, by a fit of the apoplexy, when falling from his horse, he immediately expired, after having recommended his soul to God, and his body was interred at Munich<sup>h</sup> (P).

William of Ockham was an Englishman, who wrote a book against Charles and Clement, whom he treats with great scurrility.

(N) In a bull published against Lewis, we read the following imprecation: "May the wrath of God, of St. Peter and St. Paul, crush him in this world and that which is to come. May the earth open and swallow him alive; may his memory perish, and all the elements be his enemies: and may his children fall into the hands of his adversaries, even in the sight of their father (10)."

(O) Charles of Luxemburg, who went to Avignon with his father, to solicit the pope's interest, engaged to annul all the decrees of Lewis, to acknowledge that the county of Avignon belonged to the holy see, as well as Ferrara and the lands of Matilda, with the kingdoms of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corfica; and promised that, if he should go as emperor to receive the crown at Rome, he would quit the city that same day, and never return without the express permission of his holiness (11).

(P) He is said to have been poisoned by the widow of Albert of Austria; and prescribed some violent exercise by his physicians, after they had, without success, tried other methods of cure. In consequence of this advice, he had rode out to hunt the bear, when the operation of the poison became so violent that he dropped dead from his horse (12).

a was sandy, his complexion florid, his nose was long, and his chin lengthened. He perfectly well understood the exercise of arms: he feared no danger; but was hasty, and too much addicted to love: in adversity he needed advice; he was master of himself in prosperity: he was gay, and polished in his manners; but there was rather too much vivacity in his behaviour, and he could not stay long in one place. The monks and nuns gave him the appellation of most Christian and most Pious, and expressed great veneration for his knives, napkins, and other things of that sort that belonged to him. For a long time he had no other possession than Highbavaria, till after the death of John, duke of Low Bavaria, he succeeded to his dominions<sup>1</sup> (Q).

c CHARLES IV. count of Luxemburg, son of John, king of Bohemia, and grandson of Charles IV. Henry VII. was born at Prague, and named Wenceslaus; but being sent by his father into France, to Charles the Fair, who had married Mary of Luxemburg, his aunt, they caressed him with great affection; and, as they had no children, gave him the name of Charles when he received the sacrament of confirmation. At the same time, they provided him excellent preceptors, under whom, exclusive of the German and Bohemian languages, which were natural to him, he made himself master of the Latin, French, and Italian. After the death of Charles the Fair, he returned to his father, whom he attended to Italy, where he was created viceroy of the empire, and ran the risque of being poisoned by Azon, viscount of Milan. At the age of seventeen, he was invested with the marquissate of Moravia by king John, his father. He repaired the castle of Prague, re-united to the crown of Bohemia a great many lands which the barons had usurped, and settled the affairs of that kingdom, which were in great disorder. He likewise had signalized himself in some military expeditions: he marched against Bucer, duke of Munsterberg, who refused to do homage to the king his father, and compelled him to submit: he went to war with the count of Goritz, who had sided with the dukes of Austria: he accompanied his father in an irruption into Lithuania: he made a second journey into Italy, where he obliged the Venetians to raise the siege of Parma, took from d them the city of Belluna, and then concluded a peace with that republic: he erected into an archbishop's see the bishopric of Prague, which had been suffragan to Mentz, and empowered the archbishop to perform the office of coronation to the kings of Bohemia. In a word, he acquired a good deal of reputation by his wise government; so that, upon the death of his father (R), he was, with the unanimous consent of the people, raised to the Bohemian throne<sup>k</sup>. The first step he took after this elevation, was to make new preparations for war against the emperor Lewis; and having raised a powerful army, he set out for Bavaria, in order to obey the dictates of revenge; but, in the middle of his march, receiving the news of that emperor's death, "Praised be God, said he, in the wonders of his providence, for having spared me the effusion of Christian blood, and deprived me of the e " opportunity of being avenged upon my enemies!" Then, changing his route, he advanced into the heart of the empire, and was acknowledged as king and emperor of the Romans by Ratisbon, Nuremberg, and four-and-twenty other imperial cities of the Rhine (S).

(Q) Lewis first married the daughter of a count, whose name is not known; and she died without issue. His second wife was Beatrix, daughter of Henry duke of Glogaw, by whom he had Lewis, marquis of Brandenburg; Stephen, who was deformed; Beatrix, married to Charles, king of Hungary; Anne, wife of Mustine Lescalle, lord of Verona; and Mathilda, who espoused Frederic the Severe, marquis of Misnia. The emperor's third wife was Margaret, daughter of William III. count of Holland, by whom he had William, Albert, Otho, and Lewis; Elizabeth, first married to John, duke of Low Bavaria, and afterwards to Ulric, count of Wirtemberg; Agnes a nun; and Anne, wife of Gunther de Schwartzburg, who disputed the empire with Charles IV. king of Bohemia.

Lewis of Bavaria was the first emperor who had a double eagle engraved upon his seal. In his reign the count palatine founded the university of Heidelberg; and there was such abundance of wine upon the Rhine and the Moselle, that it was used to slake lime. The people then contrived those huge tuns, one of which is still to be seen at Heidelberg (1).

(R) This was the blind king of Bohemia, who was slain in the battle of Cressy by the English, and whose motto, Ich dien, was adopted by the prince of Wales (2).

(S) Though he was acknowledged by the magistrates of Nuremberg, the citizens took arms, obliged him to fly, and declared for Lewis of Brandenburg, to whom they opened their gates. He was also affronted in divers other places: at Worms he was arrested by a butcher, who had furnished him with meat: at Rottenburg on the Neckar he presented himself in a tournament, under the name of Schilbard of Rechberg, where he was unhorsed by one de la Pieve, to whom he was obliged to pay the forfeit (3).

Thus

Several competitors set up in opposition to him.

Thus established, he returned to his kingdom of Bohemia, and next year began to build the new city of Prague. He had no sooner retired to his own dominions, than Henry, archbishop of Mentz, Robert, count palatine, Lewis, marquis of Brandenburg, and Erich, duke of Saxony, who had not assisted at the election, assembled at Loeſtein, and chose Edward, king of England, emperor; but that prince declining the dignity with suitable acknowledgements to the electors, they proceeded to the nomination of Frederic, landgrave of Thuringia, who, being afflicted with the gout, renounced his pretensions in favour of Charles for ten thousand marks of silver<sup>m</sup>. The same electors, notwithstanding this repulse, chose in his room Gunther, count of Schartzenberg, a nobleman of great courage, and unquestionable merit, who accepted the honour, on condition that the electors should conduct him to Frankfort, and publicly proclaim him emperor in that city. This condition he stipulated, because the magistrates and citizens of Frankfort pretended to have a right of refusing entrance to any king of the Romans, or emperor, who had not been unanimously elected, until he should have overcome his competitor, or at least tarried six weeks and three days before the city, without being questioned by his rival. The electors promised to comply with Gunther's demand, and actually assisted him in raising an army sufficient to compel the city to open its gates, in case of a refusal. Accordingly, being denied admission, he undertook the siege of it, which having lasted two months, the citizens were obliged to open their gates, because Charles had not marched to their relief. During his residence in this city, he fell sick, in consequence of his having taken a medicine which his physician had poisoned (T); and, during his illness, he was so powerfully solicited by the emperor Charles to quit his pretensions to the empire, that at length he resigned in his favour, for the consideration of two-and-twenty thousand marks of silver; and dying in a month after, was honourably interred by his competitor<sup>n</sup>.

A. D. 1349.

GUNTHER, in all probability, would have rejected such a scandalous composition, had he not felt his faculties and health greatly impaired by the poison he had received, and found himself abandoned by his best friends, whom Charles had found means to gain over to his interest by slight presents, and magnificent promises. Among these was Lewis, marquis of Brandenburg, who persuaded Gunther to resign the imperial crown, and was for this good office invested by the Bohemian with the marquisate of Brandenburg<sup>o</sup>.

Charles chastises the city of Frankfort.

CHARLES, however, was resolved to chastise the city of Frankfort for having received Gunther; and, without having any regard to their pretended right, he deprived them of their privileges and fair, which he transferred to Mentz. Nevertheless, he afterwards restored these privileges, but taxed the city in the sum of twenty thousand marks of silver. Being thus rid of all his competitors, he, by his address, prevailed upon those electors who had opposed him to confirm his election, and with his empress, who was daughter of the count palatine, received the crown at Aix-la-Chapelle from the hands of the archbishop of Cologne. During this ceremony, a quarrel arose between the marquesses of Juliers and Brandenburg, about bearing the sceptre; and Charles himself interposing, decided the dispute in favour of the marquis of Brandenburg, after having taken the advice of the princes<sup>p</sup>.

Is crowned.

CHARLES, being universally acknowledged, began to employ his mediation towards reconciling the partizans of Lewis with the holy see, and the re-establishment of peace in the empire, when all at once this happy prospect was destroyed by an insurrection against the Jews, whom the people considered as the authors of a dreadful plague, that ravaged the coasts of the Mediterranean, and diffused its contagion thro' Savoy, Switzerland, Alsace, Suabia, Franconia, and some other provinces of the empire.

A dreadful plague attributed to the practices of the Jews;

THE miserable Jews, detested on the score of religion, had lived under the immediate protection of the emperors ever since their first settlement in Germany; and as many of them had acquired large fortunes by usury, they became the objects of envy as well as of abhorrence; so that it was in the power of any enthusiast or artful schemer to expose their nation to the fury of the populace, according to the dictates of avarice or superstition. At this juncture they were said to have poisoned the wells and fountains; and this extravagant notion prevailed to such a degree, that the Jews were put to the torture in Bonn, and several other cities; and, tho' they still refused to own the imputed crime, a great number of those

(T) The physician's name was Fredank, supposed to be bribed by Charles. When he presented the medicine, he was desired by one present to take it before the emperor. Gunther, perceiving him hesitate, ordered him to swallow part of it, and he obeyed; upon which the count took the remainder: but observing the physician's countenance changed, he suspected the treachery, and endeavoured by vomits to expel the poison, which therefore had not an immediate effect. As for Fredank, he died in three days (1).

a unfortunate wretches were poniarded, burnt, and drowned, by the incensed populace; nor was it in the power of the civil magistrates to prevent such cruel sacrifices. At Strasburg, the common people, under the conduct of a butcher, deposed the magistracy, and investing their chief with absolute power, he ordered two thousand Jews to be burnt alive, confiscated their effects, and decreed, that no individuals of that nation should be admitted into Strasburg for the term of one hundred years. who are massacred at Bonn, and divers other places in Germany.

Tho' the populace were the perpetrators of this inhuman tragedy, they were instigated and abetted by the bishop and several other noblemen, who owed considerable sums to the Jews, and took this method of discharging their debts; nor would they listen to any pacific terms, until the emperor promised, in behalf of the sufferers, that the sums due to them should never be demanded (U).

CHARLES, finding his finances exhausted by those largesses, in consequence of which he ascended the imperial throne, and being moreover importuned by some of the princes to perform the promises he had made to them before his election, endeavoured to raise subsidies, by imposing new taxes and tolls upon rivers, which had well nigh involved the whole empire in confusion; for the magistrates of Strasburg not only refused to pay these impositions, but even blocked up the Rhine with stakes and chains, so as intirely to obstruct the navigation. A. D. 1350. Charles imposes new tolls upon the Rhine;

THIS project miscarrying, the emperor had recourse to another expedient: he mortgaged the domains of the empire to divers noblemen and cities, and allowed others to redeem those that were already mortgaged; by which means he raised a considerable sum of money. Haguenau purchased, at a very high rate, an exemption from being comprehended in the number of those towns which the noblemen united to their domains. It was confirmed in all the privileges conferred upon it by Richard king of the Romans, and particularly in that of its being unalienable from the domains of the empire. The same prerogative was afterwards bestowed upon all the towns of the prefecture of Alsace; but they could never obtain an independency of the jurisdiction of the grand bailie, nor of the princes whom the emperor had invested with that dignity. The imperial towns of Alsace, indeed, employed all their endeavours to free themselves from the authority of the princes, which, they apprehended, would in time degenerate into oppression; and they made strong remonstrances on the subject to Charles, who, without paying the least regard to their claims, mortgaged the prefecture of the province to Robert, count palatine of the Rhine, for fifty thousand florins; and the towns were, after some restitution, obliged to submit. and establishes the jurisdiction of the grand bailie in Alsace.

IN the midst of these transactions, the enemies of Lewis of Bavaria, marquis of Brandenburg, renewed the old imposture of the pretended Waldemar in the person of one Muller-Meinckez, who confidently asserted, that he was the real margrave returned from Palestine, and insisted upon being repossessed of his dominions, which, he said, were usurped by Lewis of Bavaria. As he resembled the late margrave, and mimicked his deportment, in consequence of having been his groom, the common people espoused his cause, which was likewise supported by the dukes of Saxony, and the princes of Anhalt and Mecklenburg, enemies to Lewis of Bavaria. The imposture of the pretended Waldemar is revived, and occasions great disturbances in the north.

THE king of Denmark, incensed at the countenance they gave this impostor against his friend and brother-in-law Lewis, equipped a considerable fleet, and made a descent upon the territories of Mecklenburg, which he ravaged with fire and sword: then he undertook the siege of Berlin, tho' he had not time to finish that enterprize; for the duke, who had already defeated Lewis, surnamed the Roman, brother of the margrave, appeared at the head of a strong army, and a battle must have ensued, had not the ministers of both princes advised an accommodation, which was effected under the arbitration of the king of Sweden, who

(U) During this plague, the sect of Flagellants revived; and this taste for self-discipline became so general, that crowds of people of all ranks, sexes, and condition, abandoned themselves to this cruel superstition. Two hundred of these disciplinants from Suabia, crossing the Rhine, repaired to Spire, and assembling before the cathedral, stripped off their cloaths, and whipped themselves with scourges pointed with iron. The extremities of the weather could not stop their career: they would not speak to any woman: they lay upon the hard ground, and admitted none into their association but such as had wherewithal to maintain themselves during the term prescribed for their penance: they walked by twos and threes in procession, with their eyes fixed upon the earth, crosses on their cloaths and hats, and a rich standard carried before them: their number acquired the addition of one hundred at Spire, and increased considerably at Strasburg: in short, this confraternity was augmented to some thousands, and became so formidable, that the pope fulminated bulls, the emperor issued edicts against them, and the princes refused to admit them into their dominions; by which precautions, all bad consequences were prevented, and the society in a little time dispersed (1).

decreed, that Lewis the Roman should ransom his people who were taken prisoners, and absolve from their oath of allegiance those towns of Mecklenburg antiently included in Wandalia; and that he should marry the daughter of the duke of Mecklenburg, who, on his part, should abandon the pretended Waldemar.

Sprenberg.

CHARLES, who had likewise protected this pretender, and even issued a decree in his favour, thought proper to renounce him publicly in a diet held at Sprenberg; and Lewis, surnamed the Roman, being declared lawful possessor of the estates of Brandenburg, this counterfeit competitor disappeared.

Charles sends succours to the
ager;

AFTER the assembly at Sprenberg, in which Eric, duke of Saxony, ceded to the king of Denmark a certain tribute, called Stuergelde, paid by the regency of Lubec, which had been mortgaged to the Saxons, Charles returned to Prague, which was the place of his residence. Here he had established a famous university, while yet no more than king of Bohemia, and set proper persons at work to form a code of laws to regulate the police of his kingdom. From hence he detached a body of troops to the Low Countries to the assistance of the empress-dowager, heiress of those dominions, and at war with her own son William, who endeavoured to deprive her of one-half of her possessions. She was a princess of a masculine spirit, and with the succours she received from England and Bohemia, took the field against this undutiful child, whom she defeated in a pitched battle, and compelled to retire into Holland, of which he was count. But he soon re-appeared, at the head of a more formidable army, assembled from Cleves, Guelderland, and the neighbouring provinces, and in his turn obtained a complete victory over his mother, who was obliged to fly for refuge into England. An accommodation was afterwards effected by the mediation of the English monarch, on condition that the empress should rest contented with the possession of Hainault, and William remain master of Holland, Zealand, and Friezland.

BUT the emperor did not interest himself so much in this contention, as in the deplorable condition of Italy, where an infinite number of petty tyrants, declaring themselves independent of the empire, as well as of the holy see, committed every species of outrage upon those who were unable to resist their power. The chief of these oppressors was John Visconti, archbishop of Milan. He made himself master of the city of Bologna, in direct contradiction to the remonstrances of the pope, who for that reason thundered out a bull of excommunication against him and his three nephews, Galeazo, Bernabo, and Matthew, the sons of Stephen Visconti.

NOTWITHSTANDING these anathemas, the archbishop, under the specious pretext of defending the liberty of the people against the encroachments of the Florentines, began to make preparations for enterprizes of greater moment: in order to oppose this formidable prelate, a league was formed between the republics of Florence, Pisa, and some other states; and Charles sent letters to the pope, in which he promised to cross the Alps, and chastise that rebellious son of the church.

THE archbishop, apprized of his intention, was alarmed at the prospect, and forthwith made strong advances towards an accommodation with the pope, who being himself jealous of the imperial power, and very unwilling to see Charles in the midst of Italy, gave ear to his solicitations, which were backed with a large sum of money, and granted him the investiture of Milan and Bologna, after having absolved him from the censure of the church.

A. D. 1352.

The dukes of Austria form a league
against it.

THIS reconciliation did not divert the emperor from his purpose of crossing the Alps, though his march was delayed for some time by the domestic troubles of Germany. The inhabitants of Zurich, thinking themselves aggrieved by the mal-administration of justice, expelled their magistrates, who interested the count de Hapsburg in their behalf, and even prevailed upon him to undertake the surprisal of the city. He accordingly, with some accomplices, entered the town in disguise; but being discovered, he was taken prisoner and loaded with chains; and the people, running to arms, ravaged his lands, and took possession of his castle of Raperswille. These proceedings alarmed the dukes of Austria, whose possessions lay contiguous to those of the count: they therefore espoused the quarrel, and formed a league with Strasburg, Basil, Colmar, Scelestadt, and Friburg, in order to curb the insolence of Zurich. This town, seeing the storm ready to burst upon its head, fortified itself with the alliance of Sultz, Uri, Undewald, and Lucerne, which last, though belonging to the house of Austria, resolved to take this opportunity of establishing its own independency.

ALBERT of Austria, surnamed the Sage, having made suitable preparations for the war, demanded the enlargement of the count de Hapsburg, which being refused by the inhabitants of Zurich, he took the field, fully resolved to besiege the city; but several noblemen, foreseeing the miseries of a civil war, interposed their good offices, and arbitrators were a chosen to decide the difference, which was compromised, on condition that the count de Hapsburg should be set at liberty, and all the places restored, which had been taken from the house of Austria. The difference is accommodated;

THIS peace, however, was not of long duration. The town of Zug, having enjoyed a transient taste of the sweets of liberty, allied itself more strictly than ever to the confederated Swiss. Albert complaining to the emperor of this association, as a direct infraction of the last treaty, and a dangerous example in the empire, Charles interested himself in the dispute; and, repairing to Constance, appointed proper persons to treat with the Swiss, and endeavour to terminate the affair in an amicable manner: but the confederates persisting in their refusal to submit to the house of Austria, all that he could obtain was a suspension of arms, until a more solid accommodation could be effected: in the mean time he made a progress through Alsace, where he established several wholesome regulations for the maintenance of the public tranquillity. but breaks out afresh.

b HAVING performed this visitation, he returned to Strasburg, where, being importuned by duke Albert to take vengeance on the rebellious Swiss, he levied an army, and advanced against the enemy, whom he found already ranged in order of battle; but a dispute arising between the duke of Austria and the bishop of Constance about leading the van, the spirit of the officers was exhausted in vain altercation; and the emperor, judging it improper to begin the attack while his commanders were so divided among themselves, retired at leisure from the neighbourhood of Zurich, while Albert remained to form the blockade of that city. Charles takes the field in person against the Swiss, A. D. 1353:

c ON his return from this expedition he was made acquainted with the death of pope Clement VI. and the succession of Innocent VI. to whom he sent letters of congratulation, which were answered by the new pontiff in very gracious terms; but he could not yet execute his design of going to Italy, because he was detained by fresh commotions in Germany. He was obliged to go and suppress a popular insurrection at Nuremberg; and to decide a competition between two pretenders to the archbishopric of Mentz, one of whom had been deposed, and the other substituted in his room, by pope Clement VI. He confirmed the ancient privileges of the church of Triers, incorporated Lusace with the kingdom of Bohemia, renewed the peace with the house of Bavaria, and received from Lewis the imperial ensigns, which before this period he would not surrender. Then he made a circuit through the provinces to establish peace, and conciliate the affections of the people: he made a public entry into Mentz as king of Bohemia; for the magistrates would not receive him in quality of king of the Romans, because he had not yet received the imperial crown. During his stay in this city, he erected the counties of Luxemburg and of Bar into duchies, in favour of his brother Winceslaus, and his cousin Robert de Bar, whose lordship of Pont-à-mousson was likewise raised into a marquisate and principality of the empire. A. D. 1354.

d HAVING regulated the affairs of Germany, and appointed his father-in-law, Robert count palatine, vicar of the empire, he resolved to cross the Alps, according to an agreement which he had made with pope Innocent VI. By the beginning of January he had arrived at Milan, where he was crowned king of Lombardy on the day of Epiphany. From thence he repaired to Pisa, where he tarried some time, in order to compose the divisions of Tuscany, and to receive homage from the cities of that province; then he visited Sienna, from whence he rode post to Rome, which he entered in disguise with some of his nobles on Holy Week, during which he visited the principal churches of the city; but on the day of the resurrection, which was the fifth of April, he made a solemn procession from his camp into the city, where he was joyfully received by the pope's legate, senators, clergy, and people of Rome, and on Easter-day crowned with the empress's, who had followed him from Germany for that purpose. Sets out for Italy; receives the iron crown at Milan; A. D. 1355.

e THIS ceremony was no sooner performed than he quitted the city of Rome, in consequence of the agreement he had made with the pope, although the Romans came to offer him the government of Rome as his hereditary right, and intreated him to re-establish their ancient liberty. He told the deputies he would deliberate upon the proposal; but, being apprehensive of some treachery, he sneaked out of the city in the evening, on pretence of going to take the diversion of hunting; and afterwards ratified and confirmed, by authentic acts, all the promises he had made to Clement and the reigning pope, so much to the prejudice of the empire in Italy. and the imperial crown at Rome.

f HIS pusillanimous conduct excited the indignation of the Germans and the contempt of the Italians. The noblemen of his retinue looked upon his coronation as the æra of the empire's decay, as all her rights in Italy were now totally annihilated. He sustained divers insults on the road in his return to Germany: there was an attempt made to burn him in his lodgings at Pisa, from whence he escaped with great difficulty, after having seen several persons of his train massacred by the populace. The greatest part of the towns attached to the empire shut their gates against him: at Cremona he was obliged to wait without the walls two long hours for the answer of the magistrates, who at length permitted him to enter as a simple stranger, without arms or retinue, and continue for the space of one month only<sup>a</sup> (X).

Guelphs against the Gibelines.

HE seemed to have renounced intirely the politics of his predecessors; for he not only discouraged and rejected the proffers of the Gibelines, who espoused the interests of the empire, but he affected to treat them as enemies to religion, and actually sent a reinforcement of troops from Bohemia to the assistance of the Guelphs, who by these means recovered some places which had been taken from the holy see; and, in consideration of these services, he was applauded and flattered by the pope and his dependents with the most fulsome adulation.

many.

WHILE he acted this absurd part in maintaining the temporalities of the pope, he seemed to neglect the troubles which agitated the northern parts of Germany. A war had broke out between the dukes of Mecklenburg and Stettin about some frontier fortresses, and was carried on with great violence for some years, until Waldemar, king of Denmark, undertook the office of arbitrator, and effected an accommodation. Then marching against the princes of Sclavia and Verle, who had revolted, he defeated their forces and ravaged their dominions, where he committed great cruelties. After this expedition, he consented that a dispute, subsisting between him and the counts of Holstein, should be referred to the arbitration of Eric duke of Saxony, and Gerhard count de Hoja: they decreed, that his Danish majesty, to whom the counts of Holstein had ceded one-half of Fionia, should relinquish all pretensions to that county, and release the Holstein prisoners which he had taken in the last war<sup>b</sup>.

Returns to Germany.
A. D. 1356.

BESIDES these contests, there were other disputes which hastened the return of Charles to Germany; namely, those proceeding from an opinion of equality, which prevailed among the princes of the empire; and this opinion was derived from the election of the emperors, the form of which was not as yet reduced to writing. The number of electors was not yet fixed, nor the quality limited to any particular princes; for the principal states were in general called electors, because all had equally the right of voting. The emperor therefore resolved to settle this point, that due subordination should take place, and future elections be performed without confusion or disorder. For this purpose he ordered a diet to be convoked at Nuremberg, to which the electors, princes, counts, noblemen, and deputies of the free towns, repaired in great number: but, before the chief design of their meeting was brought upon the carpet, the emperor issued a particular decree, touching the difference which Lewis and Stephen, dukes of Bavaria, had with Robert count palatine of the Rhine. The emperor had made an agreement with his nephews, the counts palatine, that the right of voting as an elector should be alternately exercised by the chiefs of the two houses; and now the dukes of Bavaria wished to see this convention confirmed by Charles, who, from his hatred to the posterity of Lewis, pronounced a sentence, by which this right of voting was vested intirely in the count palatine, and the other branches of the house of Bavaria were excluded from this privilege.

LEWIS the Roman approved of this decree, and for this instance of complaisance received the investiture of the marquisate of Brandenburg; but Lewis the elder and Stephen presented a memorial to the diet, containing a detail of their pretensions; and this being overlooked, protested in form against the decree<sup>c</sup>.

THIS affair being discussed, the assembly deliberated upon the other more important affair; and it was not only resolved, that many customs, which had never been reduced to writing, should, in the form of constitutions, be augmented, with several regulations for

(X) The poet Petrarch, who adhered to the party of the Gibelines, reproached him in a letter couched in these terms: "You have then promised upon oath, that you will never return to Rome. What shameful conduct in an emperor, to be compelled by Rome to content himself with the bare title of Cæsar, and exile himself for ever from the habitation of the Cæsars! to be crowned emperor, and then prohibited from reigning, or acting as chief of "the empire: what an insult upon him who ought to command the universe, to be no longer master of himself, but be reduced to obey his own vassal (1)."

Charles is justly reproached for his too great complaisance to the pope; for, by the treaties which were made between them, they seemed to act in concert for the destruction of the empire; one by his avarice, and the other by his ambition to extend the patrimony of St. Peter, to the prejudice of the imperial fiefs (2).

- a the public good; but also to compose and publish the celebrated edict touching the form and ceremonies of the election of emperors, the number of electors, their particular functions, rights, and privileges, together with every circumstance relating to the government of the empire. This is the famous edict called The Golden Bull (Z), composed of thirty articles, three-and-twenty of which were confirmed in this assembly, where the emperor sat on his throne, wearing the crown and other imperial ornaments, and heard them read and published with the unanimous consent and approbation of all present.<sup>d</sup> Towards the latter end of that same year another diet was held at Metz, where the other seven articles were added in presence of the same electors, princes, and states, as well as of the cardinal-bishop of Alva, Charles the eldest son of France, who was duke
- b of Normandy, dauphin of Vienne, and the emperor's own nephew.<sup>e</sup> This edict being published, with all the formalities necessary to make it a fundamental law of the empire, the emperor, in order to put the articles in execution, prepared a magnificent entertainment, at which each of the electors should exercise his own particular function. The emperor and empress in their royal robes, having heard a solemn mass, repaired to the place appointed for the festival, accompanied by all the prelates and princes; and being seated at a table raised upon a scaffold in the market-place, Lewis archbishop of Mentz, Connon archbishop of Triers, and Frederic archbishop of Cologne, as arch-chancellors of Germany, Gaul, and Italy, appeared on horseback, each having a seal hanging from his neck, and a letter in his right hand. They were followed by the four secular electors, likewise on horseback.
- c The first of these was Winceflaus, duke of Saxony, with a silver peck full of oats in his right hand, as arch-marshal of the empire; and, as it was his function to regulate the precedency, he alighted, and put each of his colleagues in his proper place. Then Otho, marquis of Brandenburg, dismounting, presented the emperor and empress with water to wash in an ewer of gold, placed in a basin of the same metal. Robert the Red, count palatine of the Rhine, served up the victuals in plates of gold; and Winceflaus duke of Luxemburg and Brabant, the emperor's nephew, representing the king of Bohemia, who was the emperor himself, placed upon one corner of the table a golden flaggon full of wine, of which he presented a draught to the emperor in a cup of gold. After the electors rode the marquis of Misnia, and the count of Schwartzenburg, great huntsmen, sounding their horns, who, being followed by their hounds, killed a stag and a bear in presence of the emperor, who, after dinner, having bestowed presents upon the electors, princes, counts, and noblemen, gave
- d them leave to depart, and put an end to the diet.<sup>f</sup> A. D. 1357.
- FROM Metz the emperor marched against the dukes of Bavaria, who had formed a league with the princes of Austria, in order to maintain their rights, which they conceived were invaded by the golden bull; and he compelled them to renounce this alliance, and agree to an accommodation on reasonable terms. Then he took the route to Prague, where he finished the citadel of Carlestein, not without attracting the jealousy of his subjects, whom, however, he found means to appease, by reminding them of the care he took to increase and confirm their prerogatives in the golden bull.
- e BUT one article of that famous constitution produced great disturbance in some of the imperial towns. This related to the Phalburgers, or false burghers; and ordained, that the burghers belonging to any prince should not be received as free citizens in the imperial towns. The design of this law was to prevent subjects from withdrawing themselves from the obedience and dominion of their natural lords; but under this pretext the princes endeavoured to deprive the people of the undoubted right they have from nature to shift the place of their residence, in order to better their situation in life. Among others, the inhabitants of Strasburg were expressly forbid to give the freedom of their city to strangers; and this prohibition they rejected, as an infringement of their privileges.
- f WHILE Strasburg thus defended its rights from innovation, Alsace was ravaged by a troop of robbers, who distinguished themselves by the appellations of Malandrines, Tard Venus, or late comers, and Great Companies. They were originally formed of deserters from the armies of France and England, and grew to such a pitch of insolence and power, that the emperor was obliged to assemble the forces of the empire, which drove them out of Germany. Then they marched towards Avignon, in order to lay the pope and cardinals under contribution; but finding it impracticable to make themselves masters of that place, which was defended by the marquis de Montferrat, the greatest part of them inlisted under

returns to Bohemia.

ON his return to Bohemia his whole care was engrossed in accumulating treasure, and extending the frontiers of his hereditary kingdom, which he considered as his real patrimony. He had already augmented it with the addition of Silesia, which he held of Poland, and Lusatia, which was a fief of the empire; nay, he even sold new privileges to several cities, and for money increased the rights and power of other dominions. He left no stone unturned to enrich himself; but anticipated the wish of those who wanted to sell, give, mortgage, or alienate, the lands and privileges of the empire, as if he had entered into a league with foreign princes, in order to weaken its power <sup>b</sup> (A).

liberal arts,

IN other respects he was not a bad prince, although the Germans have no great cause to applaud his reign, because he expressed no zeal for the glory and dignity of the empire. It must be confessed, nevertheless, that he possessed some qualities that were very commendable: he was perfectly well acquainted with the languages, and an encourager of the liberal arts. An illustrious proof of his munificence in this particular is the university of Prague, which he founded on the model of that of Paris, having procured copies of its statutes, while he was employed in his studies in France. He expressed great aversion to the ambition and pomp of ecclesiastics, which was at that time excessive, and even made public remonstrances to the bishops, when they gave him reason to complain on this head <sup>c</sup>. He applied himself with extraordinary care to the administration of justice, and usually sat in person as a check upon the judge; but, on the other hand, he was inexcusably remiss in the affairs of Italy, where every thing relapsed into the utmost confusion. He had sold, for a large sum of money, to the dukes called Sforza, the vicariate of Lombardy, with the state of Milan; and he found his own private interest in neglecting to recover the cities of Padua, Verona, Vicenza, together with the other dominions of the empire and their jurisdictions, which the Venetians had gradually appropriated to themselves, and now peaceably enjoyed.

The princes of the empire, excited by the universities of Germany, represented to him, that, among the bulls of pope Clement VI. there were some that reflected disgrace upon him and the Germanic body, especially that which imports the emperors to be vassals of the pope. In consequence of this representation, Charles wrote to his holiness, desiring that this odious insinuation might be cancelled; but Innocent VI. gave him to understand, that it was become a fundamental law of the church; and, in order to amuse the emperor in his turn, sent the bishop of Cavaillon as his prelate into Germany to demand the tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues for the benefit of the holy see. This extraordinary demand alarmed the clergy and the princes of Germany to such a degree, that the emperor convoked a diet at Mentz, to deliberate upon the subject, and the result of their deliberations was a flat refusal delivered to the nuncio, with heavy complaints of the pope's presumption <sup>d</sup> (B).

the north of Germany.

AT this period the provinces situated in the center of Germany enjoyed peace and tranquillity; but Charles seemed to neglect the northern parts, which were almost always involved with Waldemar king of Denmark, who, by imposing a severe tax upon the Futlanders, had provoked these people to revolt, and they were supported by the duke of Sleswick and the counts of Holstein. In the beginning of this war the confederates were success- <sup>e</sup>

(A) The incorporation of these two provinces with the kingdom of Bohemia involved him in a war with the duke of Austria, who represented to the states the bad consequence of such an alienation from the empire; but his real motive was to appropriate to himself the province of Lusatia, upon which he had long looked with a wishful eye. In order to determine this difference, the two princes took the field; and the emperor perceiving himself greatly inferior to the enemy, he seduced by his promises three of the duke's principal officers, who persuaded their master that the emperor's forces were infinitely superior to his, and produced a forged list of his troops, which they pretended to have intercepted. In consequence of these treacherous representations, the duke thought proper to consult his safety by a precipitate flight: when the traitors came afterwards to demand their recompence of the emperor, he expelled them from his court with disgrace, and even threatened to detect and deliver them to the duke, whom they had betrayed (1).

(B) The emperor, having resolved to reform the German clergy, communicated to the bishops the measures he had taken for that purpose, and threatened to sequestrate the revenues of those who should refuse to obey his orders. The pope, believing the honour and liberty of ecclesiastics at stake, desired the emperor to forbear meddling with the reformation of the clergy, which was his province, and insisted upon his restoring what the secular noblemen had at different times usurped from ecclesiastics. Charles, in order to pacify Innocent, whose resentment he dreaded, published the famous constitution called The Caroline Bull, cancelling all the statutes or regulations which had been made to the prejudice of ecclesiastical liberty, and denouncing the severest penalties against those who should aggrieve the persons of the clergy (2).

a ful; but, in the sequel, Waldemar defeated their army, razed the fortifications of Gumberg, conquered the inlands of Langeland and Alsen, and compelled them to sue for peace, which was accordingly ratified at Stralsund<sup>1</sup>.

MEAN while pope Innocent implored the assistance of the emperor against Bernabo Visconti, lord of Milan, who was then employed in the siege of Bologna, which was garrisoned by the troops of the holy see; but all that he could obtain from Charles was an imperial edict, commanding Bernabo to desist, which Visconti treated with great contempt; and Bologna would certainly have fallen into his hands, had not Galeot Malatesta entered in the night with a considerable reinforcement; and next day, making a vigorous sally, defeated the enemy with great slaughter.

b YET the emperor's indifference on this occasion was not so remarkable as his total neglect of the commotions in Lower Germany. The hans towns, being interrupted in their commerce by the Danes, had craved his protection in repeated solicitations, which being denied, they renewed their antient alliance, entered into a league with the king of Norway, the duke of Mecklenburg, and the count of Holstein, and equipping a considerable fleet, laid Copenhagen under contribution. The war was maintained for some time with various success, till at length, all parties being tired of hostilities, an accommodation took place, though not until his Danish majesty made satisfaction for the damage his subjects had done to the trade of the confederates<sup>m</sup>.

c IN the course of this year the empress was delivered of a son, who was baptized by the name of Wincelaus, and his birth was solemnized with great magnificence: but the noblemen, dissatisfied with the sloth and indolence of Charles, presented to him a remonstrance, importing, that the occupations of an emperor consisted in holding diets, visiting the provinces, administering justice, and maintaining good order. He paid, however, no regard to these representations; but replied to the deputies, that he was not at all disposed to maintain an emperor in the provinces with the revenues of Bohemia. In a word, he was by this time grown extremely covetous, and sold privileges to all the noblemen and towns that chose to pay the price he demanded. The town of Dille, in Upper Alsace, purchased the power of inflicting death upon certain criminals, and even of conferring the right of burghership on all persons whatever, not excepting the vassals of the noblemen, if they were not reclaimed within the year. The bishop of Strasbourg paid a round sum for uniting to his see the landgraviate (C) of Alsace, and several fiefs which had been possessed by the counts of Oettingen; and it might have been said of Charles, that he bought the empire wholesale, and sold it by retail<sup>n</sup>.

d JOHN, bishop of Strasbourg, by this new acquisition, excited the jealousy of the inhabitants of Haguenau, who committed hostilities upon his vassals, and obliged him to take the field at the head of an army, with which he ravaged their territory, and even invested their city: but a peace was soon concluded by the mediation of Burcard, burgrave of Magdeburg.

e THESE troubles were hardly appeased when other disturbances arose from the death of Lewis, duke of Bavaria, who having made no regulations in his will, touching the tutorage of his son Menhard, by his second wife Margaret Maulstach, heiress of Carinthia, his brother Stephen took charge of the young prince, who dying in a few months, his tutor was acknowledged duke of Bavaria, and received the investiture from the emperor: but Margaret Maulstach, who hated the Bavarian house, made a formal cession of all her right and pretensions upon the Tyrol, the county of Goritz, and the territory situated between the Inn and the Adige, to Rodolphus of Austria, who promised to take her for his wife; so that a war broke out between the houses of Austria and Bavaria; and pope Urban, who had succeeded Innocent, prevailed upon both parties to agree to a truce for three years, in consequence of which each competitor retired to his own dominions<sup>o</sup>.

(C) The dignity of landgrave was originally a commission given by the emperors to a certain nobleman, constituting him judge and governor of a province, quamdū se bene gesserit; but in the sequel it became an hereditary fief; and besides the rights and privileges attached to the dignity, there were certain fiefs united to it, of which some depended immediately upon the em-perors, and others upon the bishop, or some powerful nobleman of the province; so that the landgraves not only received the investiture of their office, and its fiefs depending upon the empire, from the emperor himself; but they were likewise obliged to do homage for the other fiefs to the lord paramount (1).

infidels, and persuade the pope to set on foot a new crusade for the conquest of Jerusalem. His holiness and the king of France seemed very well disposed to promote this enterprize; but all their remonstrances had no effect upon the emperor, who was not the man to sacrifice the tranquillity he enjoyed to the prospect of uncertain conquest; nor would the German princes, though severally exhorted by Urban to engage in such a glorious expedition, assist his Cyprian majesty with any thing but fair promises, which they had no intention to perform.

CHARLES, however, to manifest his regard for the successor of St. Peter, interposed his good offices to terminate the war, which still raged in Italy between the pope and Bernabo Visconti; and finding the latter extremely obstinate, and averse to an accommodation, he ordered all the vicars of the empire in Italy to take up arms, and pursue that prince, as an enemy to God, and a rebel to the empire. It was owing to this vigorous step that Visconti began to listen to terms of peace, that were confirmed by a treaty; in consequence of which he was absolved from the sentence of excommunication.

THE emperor, notwithstanding his pacific disposition, involved himself in a quarrel with Lewis, king of Hungary, whose mother he had aspersed; and the licence of his tongue would have intailed upon him a very troublesome war, had not the affair been compromised by the mediation of the pope, who interested himself greatly in the cause of Peter de Lusignan, and foresaw that no substantial assistance could be granted to that monarch, while the princes of Europe were at variance among themselves. Immediately after this accommodation, Charles, being a widower, married Elizabeth, daughter of Bugislaus, duke of Pomerania, and grandchild of Casimir, king of Poland, who defrayed all the expence of the nuptials, which were celebrated, with incredible magnificence, at Cracovia: nor was her reception at Prague inferior to the pomp and splendor of her marriage; for the emperor seemed to have laid aside his natural disposition on this occasion. It must be owned, that he knew how to counterfeit those virtues he did not possess: he courted the esteem of strangers by a shew of hospitality; he engaged in great designs, which he had not spirit to execute; he embellished Prague, encouraged learning, projected a scheme for the reformation of monks, and raised the abbots of Fulde, Weissembourg, Kempten, and Mourbach, the most rich and powerful monks of Germany, to the rank and dignity of princes.

His tranquillity was again invaded by another body of freebooters, who made a fresh irruption into Alsace, where they plundered towns, villages, and passengers, with impunity; while another army of banditti, under the command of Arnold de Carnolle, surnamed the High Priest, fell upon Champagne, to the number of forty thousand, pillaged the open country, entered Bar and Lorraine, laid Metz under contribution, and afterwards marching into Alsace, made incursions to the gates of Strasburg. Charles being apprized of these outrages, and pressed by the princes of Germany to oppose the progress of such lawless ruffians, at length took the field, and having put the most exposed places on the Rhine in a posture of offence, marched towards Strasburg, where he was joined by a strong reinforcement. Arnold, who had committed dreadful ravages in the neighbourhood, finding himself unable to cope with the imperial troops, and having made certain proposals, which were rejected, took the resolution to retreat into Burgundy, where he was assassinated by his own followers, who were soon dispersed after the death of their chief.

On the emperor's return from this expedition, his council having represented to him, that he ought to act with more spirit in Italy, and hinder the rights and dominions of the empire from falling into the hands of the first comer, he resolved to go to Avignon, and conclude an alliance with Urban V. and some of the princes of Italy, against Bernabo, tyrant of Milan. There he was honourably received by the pope, and, during his stay, they treated each other with reciprocal marks of the most sincere friendship. The emperor was present in his imperial robes at a solemn mass which the pope sung on the day of Pentecost; after which, he went to the city of Arles, and was crowned by the hands of the archbishop. Then he returned to Avignon, where the treaty was concluded between him, the pope, and several Italian princes, against the usurpers of the church-lands, and those belonging to the empire in Italy; and as he obliged himself by the treaty to assemble, as soon as possible, a number of troops to march against these usurpers and their adherents, his holiness granted a tenth upon the clergy of Germany, to help him to defray the expence of the war. The enterprize, however, was not set on foot till three years after; so little had he at heart the concerns of the empire on the other side of the Alps; nay, as an authentic proof of this disregard, some historians relate, that, for one dinner which he received from Lewis, duke of Anjou, brother of Charles V. at Villeneuve, near Avignon, he yielded to France the sove-

a reign of Dauphiny, which had been reserved to the empire by the donation which Humbert, the last dauphin, made of that province to the crown of France.

THE chief design, however, of the assembly at Avignon, in which a great number of princes assisted, was to deliberate upon means for subduing those vagabonds who infested the provinces, and for assisting the king of Cyprus against the sultan of Egypt; but Charles, instead of consenting to the measures which were proposed for the relief of that prince, represented the necessity of forming a crusade against the Turks, who had already taken Adrianople, and threatened all Christendom with destruction.

b AFTER much altercation, the assembly broke up, without having come to any resolutions on these interesting subjects. The banditti continued their devastations to the very gates of Avignon, so as to endanger the person of the pope, who, on this account, hastened his departure for Rome, after that city had been deserted by the pontiffs for the space of sixty-two years; yet, as the Viscontis were masters of all the passages of the Alps, and Urban was not at all disposed to put himself in their power, he embarked on board a galley belonging to the queen of Naples, and made his entry into Rome, where he was received with great honours by the clergy and the Roman people.

Pope Urban repairs to Rome. A. D. 1367.

c HE had solicited the emperor to march against the Viscontis, who continued to tyrannize over the states and cities depending upon the Roman see; but Charles was resolved to gratify his own indolence, and excused himself from leaving his dominions, on pretence of the war which was now revived between the dukes of Austria and Bavaria. These princes had actually taken the field to decide their pretensions to the Tyrol; and the armies were in fight of one another, when Waldemar, king of Denmark, arrived from the emperor's court, and prevailed upon the contending parties to agree to the prolongation of the truce.

The dukes of Austria and Bavaria take the field against each other.

d WALDEMAR had no sooner transacted this affair to the satisfaction of the emperor, than he was called to his own dominions, in consequence of a revolt in Sweden; and in the mean time a war was kindled in Lower Saxony by count Egon, who endeavoured to make himself master of Fribourg, to which he had some pretensions as avoyer, or defender. The inhabitants, who had declared themselves independent, ventured to meet his forces in the field, and were defeated; and Egon ceded his right to the house of Austria, in consideration of a sum of money; so that Fribourg lost that liberty which it had maintained for several years.

A. D. 1368.

Fribourg falls under the dominion of the house of Austria.

e VISCONTI still persisting in his hostilities, and Urban in his solicitations, the emperor at length determined to cross the Alps at the head of an army. With this view, he employed some time in putting the affairs of Bohemia in order; and being supplied by the princes of Germany with a strong body of forces, he began his march for Italy. His first operations were directed against Verona, which he took by assault, while the duke of Austria reduced Vicenza, and compelled the inhabitants to renounce the alliance of the Viscontis. Bernabo, finding himself unable to cope with the imperial forces, joined by those of the pope, set on foot a negotiation, by means of his son-in-law, Stephen duke of Bavaria; and peace being made, the pope confirmed the treaty, which was not much for the honour of either.

Makes peace with the Viscontis.

He revokes the privileges of the rebellious towns.

NOTWITHSTANDING this accommodation, the emperor punished the towns and noblemen who had followed the fortunes of Bernabo, by revoking the privileges they had obtained from his predecessors, and remained deaf to all their remonstrances and intreaties, until they found means to appease him with sums of money; and then he not only restored, but augmented their prerogatives.

f HAVING nothing else to fear from this quarter, he continued his march to Viterbo, where he was met by his holiness, whom he accompanied to Rome, where he held the stirrup till the pope alighted, after having led his horse by the bridle to St. Peter's, in which the empress was crowned at the altar on the feast of All Saints, having been first anointed by the cardinal bishop of Ostia. This ceremony being performed, the emperor quitted Rome, and retired to Tuscany, where he staid some months, during which he exacted a great deal of money from the cities, and even from Florence itself, which was fain to purchase his forbearance. Then returning to Germany, he convened a diet at Frankfort, where measures were taken to maintain the peace of the empire; and in particular an imperial edict was published, in order to prevent the feuds that used to rage among the nobles. These precautions, however, did not hinder Magnus, duke of Brunswic, and Gerhard, Bishop of Hildesheim, from taking the field against each other: a battle ensued, in which the latter was victorious. The war was renewed by Otho, duke of Lunenbourg, who resolved to revenge the disgrace of his kinsman; and after they had fatigued each other with marches and counter-marches, a treaty of peace was concluded. This quarrel did not so much disturb the emperor, as did the war which broke out afresh between the pope and Visconti, which last obtained a victory over the troops of his holiness, and filled the whole country with outrage and devastation. Urban had recourse to Lewis, king of Hungary, who actually levied forces march to his assistance: but he could not obtain the permission of the emperor for his passing to the Alps, because Charles was jealous of his designs; yet he sent such intimidating messages to Bernabo, as induced him to recall his troops from the territories of the church, and make the first advances to a pacification, which the pope would have rejected, had not he been pressed to accept them by the emperor, who dreaded the thoughts of the Hungarians entering Lombardy, and therefore importuned Urban to embrace the proposals of Bernabo<sup>a</sup>. His holiness did not long survive this pacification; for he died in a few months, on his return to Avignon, and was succeeded by Peter Roger de Maumont, who assumed the appellation of Gregory XI. and sent intimation of his promotion to the emperor, and other Christian princes. Among these, Waldemar, king of Denmark, begged he would interpose the papal authority in his behalf with the counts of Holstein, and the duke of Mecklenburg, who supported the Jutlanders in a revolt, and even formed such a strong alliance with the king of Sweden, the duke of Sleswic, and other princes, that Waldemar was obliged to fly from his own kingdom to the court of the emperor, who would afford him no other assistance than some letters of recommendation to the marquis of Misnia, the duke of Stettin, and some other noblemen, whom he exhorted to take arms in defence of the Danish king.

His embassy to the pope met with no greater success; for Gregory having heard the complaints of the Jutlanders, who accused the king of tyranny and oppression, he advised him to reform his character, and strive to regain the affections of his people by a milder administration. Disappointed in his hope from the emperor and his holiness, Waldemar set on foot a private negotiation with the towns of Wandalia, which having detached from the league; he re-took possession of his dominions, confirmed the treaty of Stralsund, and obtained a deed from the hans towns, by which they obliged themselves to restore to the crown of Denmark, at the expiration of fifteen years, those places in Scania, which had been mortgaged to them for that term<sup>b</sup>. Charles (B), without interesting himself greatly in these contentions, enjoyed himself at his ease in Prague, where the arts and sciences flourished under his protection; but, in the midst of these literary amusements, he was alarmed with the news of a quarrel between his brother Winceslaus, duke of Luxemburg and Brabant, and the duke of Juliers, which last is said to have countenanced a band of robbers, who committed outrages on the highway. Winceslaus, being vicar of the empire in the Low Countries, and intendant of the highways, sent deputies to the duke of Juliers, to complain of his conduct; and these being treated with contempt, he raised an army, at the head of which he entered the dominions of the duke, who defeated and took him prisoner. The emperor, being apprised of his brother's disaster, resolved to take ample vengeance on the victor; and, in a diet at Aix-la-Chapelle, commanded all the dukes, counts, barons, and noblemen, there assembled, to furnish their proportions of troops, that he might lay waste the dukedom of Juliers with fire and sword. But he was diverted from his purpose by the intercession of the ecclesiastical electors, and the princes of Bavaria, who prevailed upon their cousin the duke of Juliers to release Winceslaus, and all the prisoners, without ransom, and ask pardon on his knees before the emperor, who raised him up, and embraced him, in token of reconciliation<sup>c</sup>.

So many mischievous consequences were produced by these petty wars between the noblemen of the empire, that Charles, in order to remedy this disorder, convoked a diet at Nuremberg, where it was decreed by an edict, that no prince or nobleman, who conceived himself aggrieved by another, should have recourse to arms, till the expiration of two months after the offence received; and this law, called The regulation of sixty days, was of signal service in the empire. This constitution being enacted, Charles relapsed into his former indolence, and seemed to renounce intirely the interests of the empire in Italy. He winked at the enterprizes of Gregory upon the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily: he refused to assist the holy see against the incursions of Bernabo Visconti, whom no treaty could restrain; and he lent a deaf ear to all the solicitations of the pope, who exhorted him to engage in a crusade a for the relief of Hungary, which was threatened with an invasion by Amurath, emperor of Hungary is threatened by the Turks.<sup>d</sup> A. D. 1373.

NOTWITHSTANDING this indifference towards the affairs of the empire, he exerted himself with great industry when the concerns of his own family were in question. For a considerable sum of money he purchased of Otho the marquisate of Brandenburg, with which he invested his second son Sigismund; and he, by his emissaries, privately canvassed among the princes of the empire, in order to secure the succession of the imperial throne to his eldest son Winceslaus. For this purpose he made a journey into Germany, where he managed matters with so much address, and applied his money to such good purpose, that, in consideration of an hundred thousand ducats paid to each of the electors, his son, though but fifteen years of age, was chosen king of the Romans at Rentz, where a diet was assembled for that purpose, and afterwards crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. That he might not, however, intirely exhaust his ready money, he mortgaged to some of them the toll which he had upon the Rhine, and sold towns to others. Those of Bopart and Oberwesel were purchased by the elector of Triers: he disposed of Kaiserlauter, Oppenheim, Obernheim, and Ingelheim, to the elector Palatine, and some other cities to the duke of Austria; so that people were wont to say, He had enfeebled the empire, and plucked the eagle. At length Charles, having seen his son Winceslaus received in several of the imperial towns, returned to Prague, where he received the news of the pope's return to Rome, which did not greatly relish his presence, after having so long enjoyed the sweets of independence while the pontiffs resided at Avignon. Gregory, at the same time, wrote a letter to the emperor, desiring he would mediate a peace between his nephew the king of France and the English monarch; and Charles, who had this affair at heart, resolved to make a journey to Paris, that he might be nearer at hand to act as the emergency of the case should require. Having therefore quelled some intestine commotions in Germany, and seen a war between the king of Denmark and the duke of Mecklenburg happily terminated, he sent an intimation of his design to Charles V. of France, and set out by the way of Brabant, accompanied by his son Winceslaus, and a moderate retinue. At Cambray he was met by a number of noblemen, whom the king had sent to receive him; at Compiègne he was complimented by the duke of Bourbon, the count d'Eu, and several bishops; and he made his entry into Paris riding on horseback on the right-hand of the king, who treated him with great splendour and magnificence. Whatever his pretence might be for visiting France on this occasion, his real motives seem to have been the desire of seeing the French monarch, for whom he expressed great tenderness of affection, and a superstitious zeal for paying his devotions to St. Maur; for it does not appear that he transacted any other affair in France, except his declaring the dauphin his perpetual vicar in the kingdom of Arles and county of Dauphiny, and his permitting a private gentleman, called Enguerrand de Couci, to maintain by arms the right he pretended to have to the succession of the house of Austria by his mother Catherine, granddaughter of the emperor Albert. Charles makes a visit into Germany; bribes the electors, who chuse his son Winceslaus king of the Romans. A. D. 1376.

c COUCI having obtained this permission, and received a supply of troops from the king of France, he published a manifesto, ravaged the territory of Strasburg, and in the winter-season entered the country of the Swiss, where his soldiers perished with cold and hunger in such numbers, that he was obliged to retire into Picardy, and desert from his enterprise.<sup>e</sup> Enguerrand de Couci prosecutes his claim to the succession of the house of Austria.

As for the emperor, he, in his return from France, took the road to Luxemburg, where he prevailed upon duke Winceslaus, who had no issue, to declare him and his sons heirs of his duchy, and all its dependencies<sup>b</sup>; and, soon after his arrival at Prague, he died of a fever, having reigned about one-and-thirty years since the death of Lewis IV. his predecessor, leaving behind him the character of a good prince, but a bad emperor<sup>f</sup> (C). Her dowry was the county of Jawarin and the duchy of Swenitz. His fourth wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Bogislaus V. duke of Stettin, who was niece or grand-daughter of Casimir, king of Poland. By her he had Sigismund, who

Charles.

WHEN the princes once intreated him to quit Bohemia, and shew himself in Germany, he is said to have conducted them into his treasury, in which there was a prodigious quantity of gold and silver bullion, and spoke to this effect: "The city of Prague gave me birth; the kingdom of Bohemia furnishes me with all these riches: were I more attached to Germany, I should be obliged, like you, to pluck the eagle. You know very well how to strip her of her feathers when she flies towards your quarters, and she might, in her turn, be provoked to make reprisals; in which case, the wings of some of you would not grow again for a considerable length of time."

his edicts and transactions.

Besides the golden bull, which we have mentioned, Charles published divers laws and constitutions. By an edict, dated at Prague, he decreed, that, in case the royal family should fail, the states of the kingdom should be at liberty to chuse a new king; and that same year he confirmed the right of electorate to the crown of Bohemia. He granted to John, duke of Brabant, a privilege, in consequence of which none of his subjects could be carried out of his own jurisdiction, nor arrested in the empire, for any cause whatever. He confirmed to the abbot of Fulde the dignity of arch-chancellor to the empress, together with a new privilege at the time of her coronation, and all other ceremonies; namely, the right of putting the crown on her head, and of taking it off again. He invested Rupert the Old with the right which he had to the electorate Palatine. He published a decree for exempting the estates of the clergy from all secular jurisdiction. Chancing to pass through Westphalia, he had the curiosity to go and see the tomb of the great Wittichind, which was repaired by his order; the arms of Charlemagne being placed at the head, and those of Bohemia at the feet*. Finally, he ordered the feast of Charlemagne to be annually solemnized in the church of Aix-la-Chapelle (D).

(D) It is generally supposed, that cannon were first used in the reign of this emperor, in consequence of the invention of gun-powder, which is attributed to an accidental discovery of one Bertholdus Scharzz, or the Black, a monk of Friburg: yet there is in the arsenal of Amberg a piece of cannon made in the year 1303, so that those instruments of death must have been known before the reign of Charles (1).

- a WINCESLAUS, at the age of seventeen, succeeded his father in the government of the empire, and on the throne of Bobemia, at a time when the church was divided by a great schism. The Romans had elected Urban VI. who confirmed the election of this new emperor, and the French had chosen Clement VII. for pope. During these troubles, Winceslaus appointed Jadoc, marquis of Moravia, his vicar-general in Italy, laid injunctions upon him to inquire which of the two was the true pope, to acknowledge and protect him whom he should find to be canonically elected, and to expel by force the other, who had intruded himself into the chair. He likewise held a diet at Nuremburg, and afterwards at Frankfort, where, after having examined this affair of the popes, Urban VI. was acknowledged by the archbishops and bishops, and Winceslaus, together with the princes of the empire, engaged to protect him in the papacy<sup>1</sup>.

- b AFTER the diet of Frankfort, the emperor repaired to Aix la Chapelle, where he resided for some time, because the plague raged in Bobemia; and here he gave himself up to all kinds of debauchery, neglecting the affairs of the empire to such a degree, that the provinces became a prey to those banditti, whom we have already mentioned by the name of Late Comers and Grand Companies: and the princes and towns were obliged to engage in associations for their mutual defence. These free-booters, however, were afterwards taken into the pay of Winceslaus, who, on his return to Prague, by his misconduct, provoked his subjects to revolt, and, in order to punish them for their rebellion, allowed those vermin to destroy the country without remorse. Having pillaged the whole kingdom of Bobemia, they enlisted in the service of Jane queen of Naples, who had lately married Otho of Brunswick, and was in the sequel barbarously put to death by Charles Durazzo, even after she had declared that prince her successor to the crown.

- c NOTWITHSTANDING the seeming attention which Winceslaus paid to the peace of the church, he was a prince of a depraved taste, and the most vicious inclinations. His cruelty seemed to be presaged, by his being the occasion of his mother's death when he was born, and the impurities with which he profaned the font at his baptism, and the altar at his being crowned king of Bobemia, looked like omens of the unworthy actions, with which he dishonoured his reign<sup>m</sup>. His whole conduct was a series of debauched cruelty and baseness. In imitation of his father, he disposed of all the rights of the empire in Germany, which remained unfold; and as for the cities and provinces of Italy, which his father had alienated, he exacted money from them for a confirmation of their privileges. He expedited blank patents, signed and sealed, to be filled up at the pleasure of the purchasers; by which means the rich and powerful were authorized to oppress the weak and poor<sup>n</sup>. This was accordingly done with such impunity and licence, that there was no security for commerce, no policy, no order in the empire. Such confusion could not fail to produce civil wars. The cities of Suabia and the Rhine took arms against the princes in their neighbourhood, of which the chief were the count palatine, the count of Wurtemberg, and the duke of Austria.

- d THE electors, and other princes and states, tired of all these disorders, and chagrined to see Germany without a head, and the privileges of the empire alienated, in order to fill the purse of Winceslaus, sent an embassy to Prague, beseeching him to come and reside among them. When this proposal was made him, "Our dear ambassadors (said he), all the world knows that we are emperor, and if there is any person in the empire, who is desirous of seeing us, let him come to Bobemia, and we will freely give him audience<sup>o</sup>." This was all the answer they could obtain, and the electors were so scandalized at the contempt with which he received their advice, that, seeing no prospect of his reformation, they of themselves took cognizance of the general affairs of the empire, and interposed in the quarrels and disputes subsisting between several states, which they with difficulty accommodated; to such a degree was their animosity inflamed.
- f THE towns of Suabia, Franconia, and the Rhine, formed what they called the Great League, and the princes formed associations for their mutual defence: by these precautions the public tranquility was maintained, and even Lower Germany secured from those shocks, which were occasioned by a revolution in Sweden. his mother Margaret ascended the throne, with the unanimous consent of the people, and even recommended herself so strongly to the Swedes, who were oppressed by their own king Albert, that they renounced their allegiance to that monarch, and made her a solemn tender of the crown; in consequence of which she marched to their assistance, defeated Albert, who was deposed, and obliged to retire to the dominions of his brother, the duke of Mecklenburg, and then she assumed the reins of government, and was distinguished by the appellation of the Semiramis of the North <sup>a</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING all the measures which had been taken to prevent civil broils in Germany, war broke out between the house of Austria and the confederate towns, which had shaken off the yoke of dependence. Leopold of Austria, son of Albert the Sage, confiding too much in his own strength, raised a considerable army to reduce the Swifs, eight cantons of which had already withdrawn themselves from his dominion. He accordingly gave them battle, which he lost, together with his life, so that they intirely freed themselves from the Austrian chains, and their dependence upon the empire, while their success encouraged other cities to follow their example <sup>b</sup>.

THE towns of Alsace, Suabia, and the Rhine, made preparations for defending themselves against those princes, who attempted to domineer over them: Spire, Worms, and Mentz, levied a body of forces, which ravaged the territories of Robert the Young, count palatine, who took the field, and made reprisals with great cruelty; the inhabitants of Strasburg, aggrieved by the marquis of Baden, plundered the lands of the margraviate, and destroyed the town of Brumpt, belonging to the count de Linange, who joining the marquis of Baden, and the old count palatine, made incursions to the very gates of Strasburg, and laid waste the whole country, from Husbergen to Malshheim, with fire and sword: in a word, Alsace was, by these mutual ravages and cruelties, reduced to the last extremity; when peace was re-established by the mediation of some princes of the empire <sup>c</sup>.

WINCESLAUS, without giving himself the least trouble about these transactions, still resided in Bohemia, plunged in all manner of debauchery, by which he rendered himself every day more and more contemptible in the eyes of his subjects (E). He ordered John Nepomucene, his wife's confessor, to be drowned, because he would not reveal the particulars of her confession; and in all other respects behaved with such barbarity and indiscretion, that his subjects looked upon him with detestation and abhorrence. But while he thus attracted the odium and contempt of all good men, his brother Sigismund distinguished himself by his valour and capacity, and at length ascended the Hungarian throne, after the death of Charles Durazzo, who had been elected by the Hungarians, and assassinated by order of the queen-mother; because her daughter, the princess Mary, was defrauded of her right by his election <sup>d</sup>.

THE death of Durazzo involved the kingdom of Naples in great confusion. One party espoused the cause of his son Ladislau, still a minor, and another adhered to the interest of Lewis of Anjou, who pretended to the crown; while pope Urban, though equally courted by both, remained neutral, in hope of raising his own nephew to the throne, after the other two competitors should have enfeebled each other. Mean while Otho of Brunswick, the last husband of the unfortunate Jane, was appointed captain-general for Lewis of Anjou, and marching to Naples, at the head of an army composed of French and Germans, reduced the whole kingdom to the dominion of his principal. Urban could not help repining at his success, which not only rendered his own scheme impracticable, but likewise strengthened the interest of his rival Clement VIII. who patronized the duke of Anjou: he found himself, moreover, hated for his severity and ambition, and abandoned by Bologna, and several other towns, who embraced the party of his competitor. These concurring mortifications affected him so nearly, that he died of chagrin; and, in a few days after his decease, the fourteen cardinals residing at Rome elected Peter Thomacelle in his room. This new pontiff assumed the name of Boniface IX. and excommunicated Clement, who retorted the sentence upon him with equal animosity <sup>e</sup>.

THE repose of Germany was about this period disturbed by insurrections against the Jews, who being accused of having poisoned the fountains, and insulted the host (though in reality their wealth was all their crime), were burned in their synagogue at Prague, butchered at Spire, without distinction of age or sex, plundered in almost every province, and, as the authority of Winceslaus was not sufficient to protect that unhappy people, at last obliged to escape into Lithuania, where they found an asylum in the favour of Jagellon, who was enamoured of a Jewish damsel <sup>f</sup>.

(E) In this year the doctrine of Wickliff was introduced into Bohemia, by a gentleman of that country who had studied in England (1).

(1) Heiss. Hist. l. xi. c. 28.

- a THESE disturbances were succeeded by commotions in Alsace and other provinces on the Rhine; the inhabitants of Strasburg reclaimed some towns which Charles IV. had mortgaged to Robert count palatine, alleging that the emperor had no power to dispose of their property; and, the count refusing to comply with their demand, they took the field, in order to subdue him by force. This war produced nothing but mutual ravages, and the Strasburgers were fain to retreat for the safety of their city, which was endangered by an affair of greater consequence. Rapclstein, an Alsatian nobleman, on whom they had conferred the right of burghership, imprisoned an Englishman, called Harleston, because he had served in the army of Linguerand de Couci, when that nobleman laid waste the territory of Strasburg. The king of England demanded the release of his subject: the emperor commanded the Strasburgers to let him at liberty; and they disregarding the order of such a weak prince, he put the city to the ban of the empire. Troubles in Alsace.
Strasburg is put to the ban of the empire.
A. D. 1392.
- b ABUNDANCE of noblemen, jealous of the power of Strasburg, took this opportunity to engage in a league to humble her pride: the bishop himself joined in the confederacy; and an army being raised, the allies undertook the siege of the place, which, however, they could not reduce. At length peace was effected by the mediation of the bishop of Bamberg, though the emperor would by no means consent to the treaty, until the citizens purchased his condescension with a present of thirty thousand florins.
- c PEACE being thus re-established, John, Stephen, and Frederic, dukes of Bavaria, agreed to a partition of their dominions, which had hitherto been undivided, and subscribed a pactum or treaty for regulating the order of succession, and the alienation of their fiefs; by which any one of them was restricted from parting with his lands, until he should have first offered the purchase to the other two, and obtained their consent to alienate his property; and all disputes were referred to arbitration. Partition of the dominions of Bavaria.
A. D. 1393.
- d MEAN while Winceslaus continued immersed in debauchery, and seemed industrious in acquiring the implacable hatred of his people, by the extraordinary taxes he imposed, and the cruelties he exercised indifferently upon all sorts of people; not even respecting the magistrates of Prague, whom he ordered to be beheaded without form of process. Nay, in order to familiarize himself to blood and carnage, he descended so low, as to contract an intimacy with the common executioner, whom he distinguished by the appellation of his gossip (F). Nevertheless, some authors allege, that this cruel disposition was not natural to him. He is said to have been twice poisoned, and the medicines he took prevented the doses from having their whole effect: but they left an extraordinary heat and dryness in his constitution, which he was obliged to assuage with drinking. Thus he contracted the habit of drunkenness, which sometimes inflamed him to such a degree of fury, that it was dangerous to be near him; for, in one of those fits of intoxication, he is said to have ordered his cook to be roasted alive. Winceslaus's cruelty the effects of poison which he had received.
A. D. 1364.
- e THE noblemen of Bohemia, perceiving that his cruelty and excesses daily augmented, thought it highly necessary to lay him under some restriction; and by the advice of his brother Sigismund, king of Hungary, actually confined him in close prison, from which, however, he found means to escape. After having laid several months in a dungeon, he obtained permission from the senate to be conducted to a bath to refresh himself. There perceiving a fisher's little boat on the banks of the river hard by the bath, he embarked with the woman who attended him (both being naked), and, rowing to the other side of the river, retired to a fortress, which he had formerly caused to be built as an asylum against the enterprizes of his enemies. He was suffered to resume the reins of government; but as he did not reform his behaviour, his subjects had recourse to his brother Sigismund, king of Hungary, who marched into Bohemia at the head of a strong army, compelled the emperor to submit, was declared regent of the kingdom, changed the ministers and officers of state, and redressed the grievances of the people. He is confined by the noblemen of Bohemia, and escapes from a bath.

(F) This executioner is said to have perished at last by the hands of his prince. Winceslaus, sending for him one day, said he wanted to know the situation of a man's mind, when he expected to have his head severed from his body; he, therefore, bound up his own eyes, and, kneeling, desired his friend to cut off his head.

The executioner, instead of obeying this order, struck him with the flat part of the sword: upon which Winceslaus ordered him to be blinded in his turn, and, taking the sword in his own hand, actually shortened him by the head (2).

distribute his charity among the prisoners. Winceslaus, perceiving him one day from his window, promised him an ample recompence, provided he would assist him in procuring his liberty (G). Grundler, induced by his promises, conveyed to him a silken cord, by means of which he descended from the tower; then, being rowed by him across the Danube, he returned to Bohemia, regained possession of the city of Prague, by means of some noblemen who were his friends, and was permitted to resume his authority, on condition of amending his way of life <sup>a</sup>.

DURING these vicissitudes in Bohemia, the theologicians in Germany endeavoured, by their writings, to finish the schism in the church, occasioned by the two competitors for the papacy. The university of Cologne, though it had owned Boniface as the lawful pope, nevertheless inclined to the convocation of a general council, as the only sure method of re-establishing the peace of the church; and wrote to the university of Paris on this subject. The death of Clement VII. which happened at this period, seemed to be a favourable conjuncture for attaining such a desirable end. The archbishops of Mentz and Cologne, and several other princes and prelates of the empire, conjured the cardinals at Avignon to desist from a new election, until some measures could be taken to terminate the schism; and the king of France wrote to the same purpose: yet, in spite of all these remonstrances, they elected Pedro de Luna, cardinal of Arragon, who assumed the name of Benedict XIII. His election was no sooner known in Germany, than the archbishops of Cologne and Mentz, together with the other princes, convoked a diet at Frankfort; where, after due deliberation, it was resolved to exhort both competitors to abdicate the papacy, so as that a canonical election might take place; and this was the declared opinion of the French king, whose ambassadors were present in the assembly. <sup>b</sup>

IN consequence of the determination of the diet, deputies were sent to Rome, to communicate the sentiments of the king of France, and the princes of Germany; but although they were caressed by Boniface, who affected to heap favours upon them, they could never bring him to treat upon the affair of the cession, which he evaded with great dexterity. Winceslaus, though he did not assist at the diet, believing his own personal importance sufficient to determine this dispute, proposed an interview to Charles king of France, at Rheims, where, though he was almost constantly intoxicated with strong liquor, he agreed with the French monarch to send the bishop of Cambray to Rome, in order to persuade Boniface to resign the papal chair. Boniface, having consulted his cardinals, answered, that he would willingly comply with the request of the emperor and the king of France, provided they would oblige the pretended pope of Avignon to quit his pretensions also, and appoint a proper place, where he might appear with his cardinals to proceed to a new election. In consequence of this answer, the same deputy was dispatched to Benedict, who flatly refused to comply with the proposal, and declared he would maintain his dignity to his latest breath: an instance of obstinacy which incensed Charles to such a degree, that he and his kingdom renounced Benedict, the marshal de Boucicaut was ordered to invest Avignon, and the anti-pope was kept prisoner in the castle for the space of five whole years <sup>a</sup>.

Margaret, queen of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway effects the union of these three kingdoms;

and goes to war with the Teutonic order.

PERHAPS his confinement would not have been of such long duration, had not the revolutions in the North hindered the kingdoms of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, from attending to the schism in the Roman church. Margaret was engrossed by the project of uniting these three kingdoms, and employed her endeavours to engage the German princes in the support of her scheme. Being importuned by the Swedes to marry, she lent a deaf ear to their remonstrance on this head; but, in order to quiet their apprehensions, she appointed the son of Wratislaus, duke of Pomerania, her successor, and her choice was approved by the states of the three kingdoms assembled at Colmar, where also they formed that union which she had so much at heart, and confirmed it by the famous edict called the Union of Colmar. After this transaction she engaged in a war with the Teutonic order, about the island of Gothland, which the knights refused to surrender, on pretence of having acquired the right of conquest, by expelling the tyrants by whom the greatest part of it was possessed. Margaret, finding her arms did not succeed to her expectation, had recourse to the mediation of the emperor, who appointed a congress at Helfinbourg; to which he sent his deputies, and there a treaty of peace was concluded, on condition that the knights should cede the island to Margaret, in consideration of a sum of money to indemnify them for the expence of the war <sup>b</sup>.

WINCESLAUS, having in this manner restored peace to those northern countries, espoused Sophia, daughter of Stephen duke of Bavaria; and after this marriage, his extra-a vagance increased to such a degree, that his revenues were not sufficient to defray the prodigious expence of his household. Notwithstanding the promise he had made at his restoration, he regarded the affairs of the empire as little as ever, except in those things that related to his own private emolument; and, as he neglected nothing that could produce money, he received, with extraordinary demonstrations of joy, an embassy from John Galeazzo, count of Vertus, nephew and successor of that Bernabo Visconti, who, as we have already observed, had seized the sovereignty of Milan, Placentia, Cremona, Pavia, Lodi, Brescia, Bergamo, Vercelli, Novara, Tortona, and others belonging to the Milanese and Lombardy, which depended upon the empire.

b THE subject of this embassy was to buy of him the feignories and royalties of all these countries, together with the title of duke of Milan. These Winceflaus sold for a considerable sum of money, without the participation or consent of the princes of the empire. This was one of the reasons, that some time after induced them to think of dispossessing him in good earnest. They perceived, that he seemed to take pleasure in dismembering the empire for his own sordid views, at a time when it was but too much divided by the schism which prevailed in the church; and when Christendom was weakened by the enterprises of the Türks, who had gained divers signal advantages over the Christians, which were followed by the famous victory obtained over them by Bajazet, near Nicopolis.

Winceflaus sells the royalty of sundry cities and territories in Italy.

c THE electors, after long delays, concluding that the public safety demanded a chief capable of re-establishing and protecting the peace, as well as of supporting the dignity of the empire, assembled at Boppard, and afterwards at Frankfort, in order to deliberate upon the present posture of affairs; and notwithstanding the representations of Winceflaus, who sent the margrave of Nuremberg to inform the electors, that he could not quit Bohemia on account of some domestic troubles, and the coronation of his empress, they convoked a diet at Frankfort, where they resolved to oblige the emperor to chuse an administrator, and made him acquainted with their determination. But Winceflaus absolutely refusing to comply with their decision, they entered into a confederacy, confirmed by oath, to redress the grievances of the Germanic body, preserve the rights of the empire, and prevent the alienation of its domains.

d THE result of this association was a diet at Mentz, to which they invited the emperor; and he refusing to appear, it was determined that he should be obliged to make a formal renunciation of the empire, and the imperial insignia, after which they would proceed to a new election. Winceflaus, far from abdicating the throne by a voluntary renunciation, gave the electors to understand, that he annulled, by anticipation, all the resolutions of their assembly, and that he would put all those to the ban of the empire, who should presume to execute their decrees. Without paying the least regard to his menaces, they, by the advice of pope Boniface IX. assembled at the castle of Laenstein, on the Rhine, in the archbishopric of Triers; and, having declared Winceflaus incapable, pronounced and published the sentence of his deposition, revoking at the same time all the rights, exemptions, privileges, and domains, sold or mortgaged by his own particular authority, without the consent of the princes and states of the empire<sup>d</sup> (H). (H) The authors of this deposition, were John de Nassau, archbishop of Mentz, Frederic de Severden, archbishop of Cologne, Wernier de Königstein, archbishop of Triers, Robert, elector count palatine of the Rhine, and Rodolphus, duke of Saxony and Lunenburg (4).

After having summoned Winceflaus to appear, and waited ten days in vain for his arrival, they proceeded to his trial; and the sentence of deposition was pronounced by the archbishop of Mentz to this effect. "In the name of the Lord, Amen. We John, by the grace of God, archbishop of Mentz, arch-chancellor of the holy Roman empire in Germany, to all men who now are, or may be hereafter, we give to understand, that, for many years, intolerable abuses have been introduced into the church of God, and, far from being repressed, multiply daily, to the great scandal of the good, and the utter perdition of the wicked. But the most melancholy circumstance is, that he, whom the holy empire, and the church have appointed to reform these disorders, is himself the author of them; and, instead of remedying these evils, his pernicious example, and wicked government, have annihilated the Police of the empire, and occasioned civil wars in Germany and in Italy."

"For which reason, upon the pressing remonstrances of the holy church, the princes, noblemen, towns, and subjects of the empire, we the co-electors, and we for our own share, have often cautioned the most serene prince Winceflaus, king of the Romans and of Bohemia, and represented to him, either verbally or by letter, his scandalous conduct, his negligence in the administration of affairs, his tolerating or authorizing, by his own example, the most enormous abuses, his dismembering the empire considerably, without assembling diets, or consulting the princes; and of all the grievances, of which he is attainted and convicted, we have drawn up an abstract, of which these are the particular articles,"

"He has sold to France the town of Genoa and its territory, notwithstanding the opposition of the states of the empire, on which that fief depends: he has surrendered to Galeazzo Visconti the Milanese, and even Lombardy, under the title of duchy: he has alienated several domains, which had devolved to the empire on the death of the proprietors: he has sold to divers persons blank patents, sanctioned by his own seal, to be disposed of at their pleasure, to the great prejudice of the empire: he hath granted impunity to thieves and robbers: he hath,

WINCESLAUS was so little mortified at the news of his deposition, that, when he received them, "We are overjoyed (said he) to be delivered from the burden of the empire, because we shall have more leisure to apply ourselves to the government of our kingdom;" and indeed, during the nineteen years that he afterwards reigned in Bohemia, his conduct was considerably amended, and he applied himself seriously to calm the disturbances which had been raised by John Huss, professor of theology in the university of Prague, who had embraced the doctrine of Wickliffe (1).

His death.

AFTER he had reigned twenty-two years as emperor, and fifty-five as king of Bohemia, being one day at dinner informed of a tumult in the city of Prague, he rose from table in great consternation; and one of his domestics imprudently saying, he knew three days before that this disturbance would happen, Winceslaus flew upon him, pulled him to the ground by the hair of his head, and would have instantly put him to death, had he not been restrained by the interposition and remonstrances of those who were present; such was the excess of his passion, that he fell down in an apoplectic fit, and in a few days after expired (K), in the fifty-seventh year of his age<sup>g</sup>.

citizens of Aixla-Chapelle.

ALTHOUGH Rupert or Robert count palatine of the Rhine, duke of Bavaria, surnamed the Short and the Debonair, had been formally chosen emperor by all the electors, in the field of Reintz upon the Rhine, then consecrated and confirmed in the church of Cologne, by the archbishop of that metropolitan; yet the inhabitants of Aix-la-Chapelle would not allow him to be crowned in their city, alleging they were not yet absolved from the oath they had taken to Winceslaus; but the true reason was their affection and attachment to that prince. They were, therefore, put to the ban of the empire, and otherwise maltreated, until they had taken the oath of allegiance to Robert. But the citizens of

with his own hand, or by the help of his executioners, murdered, drowned, or burned, prelates, priests, and a number of other persons of distinction: in contempt of Christianity, he hath made a league with the king of Poland, protector of the Tartars, against the knights of the Teutonic order: he hath, without sense or danger, squandered away the revenues of Bohemia and the empire, and put the government of his kingdom into the hands of unexperienced and evil-minded persons, who have loaded his subjects with excessive taxes: in his negotiations with the princes of the empire, he hath practised such equivocation and dissimulation, that none of them will trust his word: he hath destroyed the university of Prague, founded by the emperor his father: he hath expelled the doctors, and put many of them to death, without form of process or previous sentence: finally, he hath abandoned himself, night and day, to debauchery; he hath intirely neglected the affairs of the empire; and, having been more than once exhorted and solicited to reform his conduct, he hath persecuted those who gave him such salutary advice."

"We therefore, the electors, having invoked the holy name of God, and sitting in our tribunal of justice, moved by the grievances afore-mentioned, and other causes of still greater importance, have, by our present sentence, deposed Winceslaus, a dissipator of the Germanic body, as an useless member, and as a chief unworthy to govern the holy Roman empire; and as such we have deprived him of the dignities thereunto annexed: we likewise intimate to all princes, potentates, knights, cities, dominions, and subjects of the holy empire, that they are absolved from the oath of allegiance they owe him as emperor."

"Moreover, we caution and forbid them to obey the said Winceslaus for the future, or to serve him under any title whatever; but require them to reserve their obedience and service for a more useful and worthy prince to be substituted in his place."

"On the faith of which, we John archbishop of Mentz have taken care to make a transcript of the present act of deposition, sealed with our great seal. Enacted and solemnly published at Landstein, in the year after the nativity of Christ 1400, on Friday, August 20, a little before nine o'clock, in the eleventh year of the pontificate of our holy father pope Boniface IX. in the presence of the noble princes John and Robert, Frederic burgrave of Nuremberg, Philip of Nassau and Sarbruck, George de Leiningen, John de Zeigenstein, Conrad count palatine of the Rhine, Renard de Wisterburg, John d'Isenburg, Reinard de Hanau, and several other lords, knights, and persons, both secular and ecclesiastic (1).

(1) Wickliffe's doctrine had gained ground in Bohemia, and been embraced by several masters of the university of Prague, particularly by John Huss, who became the head of a sect, which grew very formidable to the church. Winceslaus found his account in conniving at the progress of this reformation, by the taxes which he levied on pretence of quelling the tumults which it daily occasioned. He was even heard to say, that he must take especial care of a goose (the interpretation of Huss in the Bohemian tongue) which laid him such eggs of gold (2).

(K) Winceslaus was twice married: his first wife was Jane daughter of Albert duke of Bavaria and count of Holland; who was crowned with him at Aix la Chapelle, and died in the year 1387. After he had escaped for the second time from prison, he, in order to fortify himself on the side of Germany, espoused Sophia daughter of Stephen duke of Bavaria; but he had no issue by either, tho' the annals of Poland import, that he had one daughter named Euphemia, married to Uladislaus II. king of Poland (3).

- a Nuremberg were more fortunate ; for, in consideration of a present of the wine of Bocharac, that prince discharged them from the oath which they had taken in his favour <sup>h</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING this tame resignation of Winceslaus, several powers of Europe disapproved of his deposition. The king of France, in particular, sent ambassadors to Mentz, to express his concern for the difference between Robert and Winceslaus, and desired that a certain day might be fixed, when all parties should assemble, and treat of an accommodation. For this purpose he offered his own good offices, and demanded that Robert would consent to a year's truce, and be personally present at the assembly, while he undertook for the appearance of the king of Bohemia, who had already referred himself to his arbitration.

- b He himself likewise engaged to be there in person, or, in case of impediment, to send thither some princes of the blood. Robert, and the electors of Mentz and Cologne, pretended to listen to this proposal of an accommodation ; which, in order to effect, they promised to be at Cologne on the day of Epiphany of the following year ; but as their sole intention was to gain time to strengthen their party, the negotiation did not succeed <sup>i</sup>. That which was set on foot by the king of Hungary, and the principal noblemen of Bohemia, had no better effect, altho' they had assembled and agreed to assist Winceslaus in his endeavours to recover the imperial crown. This affair miscarried, because, when they were deliberating upon measures for raising money to defray the expence of the war, Winceslaus refused to contribute, and the assembly, being incensed at the sordid refusal, broke up abruptly, without having come to any resolution. The king of Bohemia, indeed, earnestly intreated
- c them to renew the negotiation, and Sigismund, in consequence of his intreaties, consented to an interview, when he promised to supply him with considerable succours, provided he would yield to him some territories, and bequeath to him the kingdom of Bohemia at his death ; conditions that were so displeasing to Winceslaus, that he retired without taking leave of his brother <sup>k</sup>.

The king of Hungary and the noblemen of Bohemia interest themselves for the deposed emperor.

MEAN while the new emperor employed his whole care in remedying the disorders and divisions which had crept into the empire, during the reigns of Charles IV. and his son, and in reclaiming the dominions which they had alienated. For this purpose, in the first year of his reign, a diet was convoked at Frankfort, where he deliberated with the electors, princes, noblemen, and deputies of towns, upon ways and means for re-establishing tran-

Robert remedies the disorders of the empire, and reclaims the dominions and rights which had been alienated.

- d quility, order, and security in the empire ; and, in consequence of these deliberations, several laws were enacted and put in execution. As the electors, in their sentence of deposition pronounced against Winceslaus, had alleged, among other things, that he had, for a sum of money, created John Galeazzo duke of Milan, tho' he was no other than governor of Lombardy ; and that the new duke, not contented with this promotion, pretended to withdraw those countries from the sovereignty of the empire, and by force of arms make himself master of Florence, Mantua, Bologna, and other towns and countries, to be incorporated with his duchy ; Robert found himself under a necessity of raising an army for restoring the affairs of Italy to their former situation ; being moreover invited to this expedition by pope Boniface, and the Florentines, who promised to advance two hundred thousand florins for the expence of the undertaking <sup>l</sup>. He therefore made long marches to
- e Italy, and encamped before the city of Brixen, in the duchy of Milan : but Galeazzo, being well provided with cavalry, had in all their skirmishes the advantage of the imperialists, whom he fatigued and diminished in such a manner, that, notwithstanding considerable succours which arrived that same year, with the archbishop of Cologne and Leopold duke of Austria, Robert was obliged to return to Germany, without having been able to strike any one stroke of importance. Besides, his return was rendered necessary, because the other states refused to perform their promise to second the enterprize, being in this particular influenced by the elector of Mentz, who, not contented with hindering the ecclesiastics from paying the tenth which the pope had granted to Robert for his Italian expedition, had
- f also alienated their affection from the emperor. For these reasons he was obliged, next year, to march back into his own country <sup>m</sup>, without having advanced his own cause in Italy, either against Galeazzo duke of Milan, or done any thing in favour of the pope, against Ladislaus king of Naples, who some years after took the city of Rome, and expelled Boniface <sup>n</sup> (L).

Galeazo aspires to the throne of Italy; but dies in the midst of his career.
A. D. 1403.

THE retreat of Robert leaving the field free to Galeazo, he proposed no less than the conquest of the whole kingdom of Italy; and fortune at first seemed to declare in favour of this undertaking; for he made himself master of the city of Bologna, and was on the eve of reducing Florence, when he was attacked by a malignant fever, which put an end to his life. As he left but one daughter, who was not of age, the pope availed himself of this opportunity to wrest from the Milanese, Bologna, Perugia, and some other places. The city of Milan shook off the yoke of Galeazo: Verona submitted to the vicar of the empire established at Padua, but some time after the Venetians possessed themselves of that city. Ladislaus, who had been invited to ascend the throne of Hungary, found himself, in consequence of a strange revolution, unable to cope with his competitor Sigismund, and at the same time in danger of losing his hereditary kingdom of Naples, the nobility of which had revolted in his absence. Thither, therefore, he repaired with all imaginable dispatch, and punished the rebels with such severity, as seemed to be rather the effect of cruel revenge, than the sacrifice of deliberate justice.

The emperor employs himself in aggrandizing his own electorate.

THIS was a favourable conjuncture for retrieving the authority of the empire in Italy, if Robert had undertaken a second expedition into that country; but this he found impracticable, because the electors of Mentz, Cologne, and Triers, opposed the levy of the tenths. He, therefore, employed himself at home, in pacifying the troubles of the empire, in reducing the towns that refused to acknowledge him for emperor, and aggrandizing the dominions of his own electorate; for which purpose he purchased of William, bishop of Straßburg, the fiefs of Gegenbach, Ortemberg, Offenbourg, Zell, Hermanbach, and several other lordships of Alsace, tho' not without great opposition from the chapter and body of burghers, who would by no means consent to this alienation; and the emperor did not think proper to use violent methods for the support of his acquisition, as he was not yet quite fixed on the imperial throne.

Makes war on Bernard marquis of Baden;
A. D. 1404.

BERNARD, marquis of Baden, had established tolls in his dominions, contrary to the regulations of the public peace, compelled passengers to pay ransom, and imposed excessive duties upon commerce; so that complaints of these exactions were laid before the emperor, who desired Bernard to suppress these iniquitous impositions; but he, instigated by the elector of Mentz, refused to obey the orders of Robert, who declared war against him, took the castle of Mulberg, and compelled him to sue for peace; which was granted, on condition that he should, for the future, attempt nothing against the liberties and immunities of the noblemen, cities, and subjects of the empire.

A. D. 1405.

NOTWITHSTANDING this accommodation, he afterwards engaged in a treaty with Eberhard count de Wurtemberg, the magistrates of Straßburg, and the towns of Suabia; the principal article of which imported, that, should the emperor presume to encroach upon the rights and privileges of any one of the confederated parties, the rest should assist the said party with their troops and money. Robert complained of this injurious association, which supposed that he had an intention to invade the privileges of his subjects, and even summoned the towns of Suabia to appear at a general diet, and explain their motives for this confederacy, which, however, subsisted to the day of his death.

War breaks out between the house of Austria and the city of Basil.
A. D. 1406.

IN spite of all his endeavours to preserve the peace of the empire, a war broke out between Catharine of Burgundy, wife of Leopold of Austria, and the inhabitants of Basil; and notwithstanding the interposition of Lewis count palatine of the Rhine, who attempted to compromise the dispute, hostilities were committed with various success, and great cruelty on both sides (tho' the Austrians were the greatest sufferers in the desolation of the province of Suntgau), until peace was at last established, after the war had raged for the space of two years. The negotiations were renewed by means of Rodolphus, marquis of Hochberg, allied to the city of Basil. A congress being appointed at Ensisheim, the peace was happily concluded, and a league, offensive and defensive, for the term of six years, took place between the town of Basil and Frederic duke of Austria, successor to Leopold, who died without male issue; tho' his widow Catherine was left in possession of Suntgau, and the territories belonging to the house of Austria in Alsace.

a or perform any other religious function, while Hufs should reside in that capital. The publication of this sentence was followed by troubles and sedition: Winceflaus shut himself up in the fortrefs of Visigrade, and John Hufs retired to Huffinet, the place of his nativity, where he appealed from the judgment of the pope, to the holy trinity, and wrote to the cardinals, offering to give an account of his faith, even at the hazard of the fire, before the university of Prague, and in the presence of those who had attended his lectures and sermons<sup>s</sup>.

THE success of John Hufs, however, was extremely prejudicial to the university of Prague; for he was no sooner admitted into that body, than, by his cabals and interest with Winceflaus, he deprived the Germans of two in three votes which they had in the election of a rector; and this deprivation incensed them so much, that they abandoned the university; some repairing to the academy at Leipsic, lately founded by Frederic William duke of Saxony; and others settling at Erford, Ingoldstadt, Rostock, and Cracovia<sup>t</sup>.

BENEDICT XIII. and Gregory XII. tho' they had sworn to resign the pontificate, still found new pretences to evade the performance of their oath; and in the mean time their dispute was attended with very tragical consequences. John of Bavaria was appointed bishop of Liege by Gregory, and Theodoric de Pervis nominated to the same see by Benedict. This competition produced a civil war, in which were engaged the counts of Flanders, Namur, Holland, and the elector of Cologne, as the supporters of John; while the party of Pervis was supported by Liege, Louvain, Brussels, and all the towns of Brabant, which raised fifty thousand men for his service. Pervis, at the head of this army, invested Maastricht, to which John had retired, and carried on the siege with such vigour, that the place was reduced to the utmost extremity; when it was relieved by the duke of Burgundy, who marched to the succour of John, defeated his adversary in a pitched battle, and conducted him in triumph to Liege, which was abandoned to pillage. John, upon this occasion, condemned one hundred and twenty noblemen to lose their heads; a greater number was hanged; and four-and-twenty were thrown headlong into the Meuse, together with the legate of Benedict, and all the officers of Pervis. The savage prelate, not contented with these sacrifices to his revenge, re-united to his see all the privileges of the city of Liege, the county of Loos, the Hasbaye, St. Tron, and the duchy of Bouillon: he suppressed the offices of bailie, provost, mayor, and sheriff, and fined the province and the town of Liege in two hundred thousand crowns, for which he took hostages<sup>u</sup>.

WHILE Gregory XII. who was acknowledged pope in Italy, convened a council in Aquila, to which he invited Robert and other Christian kings; and Benedict XIII. who was owned for pope in France, held another council at Catalonia; the cardinals convoked a third at Pisa; and the emperor, assembling the electors at Bacharat, and afterwards at Nuremberg, appointed the meeting of a diet in the city of Frankfort; at which were present two cardinals, one from Gregory, and another from the sacred college. After long and public debates, the opinions of the assembly were divided between the two popes, the greatest part of the archbishops, prelates, and princes, espousing the cause of the cardinals; and the emperor, together with the archbishop of Triers, the duke of Bavaria, and some others, declaring for Gregory, who proposed that a council should be held at Udina, in the Friuli, under the direction of the emperor, by whose decision he promised to abide<sup>x</sup>. Robert, therefore sent an archbishop, two bishops, two doctors, and his chancellor, as ambassadors to Pisa, to prove, by learned arguments, that the cardinals ought not to have deposed Gregory; but finding they could gain no converts to this opinion, and that the cardinals being attached to Winceflaus, would not even own their master for emperor, they appealed from the council of Pisa to an œcumenical council, and retired without taking leave. Notwithstanding this appeal, the council proceeded to the deposition of the two popes, and raised Alexander V. to the papal chair; by which election the schism was augmented. The emperor wrote to several princes, assuring them, that the council of Pisa was not canonical, and that he would continue to acknowledge Gregory as the true pope, until a lawful and canonical sentence should be pronounced against him.

order to weaken the force of the emperor's resentment, found means to detach several German bishops from his party, by creating them legates of the holy see; and these exerted all their endeavours to establish the authority of the council at Pisa. But the efforts of their zeal were in a little time suspended by the death of Alexander, in whose room seventeen cardinals, in the conclave, elected Balthazar Cossa, cardinal dean of St. Eustache, who assumed the name of John XXIII. and was acknowledged by the greatest part of Europe; for Benedict was owned by no nation but Spain and Scotland; and all Gregory's influence extended no farther than some dominions of Italy and Germany, in which the authority of Robert prevailed <sup>a</sup>.

LADISLAUS, king of Poland, was diverted from interesting himself in these events, by a war in which he was engaged with the knights of the Teutonic order, who had detained twenty of his ships laden with corn for the use of the Lithuanians, and refused to make proper satisfaction. Both parties had recourse to arms; the knights made an irruption into Poland, and were defeated with great slaughter, near Kalisch. This misfortune was the more severe, as it produced a revolt in the towns of Prussia, which returned to the dominion of Poland <sup>b</sup>.

By this time Robert had almost extinguished all the factions in Germany, and would have enjoyed the peaceful fruits of his policy and discretion, had not John, elector of Mentz, who was his indefatigable enemy, still found fresh expedients to keep him in vexation. He had been the instrument of forming associations and leagues against the imperial authority; he had traversed him in all the steps he took for terminating the schism in the church; and another cause of misunderstanding between them was a castle, which the elector began to build in Hochst against the will of the emperor, who put his troops in motion, in order to hinder him by force from proceeding; but this design was frustrated by a fever, which attacked him at Oppenheim, and put a period to his life, in the ninth year of his reign <sup>c</sup>. The distribution of his hereditary dominions.

THIS prince acquired the surname of Short, on account of his stature, tho' he was extremely vigorous and active. Yet he is more celebrated for his justice and clemency to men, and his piety to God, than for his magnanimity, or warlike exploits. He had made some progress in letters, was endowed with uncommon penetration, and there is no other blemish in his character, than that of being a little addicted to the love of money. During his last illness, he named seven trustees (N) for the distribution of his dominions among his children; and, according to their regulation, Lewis with the long Beard, otherwise surnamed the Blind, whose elder brothers, Rupert, Pepin, and Frederic, were dead, succeeded to the electorate of Palatine and the lordship of Amberg. John had Sulzbach, Nuburgh, and the county of Cham. Simmerin, Deux Ponts, Lutzelstein, fell to the share of Stephen, and Sintzheim was Otto's patrimony (O). <sup>d</sup>

AFTER the death of Rupert, Jodocus, or Josse, marquis of Moravia, is said to have been elected emperor <sup>a</sup>, and to have lived six months after his election; but as he was never acknowledged, he cannot justly be ranked among the emperors. Not but that he was regularly elected at Frankfort by a majority of the members assembled at the diet convoked by John archbishop of Mentz: tho' Sigismund was at the same time proclaimed king of the Romans by the archbishop of Triers and the count palatine; so that at this period there were three emperors and three popes, and each had a number of adherents; for Winceslaus still maintained his title to the imperial throne <sup>c</sup>.

S I G I S M U N D.

THIS prince's death was no sooner known, than the archbishop of Triers, and the count palatine of the Rhine, pressed the electoral college to confirm the choice which they had made during the preceding year; but as it refused to decide an affair of such consequence, without the participation of the states, the archbishop of Mentz assembled a diet at Frankfort, where Sigismund was elected by the unanimous consent of the electors.

SIGISMUND, the son of the emperor Charles VI. and brother to Winceslaus, had, before his elevation to the imperial dignity, reigned seven-and-twenty years in the kingdom of Hungary, since the death of Lewis his father-in-law, whom he succeeded. As this prince was promoted to the empire on account of his great qualities, and the wise conduct he maintained in his own government, in the midst of many difficulties, it will not be unreasonable to say something in this place of the means by which he was raised to that throne.

HE had been sent while he was yet very young, to the court of Lewis king of Hungary; who had no other children than two daughters, Mary and Heduvige, the younger of whom had been promised to Jagellon, grand duke of Lithuania, who married her, and afterwards ascended the throne of Poland, while Mary the eldest was betrothed to Sigismund. Lewis, for this reason, caused him to be educated with great care, and prevailed upon the states of the kingdom to nominate him as his successor, on condition that his marriage with Mary should be consummated. But, before this condition could be fulfilled,

His education in Hungary.

Lewis died, and Mary succeeded to the throne, under the regency of queen Elizabeth, her mother, assisted by the counsels of Nicholas Gara, count or grand master of the palace, because Sigismund, being at that time but fifteen years of age, had not married the princess, nor was supposed capable of governing the dominions. This minister engrossed the whole authority under these queens, and became extremely arrogant in consequence of his success; yet, in order to render his power still more absolute, he began to sow suspicions and jealousies between his mistresses and the principal noblemen of the kingdom; a wicked piece of policy, which proved fatal to the state, by creating a general aversion against the government; and to such a degree did this disaffection prevail, that the nobles privately sent the bishop of Zagabria, with an offer of the crown of Hungary to Charles Durazzo, king of Naples, who was related to the young queen. That prince joyfully embraced the proposal, notwithstanding the dissuasions of his queen, and most faithful adherents; and, after having settled the affairs of Sicily to his own mind, began to prepare for his journey to Hungary. Queen Elizabeth, apprised of these secret transactions, and understanding that Charles was actually upon the road to take possession of the kingdom, and effect a marriage between Mary and his son Ladislav, in order to secure the crown to his own family by that alliance; the queen, I say, informed of these circumstances, resolved, if possible, to frustrate his designs, and, as the first step, solemnized the marriage of Sigismund with her daughter. This affair was no sooner concluded, than she sent Sigismund into Bohemia, because he was not yet powerful enough to maintain an open war against his competitor. In the mean time, Charles arrived at Offen, where the court of Hungary resided, and was very honourably received by the queens; who, dissembling their resentment, seemed even to concur with the Hungarians in raising him to the throne. He was no sooner acknowledged king, than he took the administration into his own hands, and the ceremony of his coronation was performed with great magnificence. But, as his promotion was entirely owing to popular passion and caprice, the noblemen and people in a little time grew tired of his government; and, changing their note, expatiated on all occasions upon the virtues of their queens. Elizabeth, who had amused Charles with the hopes of a treaty, by which Sigismund would resign the kingdom in his favour, having observed this happy change in the minds of the subjects, resolved to profit by the occasion, and rid herself of this new intruder; and this expedient she used to effect her purpose. She and her daughter, together with the Palatine Gara, invited him to their apartment in the palace, in order to communicate a letter, which she pretended to have received from Sigismund, touching his renunciation of the crown. Charles went thither without the least suspicion, and had no sooner sat down by Elizabeth, than the Palatine entered the room, accompanied by a man employed for that purpose; who, passing behind the king, cleft his head with a sabre, tho' he did not die till some days after he had received the stroke <sup>a</sup> (P).

ELIZABETH, thinking she had thus dissipated the faction of Charles by his death, re-established herself in her former authority, and few people presumed to call her conduct in question, as this cruel scheme had been executed in consequence of the assurances she had received of the fidelity of her subjects. Nevertheless, this murder did not pass unpunished; for some time after, the queens being on a progress through Lower Hungary, with the Palatine Gara and their ordinary retinue, Hiornard, governor, or judge provincial, of Croatia, who had been appointed by king Charles, resolved to surprise the assassins. For this purpose he assembled a good number of men, and laid an ambuscade upon the road; by which the court was surrounded, the Palatine and murderer of Charles were cut to pieces, and all the domestics of Gara killed, without pity, in their endeavours to save the life of their master. Nor was less inhumanity used towards the queen-mother Elizabeth, whom they pulled out of her vehicle, and dragged by the hair of the head before the judge provincial. There she, in a pathetic manner, pleaded her own cause; alleging, that king Charles had treated the princess Mary with contempt and derision, and unjustly dispossessed her of her kingdom. She, moreover, threw herself on her knees before him, implored his pardon for the assassination, and conjured him to remember the favours he had received from the late king Lewis her husband. The princess Mary, kneeling also before him, reinforced the supplications of her mother, beseeching him to manifest his gratitude to her father's house; but their grief, humiliation, and remonstrances, had no effect. Mary was inclosed in a dismal dungeon, and the queen-mother, notwithstanding all her tears and intreaties, miserably drowned in the rivulet of Roseth. Such was the fruit of her minister's violent counsels, to which she had paid a blind and implicit regard. Sigismund no sooner understood the particulars of this piteous catastrophe, than he set out with a powerful army, which he had gradually assembled, and marched strait into Hungary, where he was received with open arms, and universal applause. His arrival in that kingdom did not a little disconcert Hiornard, who had no reason to expect that his cruelty would pass unpunished. With a view, therefore, to divert, or at least diminish, the fury of the impending storm, he removed queen Mary into a comfortable apartment, and ordered her to be treated according to her quality. He even visited her in prison, and proposed that she should be allowed to return to Hungary, provided she would insure his life, his office, and his fortune. This was such a welcome proposal, that she confirmed the promise by an oath; adding, that she would look upon him as her father, from the moment she should obtain her liberty. In consequence of this promise, the judge provincial sent her with an escort of troops to Offen, where her husband king Sigismund waited for her coming, and where she was received with all the demonstrations of public joy.

SOME days after her return, the states of Hungary assembled at Cronweissembourg, where Sigismund was crowned, in the twentieth year of his age; and this ceremony was no sooner performed, than he resolved to revenge the cruelty which had been exercised upon the queen his mother-in-law: his wife, indeed, had promised, and even swore, that she would never punish the perpetrators of that murder; but she could not undertake for the conduct of her husband, who determined to make an example of the chief actor in that tragedy. He accordingly sent proper persons into Croatia, who apprehended the judge provincial and his accomplices, and conducted them to the city of the Five Churches, or Fünfkirchen. There, in consequence of a sentence pronounced by Sigismund, Hiornard's hands being tied behind his back, he was dragged through the streets, his flesh tore off with red hot pincers, and, being quartered, the four parts of his body were hung up in the four most conspicuous places of the city: while all his accomplices were beheaded, except the bishop of Zagabria, whose life was spared on account of his function, tho' he was expelled from the see, and his estate confiscated. Sigismund had not been many years in possession of his good fortune, when, upon a journey he received the news of his queen's death, which affected him to such a degree, that he detached himself from the world for some time, and indulged his grief in retirement at Offen. Whether this melancholy occasion recalled the remembrance of the revolt, in consequence of which Charles had been invited to the throne; or that he could no longer suppress the resentment which he harboured against the authors of that revolution, who seemed to brow-beat him in security, without having ever condescended to solicit his forgiveness; certain it is, he resolved to call them to a severe account for the rebellion in which they had been engaged; and employed an officer, whose name was George Weidassen, to arrest them privately, without reflecting on he was thrown in prison, a poisoned plaister applied to his head, and, that not producing the desired effect, he was strangled. His body was buried without pomp, in the

- a the troublesome consequences of such a measure. A prince cannot too cautiously revolve every circumstance of a step which he proposes to take without the advice of his council, every member of which is, in some measure, an addition to the sagacity, as well as a sanction to the conduct, of his sovereign. Weidassen, having assembled a good number of troops, on pretence of going to visit Lower Hungary, fell in with the delinquents; who, suspecting his design, had united in a body and taken the field: but he attacked them in the night, took them all prisoners, loaded them with fetters, and sent them to the king at Offen. When they were brought to their trial before Sigismund, and some princes and noblemen, they would not make an obeisance to the king, nor answer to the questions that were asked; so much did they despise the danger of their situation. An instance of indifference
- b and disrespect, which provoked Sigismund to such a degree, that he ordered them to be instantly beheaded<sup>1</sup>; and the sentence was accordingly executed upon two and thirty noblemen, distinguished not only by their birth, but also by the services they had done the state. Stephen Contus, one of the chiefs of this confederacy, looked upon death with such fortitude and contempt, that he desired the executioner to strike him on the fore part of the neck, because he could never brook the thought of receiving a wound behind. This cruel execution made such an impression on many of the princes, that they conceived an abhorrence for Sigismund, whom they inveighed against as a tyrant, and against whom they afterwards rebelled.
- c BAJAZET, the Turkish sultan, taking the advantage of these intestine troubles, and probably invited by the malcontents of the kingdom, marched towards the frontiers, in order to invade the country; but chancing to intercept a messenger with a letter from Emanuel, emperor of Constantinople, to Sigismund, apprising this last of the Turkish expedition, he was so much incensed against the sender, that, postponing his design upon Hungary, he turned his arms against Constantinople, which he suddenly invested by sea and land: being there informed that Sigismund had taken the field with a numerous army, reinforced by French and Germans, to the amount of 100,000 men, and advanced to the city of Nicopolis, he instantly raised the blockade; and, marching thither with great expedition, attacked the Christians in the night, and cut their whole army in pieces<sup>m</sup>. In this battle, a great part of the Hungarian nobility was slain, and the kingdom sustained such a loss, as laid it open
- d to the incursions of the enemy (Q). As for Sigismund, who escaped the carnage by flight, instead of exerting his endeavours to repair this fatal overthrow, he abandoned himself wholly to his pleasures, without bestowing the least attention to the necessities of the state; so that the aversion and contempt of his subjects every day increased against him; the nobles and governors of provinces openly taxed him with indolence and mal-administration; and, finding the people ripe for revolt, secured his person, and committed him to the custody of the two sons of Gara, whom he had put to death, because they were known to be his most bitter enemies<sup>n</sup>. Then they proclaimed Ladislaus king of Hungary; and this prince, who was son of Charles king of Naples, entering Dalmatia, was received as sovereign in the city of Zara: nevertheless, the castle of Buda, and the other fortresses of the kingdom,
- e together with High Hungary, still faithfully adhered to the oath which they had taken in favour of Sigismund, even while he was a miserable prisoner, subjected to all the insolence and rancour of his most inveterate foes. Notwithstanding this deplorable situation, such was his address, that he gradually insinuated himself into the favour of Gara's widow, who, at length, fairly undertook to effect his enlargement. With this view she held frequent consultations with her sons, to whom she observed, that such attempts upon the person of a sovereign were usually attended with fatal consequences; that the people were unsteady in their resolutions, and might as suddenly restore as they had deposed the king; and, even if such a revolution should not happen, that the successor would revenge upon them the cause of Sigismund, through fear of meeting with the same ill usage. She likewise displayed
- f the honour and advantage which they might acquire by setting the king at liberty. These remonstrances were not lost upon her sons, whom the king promised, upon oath, to invest with Moravia, provided they would enable him to make the grant effectual. Thus persuaded, they enlarged, and conducted him to that province, from whence he repaired to Bohemia.

(Q) Historians are much divided about the battle of Nicopolis. Leunclavius affirms, that it was fought in the year 1393; and Juvenalis Ursinus, archbishop of Rheims, an historian of those days, confirms this date, by observing, that Sigismund wrote a letter that same year to the king of France, describing the battle, and soliciting succours to repair his loss. On the other hand, Bonfinius, Thorosius, and Aventinus, agree in placing it three years later; so that, in all probability, the Hungarians were twice beaten near the same place; but the overthrow they sustained in the year 1396 seems to have been the most important: for we do not find, that Sigismund made another effort against the victor. It appears also, that there was a great number of French in his army at this battle, who were probably sent in consequence of his solicitations, after his first defeat.

resumes his authority.

THERE having raised a considerable army, he marched back into his kingdom, and, without opposition, reduced the whole country to obedience. He kept the promise which he had made to his deliverers; and, during the rest of his reign, comported himself with such clemency and affability towards his enemies, as well as friends, that he soon retrieved the friendship and confidence of his people. From his own experience, which cost him so much, he extracted this maxim, that he who can neither forgive, nor occasionally connive, will never make great proficiency in the art of reigning.

He is called to the empire.

HIS reputation extended to the neighbouring nations; and the states of Germany thought they could not find a more accomplished prince to wear the imperial crown.

Sigismund
alienates the
Brandenburg.

THE news of his confirmation found him in Hungary, from whence he immediately set out for the empire; and, in order to fulfil the expectation of those who called him to this high dignity, he resolved to employ his whole attention in remedying two grievances, under which Germany at that time groaned; these were, the confusion, oppression, and disorder, which prevailed in the provinces, and the schism which had for thirty years distracted the church. He began his reign with alienating the electorate of Brandenburg in favour of Frederic burgrave of Nuremberg, sprung from the counts of Hohenzollern, a prince of great merit, from whom the present marquisses of Brandenburg are descended (R). For this purchase he gave four hundred thousand florins; but Sigismund reserved to himself and his brother the right of redemption for the same sum, in case the male heirs of the burgrave should fail.

A. D. 1411.

AT this assembly too, he mediated an accommodation between William count de Berg and Theodoric de Meurs, who had been at war for several years about the archbishopric of Cologne, for which William and Theodoric were competitors. The first had been confirmed by Gregory XIII. and the other by John XXIII. The dispute was left to the decision of arms. Theodoric defeated his adversary, and returned in triumph to Cologne, where he was received with extraordinary acclamations; while William was fain to sue for peace, which he obtained, on condition of renouncing all his pretensions to the archbishopric, and marrying Theodoric's niece, daughter of the count of Tecklembourg.

He exhorts

THIS affair being happily compromised, the emperor endeavoured, by remonstrances, to reform the court of his brother Winceslaus, which was a scene of riot, luxury, and excess, and afforded a dangerous example to the whole kingdom of Bohemia; but all his representations proved ineffectual, even though Sigismund threatened to put him to the ban of the empire, unless he would amend his way of life.

order.

THE next affair that engrossed the emperor's attention, was the war between Ladislaus king of Poland, and the Teutonic order, which, though generally disadvantageous to the knights, was still maintained by the industry of Henry de Plaven, the grand master, who raised sums of money, by mortgaging to Winceslaus some fiefs belonging to the order in Bohemia, and even found means to detach the duke of Lithuania from the interest of Poland. Ladislaus, in this emergency, made advances towards a peace, which was accordingly effected, on condition that his Polish majesty should relinquish all his pretensions upon Prussia to the Teutonic order. But he afterwards engaged in a private treaty with the emperor, who repaired to Cracovia on pretence of a visit; by which agreement the two princes promised to join their forces, invade Prussia, destroy the Teutonic order, and divide between them the conquered dominions. At the same time, both these princes made an offensive and defensive alliance with Saladine, cham of the Tartars, who engaged to assist them against all their enemies.

A. D. 1412.

SOME time after this agreement, he was obliged to march towards Dalmatia, in consequence of a quarrel with the Venetians, touching the possession of that country, on which they had laid violent hands, as well as upon many places that belonged to the empire: provoked by these invasions, he marched against them with an army of Hungarians, and reduced several castles and strong places; but as he had, by a public edict, commanded the German princes to take the field, and assist him in this war, and not one of them had obeyed the summons, he did not think it prudent to proceed at his own expence; but concluded a peace with the first opportunity. After this treaty, he advanced into Lombardy, under various pretences, though his sole aim was to finish the negotiation which he had begun with pope John XXIII. touching the convocation of a general council, by which the peace of the church might be restored, in extinguishing the schism produced from the fac-

Upon this subject, he had several conferences with the legates of John, who waited upon him in person at Placentia, and then accompanied him at Lodi, where they came to a determination of convoking a council. Bulls were accordingly expedited, appointing it to be held at Constance, and to be opened on the first day of November, in the following year<sup>1</sup>.

THE emperor, upon this occasion, published a memorial inviting all the bishops of Christendom to the council, and promising safe conducts to all those who should think them necessary; he sent ambassadors to Charles VI. of France, to solicit his personal appearance at this assembly; he wrote on the same subject to Benedict XIII. who had retired into the dominions of Spain; and in a letter to Gregory XII. who resided in the kingdom of Naples, b earnestly desired he would repair to Constance, and refer his cause to the decision of an oecumenical council, which he (the emperor) had agreed with John to assemble, in order to terminate the fatal disputes of the church<sup>2</sup>.

OVER and above these precautions, Sigismund, overflowing with zeal for the interests of religion, repassed the Alps, and made a progress through divers provinces in Germany, in order to dispose the minds of the people for concurring with his pious intention of finishing the schism. He reconciled the bishop and chapter with the citizens of Strasburg, and confirmed the privileges granted by his predecessors to the imperial towns united to the prefecture of Alsace; but the two antipopes exerted all their endeavours to traverse his design: both protested against the council with great virulence. Benedict convoked an assembly at c Perpignan, where he did not fail to fulminate bulls of excommunication; and Gregory, who sojourned at Rimini, appeared in public with the pontifical ornaments, and enjoyed the protection of Ladislaus, whom he had gained over to his interest.

THIS prince, contrary to the peace which he had lately made with pope John, took possession of the city of Rome, together with the church-lands, and resolved to make himself master of all Italy. With this view he marched towards Tuscany, with a powerful army to act against the Florentines and pope John, who had retired to Bologna; but being attacked with a violent disorder, which was the effect of poison, he retired to Naples, where, in a few months, he expired<sup>3</sup>. The peace of Italy being restored by his death, left the pope, cardinals, archbishops, and prelates, at liberty to repair to Constance, where John arrived d in the end of October. In the mean time Sigismund, who had returned to Germany, in order to be crowned before he should set out for the council, being at Spire upon some business which had called him thither, granted a safe-conduct, on the faith of which John Huss repaired to Constance, to give an account of his doctrine<sup>4</sup>. Then Sigismund set out for Aix, where he was crowned on the eighth of November; and the ceremony was no sooner performed than he departed, with his empress queen, and a very numerous court, for Constance, where he arrived on the twenty-third day of December, in the evening (S). Next day he assisted at the midnight mass, which pope John celebrated in his pontificals, the emperor himself being clothed in the imperial dalmatic, and performing the office of a deacon, according to the custom on such occasions. On his first arrival at Constance, he convoked a e general congregation, in which he gave an account of his negotiations with Gregory and Benedict, and, in particular, gave them to understand, that he had sent a doctor of laws to Spain, to expostulate with Benedict, who had promised to give the emperor a meeting at Nice in Provence, in the month of June. At the same time, measures were taken for preventing that confusion, which might have arisen from a concourse of above one hundred thousand strangers, who repaired to Constance on this occasion; and Sigismund left the fathers of the council at free liberty to treat of the affairs of the church.

IN the first session, which was held on the sixteenth of November, the meeting was prorogued to the second of March, in the next year, when they expected the emperor in person; and that day being arrived, the fathers of the council having deliberated upon expedients for removing the schism, and re-establishing the union of the church, concluded, f that nothing would so effectually conduce to this salutary end as the resignation of the competitors. John himself, who presided in the council, assented to this opinion, and promised authentically to renounce his title, provided Angelo Corrario, who had assumed the name of Gregory XII. and Peter de Luna, distinguished by that of Benedict XIII. would imitate him in that act of self-denial. He had no sooner made this declaration, than the emperor, rising from his chair, ran and embraced his feet, applauding him for such a Christian resignation; for which also he was solemnly thanked by the patriarch of Antioch, in the name of the whole council; but some days after he repented of this condescension, and, by the advice and assistance of Frederic duke of Austria, fled from Constance in the night, disguised in a a lay habit, and retired to Schaffhausen<sup>2</sup>; whither he was followed by several cardinals, and from whence he afterwards withdrew to the castle of Luffenberg. Though this sudden retreat at first disconcerted the council, which John declared to be dissolved in consequence of his secession, they at length agreed that a council was superior to the pope; and, after many debates, and proceedings, confirmed the sentence of his deposition, decreed that no other pope should be chosen without the deliberation and consent of the council; and that he, together with his competitors, Angelo Corrario and Peter de Luna, should be for ever excluded from the papacy. John, finding them determined, thought proper to yield to the torrent, rather than run the risque of meeting with worse treatment in attempting to oppose it, and quietly acquiesced in the sentence, freely renouncing the pontificate, the marks of which he immediately resigned. Some days after this resignation, Gregory XII. b sent a legate to the emperor and council, to renounce his title in the same manner. As for Frederic, duke of Austria, he had been summoned by the emperor to appear and answer to the charge of being accessory to the flight of John; and as he did not think proper to obey, was outlawed, put to the ban of the empire, and divested of his dominions; which the Swiss were impowered to subdue for their own benefit<sup>2</sup>. They accordingly conquered the country of Tergow, which they afterwards refused to restore, upon the emperor's reconciliation with Frederic; who was obliged to confirm their conquest by an authentic deed.

In the following sessions of this council, the affair of John Hufs and Jerom of Prague was brought upon the carpet; the former, as hath been already said, had imbibed his new doctrine from the writings of Wickliffe (T), and converted to his opinions several masters c of the university of Prague, together with an infinite number of other people. Among others, his sect was espoused by Jerom, master of arts, whom he engaged as his colleague, and prevailed upon to preach against the primacy of the pope; who, being apprised of their presumption, had cited them both to appear at Rome. Though they refused to obey this citation, they afterwards condescended to appear at the council of Constance, in order to justify the doctrine they professed. John Hufs, being provided with a safe-conduct from the emperor, attempted to defend the articles of his faith before the fathers of the council, who were disposed to condemn him unheard, when John of Cblum and Winceslaus of Duba, having protested against such unjust proceedings, the emperor sent the count palatine and margrave of Brandenburg to desire the cardinals would hear what Hufs had to say in his own d defence. He was accordingly questioned in presence of Sigismund, and accused of heresy in thirty-nine articles, part of which he denied, and part he offered to defend; but his voice was drowned by the noise which was purposely made by the fathers of the council (U). At length, being asked if he was willing to abjure all the thirty-nine articles, he answered in the negative. He was immediately declared by the council a sower of sedition, a hardened heretic, a disciple and obstinate defender of Wickliffe. As such he was degraded by four bishops, stripped of his sacerdotal habit, and clothed with another dress. His hair was cut in form of a cross; upon his head was put a paper mitre, painted with the representation of three devils, and he was delivered over to the secular judge, who condemned him and his writings to the flames, and fixed the sixth of July for his execution. e

BEING brought to the place of punishment, he was tied to the stake, and surrounded with faggots of wood and bundles of straw, and before they were kindled, the duke of Bavaria and the count of Papenheim approached, and exhorted him to recant; but as he rejected their advice with disdain, protested his own innocence, and began to declaim against the emperor and fathers of the council, the duke retired, and ordered the executioners to do their duty<sup>b</sup>. That his adherents might not carry off his ashes, they were thrown into the Rhine; but this precaution did not hinder his followers to take up the earth on which he suffered; of this they transported parcels to their separate homes, and preserved them as sacred relics. Nay, they protested, in public writings, against the execution, as an act committed contrary to the law of God, of nature, and of nations, as well as to the inclination of the emperor himself. Certain it is, that prince took umbrage at these proceedings, which he thought prejudicial to his honour, on account of the safe-conduct which he had granted. But he was given to understand, that his word could not be called in ques- f

(T) Wickliffe, who was principal of Baliol college in Oxford, wrote and preached against the infallibility and supremacy of the pope, the temporal power of ecclesiastics, the order of mendicants, auricular confession, and the doctrine of transubstantiation (14).

(U) John Hufs is said to have spoke to this effect. "I am come hither to prove my innocence, and give an account of my faith; but I did not come until I had obtained the passport of the emperor, who is here present, and who undertook for the security of my person." So saying, he fixed his eyes upon Sigismund, who blushed at this address, as being ashamed of his breach of promise (1).

a tion, because the council, being superior to the emperor, his safe-conduct had been over-ruled and annulled by the sentence of the church, to which the princes ought to submit in matters of faith.

b AFTER the execution of John Hufs, the council resumed the affair of Peter de Luna, who still obstinately refused to quit his pretensions to the papacy. Upon this occasion Sigismund offered to go to Spain in person, and engage the mediation of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, with whom Peter had taken refuge, by which he hoped to effect a voluntary renunciation like that of the other two, before the council should proceed to extremity. His journey had before been resolved upon; but the time and place of meeting were changed. He set out for Spain, accompanied by twelve deputies from the council; and on his arrival at Perpignan, he entered into a negotiation with Peter de Luna, the result of which was sent to the council, though his interposition had not the desired effect.

c THE obstinacy of Benedict incensed the emperor to such a degree, that he threatened to obtain by force that assent, which the other refused to give by fair means; and Benedict, in consequence of these menaces, retired suddenly to the fortress of Paniscola, where he resolved to preserve his pontifical dignity to his latest breath. This unexpected flight deprived him of all his partizans. The king of Arragon, with all the princes and bishops of his party, sent deputies to the emperor at Narbonne, with whom they agreed, that the council should invite all the former adherents of Benedict to come to Constance, and join their endeavours for re-establishing the peace of the church; and that, on their arrival, a new pope should be chosen. This agreement, known by the name of the Capitulation of Narbonne, being transmitted to the fathers in council, was forthwith put in execution; and Sigismund, that he might neglect nothing which could contribute to the peace of the church, or the re-establishment of concord among Christian princes, particularly the kings of France and England, resolved to visit Charles VI. by whom he was so magnificently received, that the people took umbrage at the honours that were paid to him; for he sat in parliament as if it had been his own tribunal, and created knights by his sole authority. From thence he crossed the sea to England, and proposed a truce between the two crowns, which, however, was not concluded, because in the interim, the English received an account of their having been worsted by the French at Harfleur; and as they had been very much elated by the victory of Agincourt, they could not brook the thoughts of peace, until they should have wiped off the stain of this subsequent disgrace. (X) France, in all probability, suspected Sigismund of partiality in favour of England; for his proposals of mediation were rejected: and indeed that suspicion seems to have been well grounded; for the emperor, before he quitted England, engaged in a treaty with king Henry, by which he obliged himself to assist the English monarch against Charles VI. in recovering Guienne and Normandy; and in consideration of this assistance, the king of England promised to compel Charles, and some other princes, to do homage to the emperor, for certain countries to which the empire had some old pretensions. On his return to France, he, at the earnest intreaty of Amadeus VIII. of Savoy, erected his county into a duchy, and invested him in the castle of Chambery.

He repairs to France, and proceeds to England. A. D. 1416.

d IN the absence of Sigismund, the affair of Jerom of Prague engaged the attention of the council. This man had repaired to Constance, with a design to assist John Hufs in making his defence; but perceiving he had nothing to hope from the clemency and justice of the fathers, he resolved to retreat with all expedition into Bohemia; but being apprehended upon the road, he was loaded with chains, and brought back to Constance, where, in order to avoid the punishment which had been inflicted upon his colleague, he solemnly abjured the heresies of Wickliffe and Hufs. He afterwards, however, espoused the same doctrines, was, in the twenty-first session of the same council, condemned as a wicked apostate to the flames, and suffered with great constancy and fortitude.

e THO' the public sessions of the council were less frequent in the absence of the emperor, something always occurred to employ the deliberation of the fathers. The bishop of Trent, who had been imprisoned by the duke of Austria, and deprived of the towns and castles depending on his see, complained to the council of these outrages; and Frederic, who remained as an hostage at Constance since his reconciliation with Sigismund, was ordered to release the bishop, and restore his lands, on pain of privation. But, instead of complying with this decision, he withdrew privately from Constance, and repaired to the Tyrol, which

(X) Æmilius, who assigns this reason as an obstacle to the peace, pretends, that 400 English were cut in pieces by the French at Harfleur. Perhaps there may have been some skirmish in which the English were worsted; but at the battle of Harfleur, which was fought in this very year, the constable of France, who had invested the town, was entirely defeated (1).

he found in great confusion, occasioned by the intrigues of his brother Ernest, who had usurped his dominions, and gained over the greatest part of the nobility and clergy to his interest; so that the two brothers began to make preparations for a bloody war.

The duke of Austria is put to the ban of the empire.

Frederic burgrave of Nuremberg, created elector of Brandenburg.

MEAN while the council, incensed at the refusal and retreat of Frederic, complained of his conduct to the emperor, who caused him to be put to the ban; and the bishop of Lodi, president of the Italian nation at the council, ordered, in the name of the fathers, the syndics of the church of Trent to compel Frederic to set the bishop at liberty, and restore his domains. At the same time Ernest resolved to support his usurpation by force of arms; and abundance of bloodshed must have ensued, had not the neighbouring princes, interposed and brought about an accommodation; in consequence of which Frederic recovered the Tyrol, and Ernest returned to Stiria, which was his inheritance <sup>h</sup>.

SIGISMUND, on his return to Constance, bestowed the investiture of their fiefs upon John de Nassau, archbishop of Mentz, the elector of Saxony, the count palatine, the count of Nillembourg, and the duke of Pomerania; and upon this occasion, he conferred upon Frederic, burgrave of Nuremberg, the electorate of Brandenburg, which reverted to the emperor by the death of Jesse, marquis of Moravia; tho' this alienation was not made without the murmurs of the Bohemians, who alledged that it was a fief belonging to their kingdom: nor did the new elector find the Brandenburghers very well disposed to receive him; but in a little time conciliated their affection, by his mild and prudent administration. Among the princes who appeared at Constance, he who shone with greatest magnificence was Frederic, surnamed the Warlike, margrave of Misnia, and landgrave of Thuringia, who, by his noble qualifications, had acquired the emperor's particular esteem; notwithstanding which they now parted with great animosity. Besides the investiture of Misnia, Frederic demanded that of some towns in Bohemia, which he possessed by right of conquest: and Sigismund, who was himself heir of that kingdom, absolutely refused to comply with his desire; so that he left Constance in great wrath. But the emperor appeased him in the sequel, by putting him in possession of the electorate of Saxony, vacant by the death of Albert III. the last elector of the house of Anbalt <sup>i</sup>.

AFTER these transactions, the council proceeded against Peter de Luna for contumacy; and in the thirty-seventh session, the definitive sentence of his deposition was pronounced and published. Then their next care being to elect a new pope, Odo or Otho Colonna, a Roman, was proposed, and chosen on St. Martin's day, whence he took the name of Martin V. and his elevation met with universal applause. The conclave was no sooner opened after the election, than the emperor entered, and prostrated himself before the new pope; then his holiness, mounting a white horse, rode in procession to the cathedral, Sigismund holding the reins on one side, and the elector of Brandenburg on the other: during the cavalcade, the Jews of Constance did him homage in certain prayers, while certain elders held the pentateuch in his hand. The pope gave them his benediction, saying, "You have a law, but you do not understand it; may the Lord take the veil from before your eyes."

MARTIN being consecrated and crowned, sent the cardinal of Pisa to exhort Benedict to resign his pretensions; but all his remonstrances proved ineffectual. Then holding a public consistory in the episcopal palace of Constance, he endeavoured in vain to accommodate matters between the dukes of Bavaria, who had quarrelled about the division of their dominions; though his endeavours were more successful in reconciling the emperor with the duke of Austria, who promised to take the oath of allegiance, and pay 70,000 florins by way of fine to Sigismund, who, on his part, undertook to restore him to the possession of those dominions, which he had lost when he was outlawed. In consequence of this agreement, Frederic waited upon the emperor at Constance, and was absolved, by the pope's order, of the sentence of excommunication which he had incurred, by oppressing and imprisoning the bishop of Trent. Sigismund restored part of his dominions; but, as we have already observed, the Swiss refused to part with what they had conquered, and several towns had been mortgaged by the emperor; so that the duke could not recover them until the debts should be paid. Sigismund's finances being very scanty, he was fain to have recourse to various expedients for raising money. He borrowed a considerable sum from the city of Bruges; and the English, with the consent of the elector palatine, paid him part of the portion of the princess Blanche, who was married to that elector <sup>k</sup>. But all these resources being insufficient to defray the expence, pope Martin, after having crowned him king of the Romans with great solemnity, granted him a tenth of all the ecclesiastical effects in Germany, as a remuneration for the pains he had taken to establish the peace of the church; though this imposition gave great offence, and had well nigh involved the empire in trouble and confusion.

WHILE Sigismund practised these schemes for filling his exhausted treasury, Holland, Hainault, and Brabant, groaned under the miseries of a civil war, kindled by a contest be-

- a tween Jaquelina, daughter and heiress of William, duke of Friesland, and John of Bavaria, her uncle, bishop of Liege, who pretended to the tutorage of his niece, and even to the succession of these provinces. The country was divided into two factions, one of which espoused the cause of the princess, while the other adhered to the bishop. The duke of Burgundy declared for his niece Jaquelina, who married the duke of Brabant, and obtained a victory over her competitor; while the emperor countenanced John of Bavaria, who having resigned his bishopric, in consequence of a dispensation from the pope, espoused Elizabeth de Gorlitz, duchess of Luxemburg, after Sigismund had promised to invest him with the dominions in dispute, as fiefs devolved to the empire, upon the demise of the last possessor without male issue. Thus supported, both parties carried on the war with equal vigour.
- b John equipped a fleet at Dordrecht and the Brill, with which he insulted the coast, and surprised some of the towns in Holland; while the duke of Brabant sent an army into the field, in order to maintain the pretensions of his wife.

His operations, however, were not successful; and John having made himself master of Rotterdam, the duke was fain to make advances towards a pacification. A congress being accordingly held at Gorcum, peace was concluded, on condition that the duke of Brabant should appoint John of Bavaria governor of Holland, Zealand, and Friesland, for the term of three years, and cede to him several towns; in consideration of which John renounced his pretensions to Holland and Hainault. Sigismund, for his part, acknowledged that this last province did not hold of the empire, and Jaquelina continued in possession of it, without being solicited to do homage for the fief to the emperor of Germany<sup>1</sup>.

c THE important affair of the schism being concluded, every thing else was regulated by the council, which at length broke up in its forty-fifth session. The disputes about religion still raged with greater violence than ever. The decrees against the Hussites were no sooner published, than Wincefflaus, king of Bobemia, began to put them in execution, forbidding all communicants to partake of both species; a prohibition which incensed the inhabitants of Prague to such a degree, that they raised a desperate tumult, forced the town-house, and murdered the magistrates who were concerned in publishing this order.

d THE news of this massacre filled the court of Wincefflaus with the utmost consternation, and made such an impression on that pusillanimous prince, that he was seized with an apoplexy, of which he died in a few days. Sigismund being acknowledged king of Bobemia, conferred the regency upon his brother's widow Sophia, who fortified herself in the castle of Wistbade against the Thaborites, or followers of Zischa, who was at this time general of the Hussites, and revenged the death of Huss and Jerome of Prague, by committing the most terrible outrages.

A. D. 1419.

e WITHOUT entering into the particulars of the war, in which Bobemia was involved by this persecution, we shall only observe, that Sigismund having succeeded to his brother Wincefflaus in the kingdom of Bobemia, was, after his coronation, obliged to employ that army against the Hussites which he had raised for an expedition against the Turks. He could not reduce them to obedience; for as they had been incensed to a degree of enthusiastic rage, by the tyranny which had been exercised over their consciences, and the cruelty with which they and their brethren had been persecuted, they were now also encouraged to persevere in their own defence, by several advantages which they had gained over the king's troops, by the valour and conduct of John Zischa, who is said to have retorted those barbarities upon the catholic party, to have sacrificed the priests, and to have destroyed the churches with fire and sword<sup>m</sup>. Nor was this famous leader's sagacity inferior to his valour. Sophia, being informed that he was in the territory of Pilsen with an handful of Thaborites, assembled a body of troops, which were reinforced by the lord of Schwamberg, and marched against him, in hope of surprising him unawares; but the event did not answer his expectation. Zischa, knowing himself too weak for such a formidable opposition, had recourse to a stratagem, which succeeded according to his wish. He posted his troops behind hedges, in such a manner, that the emperor's cavalry could not act against them without dismounting; and the women, according to his direction, went forth from this sort of intrenchment with bundles of linen in their arms, like so many children in swaddling cloaths, whom they offered as hostages for their husbands: perceiving that the imperial horsemen had alighted in order to attack on foot, they found means to unloose their bundles, by which the spurs and arms of the troopers were so entangled, that they could not disengage themselves; and Zischa, seizing that opportunity, attacked them with great fury, cut in pieces the best part of them, and obliged the rest to consult their safety by flight<sup>n</sup>.

kingdom of Hungary: and indeed Mahomet I. who resided at Adrianople, was employed in preparations for making an irruption into that kingdom; but the vigilance of Sigismund, who fortified all the frontier places, disconcerted his design, and he turned his forces against the Greeks. The emperor was no sooner delivered of this apprehension, than he sent succours to enable Sophia to act against Zisca, who was by this time deprived of his eye-sight, and the arrival of these troops enabled him to obtain a truce for four months, at the expiration of which the Hussites broke out in a general revolt against the emperor. Alarmed at this rebellion, Sigismund convoked a diet at Brin, the capital of Moravia, where he received affectionate addresses from all the towns and noblemen of Bohemia; but absolutely refused liberty of conscience to the inhabitants of Prague, a great number of whom retired to their general at Tabor, who continued to surprize and pillage the towns and castles belonging to the catholics, so as to find his followers and his fame daily increased. He obtained a complete victory over Albert, duke of Austria, and Henry de Kravatz, commandant of Moravia; then he made himself master of the new town of Prague, and reduced the citadel of Wissrhade, which, however, was afterwards retaken by the imperialists.

WHILE the chief of the Hussites proceeded in his operations with such rapidity of success, Lower Germany was exposed to the calamities of war, by a quarrel between Eric, king of Denmark, and the princes of Holstein, who refused to hold the duchy of Sleswic as a fief of the Danish crown. They were supported in their right of independency by their uncle Henry, duke of Brunswic-Lunenbourg, and the dukes of Pomerania, Mecklenburgh, and Stetin; and though the emperor decided in favour of the Danish king, the princes chose rather to hazard the determination of arms, than comply with a sentence which they deemed oppressive and unjust. Eric equipped a formidable fleet, and assembled a numerous army, with which he marched into the duchy of Sleswic, and built several forts, and gained other advantages; while the counts of Holstein and their allies, reinforced by the Frielanders, Hamburgers, and Henry of Osnabrug, took the field, in order to oppose his operations. The war was carried on with various success for some time, until Eric was totally defeated in the battle fought at Immerswed in Jutland, and compelled to sue for a truce, during which he intreated the emperor to act the part of a mediator between him and his enemies; and, lest his interposition should not prove effectual, he strengthened his interest, by forming alliances with the towns of Wandalia, which afterwards enabled him to maintain the war.

BUT, before Sigismund could effect this accommodation, he was obliged to take measures for appeasing the troubles of Bohemia, which still groaned under the miseries of a religious war. With this view he assembled a body of troops, and being joined by Frederic, elector of Brandenburg, William and Frederic the Warlike, marquises of Misnia, Albert, duke of Austria, and the princes of Bavaria, he invested Prague, which was possessed by the Taborites; but in one of his attacks he was repulsed by Zisca, with great slaughter, and obliged to retreat into Moravia, while the Hussites undertook the siege of Wissrhade, in which they proceeded with incredible vigour. Sigismund having recruited his army in Moravia, marched to the relief of this fortress, and attacking Zisca in his intrenchments, had the mortification to see his whole army cut in pieces. That same day the citadel of Wissrhade surrendered to the Hussites, who, elevated with the repeated advantages they had obtained over Sigismund, resolved to choose another sovereign, who should maintain them in their religious liberties. They accordingly, by a solemn embassy, offered the crown of Bohemia, to Jagellon, king of Poland; and he declining the proffer, they made a tender of it to Corebut, nephew to the duke of Lithuania: and in the mean time, until that prince should assume the reins of government, they chose a regency of twenty persons, to take charge of the administration.

THE emperor, alarmed at these proceedings, sent a commissary to their diet, with proposals of accommodation, which they rejected: while the army of crusards, raised in Germany to war against the Hussites, and commanded by the archbishop of Triers, was defeated and dispersed by the invincible Zisca. Sigismund in person had no better success: he levied another army, advanced into Bohemia, made himself master of Cuttemburg, and resolved to besiege Breda, when Zisca attacking him with his usual impetuosity, routed the imperialists, of whom a great number was slain, acquired as much plunder as loaded forty waggons, and compelled the emperor to take refuge in Hungary.

IT was immediately after this battle that Corebut made his entry into Prague, where the catholics protested against his election, which was equally disagreeable to the Taborites under Zisca, who professed themselves enemies to monarchical government. The first step he took was to besiege Carlestin, whither the catholics had transported the crown; but the besieged made such an obstinate defence, that he was obliged to abandon the enterprise, especially as he understood some disturbances were raised in Prague by the Taborites, whom he quelled and punished with great severity.

- a ZISCA, incensed at his behaviour, and jealous of his power, exhorted the Hussites to send him back to his own country; and they refusing to close with this advice, he resolved to ruin the city of Prague. As a previous step to the execution of this design, he defeated the count de Vartemberg, who endeavoured to hinder him from surprising Graditz, which he afterwards entered in triumph. He expelled from the kingdom Albert of Austria, to whom the emperor had ceded Moravia, ravaged the circle of Pilsen, defeated Corebut, compelled that prince to abdicate the crown of Bohemia, and entered Prague, where he was received with great splendour and magnificence<sup>a</sup>. In a word, the repeated victories of this chieftain compelled Sigismund to propose such honourable and advantageous terms of peace, that Zisca set out in order to conclude the accommodation, in a personal conference with the emperor;
- b but he was unfortunately infected with the plague, of which he died upon the road. His death, no doubt, produced a manifest change in the affairs of the Hussites. Nevertheless, their resolution did not fail; nor did they slacken in their zeal for the common cause, which they cherished to such a degree of superstitious policy, as to stretch the skin of their deceased captain upon a drum, that the sound might awake the remembrance of his valour, and inspire them with the notion that they still marched to the battle under the auspices of Zisca<sup>c</sup>.

- SIGISMUND*, instead of prosecuting the Bohemian war, indulged the indolence of his disposition at Buda, where he was visited by Eric, king of Denmark, who summoned the counts of Holstein to the tribunal of the emperor, and obtained a final sentence, importing, that all the southern Jutland, comprehending the towns of Sleswic and Gottorp, with the Danish forest, the isle of Alsen, and the province commonly called Frischiden, with all their rights and dependencies, did belong, under the title of a direct and profitable domain, to the crown of Denmark<sup>d</sup>. In the same assembly at Buda, Sigismund determined a dispute between the duke of Savoy and the prince of Orange, which last laid claim to the county of Geneva, in right of his great aunt; but, as the emperor had already granted the investiture of this county to Amadeus VIII. he now decided the process in his favour, and forbade Lewis de Chalon, prince of Orange, to assume the quality or arms belonging to the count of Geneva<sup>e</sup>.

- ABOUT this period the knights of the Teutonic order, of which some account hath already been given, degenerating from the courage and virtue of their predecessors, lost a great part of Prussia, which was wrested from them by the Poles, who had defeated them in several engagements. From this date we may derive the decay of the knights in those countries; for they continued to sustain one loss on the back of another, and to forfeit their reputation more and more, notwithstanding some assistance which they received from Sigismund, in the heat of his operations against the Hussites; which last entering Silesia, and separating into three bodies, at the same time attacked Hungary, Poland, and Austria, which they ravaged without mercy<sup>f</sup>.

- WHILE Bohemia continued a prey to those ravages, Holland and Brabant did not enjoy tranquility. These unhappy provinces were exposed to the cruelties of a civil war, by the partizans of John of Bavaria and the adherents of Jaquelina, who exercised all sorts of violence upon each other. That princess, disgusted by the duke of Brabant her husband, had prevailed upon Benedict, the antipope, to annul the marriage, and actually given her hand to the duke of Gloucester, brother of Henry V. king of England, who resolved to recover by force of arms the dominions of his new wife, which were in possession of her former husband. The duke of Brabant made preparations to oppose his progress; and being assisted underhand by Philip, duke of Burgundy, defeated the troops which the duke of Gloucester had sent to support the interest of the princess. Her last marriage was dissolved by a sentence of pope Martin; but as the duke of Brabant died in a few months after the decision, Jaquelina flattered herself with the hope of taking peaceable possession of her own dominions. In this, however, she was mistaken. The duke of Burgundy had employed emissaries in Hainault, Friesland, Holland, and Zealand, to detach their inclination from her government; and they succeeded so well in their endeavours, that the greatest part of the nobility and people refused to acknowledge her as their sovereign. In this emergency she referred her case to the duke, who, before he would undertake the office of mediator, obliged her to put the government of her dominions in his hands, and declare him her successor.

- IN this manner Philip acquired Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and Friesland. He had already purchased the reversion of Zutphen and Namure; and he inherited the duchies of Brabant, Lothier, Limbourg, and the marquisate of Antwerp, by the death of his kinsman Philip of Brabant, who died without issue. BOHEMIA was still in agitation. The fanaticks were divided into three bodies, which assumed the appellations of Thaborites, Orphans, and Horebites; and their chief general was Procopius the Shaven, whom Zisca had recommended as his successor in command. This leader, who had been a priest, seemed to emulate his predecessor in courage, capacity, cruelty, enthusiasm, and success. He reduced the town of Graditz to ashes, committed terrible outrages against the catholics, defeated the duke of Austria, and obtained a complete victory over a numerous army which had been raised by the princes of Germany, and attacked the Thaborites in their intrenchments. After having obtained this signal advantage, Procopius reduced Kamenitz, routed Meniard de Maisson Neuve, pillaged Austria, took Ritzen on the confines of Moravia, and nothing seemed capable of resisting the torrent of his arms and his fortune †.

troubles in the
many.

THE war in the north kept pace with the troubles in Germany. The princes of Holstein refusing to comply with the decision of the emperor touching Sleswic, Eric levied a numerous army, in order to maintain his pretensions, which, by the bye, were not very justly founded, inasmuch as neither he nor Sigismund had alleged any good reason to prove, that Sleswic alone was a personal fief, when all the other fiefs of the empire were hereditary. The towns of Wandalia, which had formerly espoused his interest, conscious of Sigismund's partial decision, and tired of a long war, which interrupted their commerce, and laid waste their country, presented a remonstrance to Eric, intreating him to listen to equitable terms of accommodation; but he paying little regard to their representations, they declared for the counts of Holstein, and equipped a considerable fleet for their service. Hostilities were immediately recommenced; and though the allies sustained some disadvantages, Eric not only made advances to an accommodation with the towns, but also prevailed upon the emperor to give them notice, that, as almost all the princes and towns of the empire had resolved to join their forces for quelling the sedition in Bohemia, it was incumbent upon them to make peace with the king of Denmark, that he, as well as they, might be at liberty to join in this confederation; and that in case they should obstinately persist in acting offensively against his Danish majesty, he, the emperor, would take effectual measures to punish them for their contumacy and disobedience. In order to strengthen this intimidation, he sent Nicholas Stack to the city of Lubec, with proposals of peace to the senate; from thence he repaired to the counts of Holstein, who insisted upon the king of Denmark's declaring Sleswic an hereditary fief; and as for Eric, he agreed to comply with every thing the emperor should propose. A congress was appointed at Nikoping, in the isle of Falster; but as hostilities were not suspended, the conferences produced no effect, because the demands of the parties concerned rose or fell according to the success of their arms, which sometimes declared for one side, and sometimes for another. The princes of Holstein offered to refer their cause to the determination of the pope; but rejected the emperor as judge or arbitrator, because he was related to the king of Denmark. Sigismund, on the other hand, forbade all the ecclesiastical judges whatever to take cognizance of this dispute, and ordered the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, together with the duke of Lunenburg, to support Eric with their whole force, and compel the counts to obey the imperial decree. Perhaps this vigorous step contributed to detach the cities of Stralsund and Rostock from the confederacy; for they made a separate peace with Eric, who, about this period, gained some advantages over the allies; but the negotiations begun at Nikoping, and afterwards carried on at Helsenbourg, proved altogether ineffectual ‡.

Both parties have recourse to recrimina-
tion.

INDEED both parties were extremely obstinate; nor did they abstain from the most virulent recrimination. The confederated towns accused Eric of having abolished the privileges and interrupted the freedom of trade, of oppressing the princes of Holstein, and of being author of a war that desolated the north of Germany. On the other hand, the king of Denmark reproached them as the favourers of rebellion, not only in the north, but also in Bohemia, where the Thaborites still carried all before them, under the conduct of Procopius the Shaven. Not but these sectaries were by this time divided into two factions, one of which, called the Calixtins, had favoured the return of Corebut, though they now shut him up in a monastery, on suspicion of having carried on an intelligence with Procopius.

DURING the captivity of this prince, the Thaborites and Orphans ravaged Silesia, took a number of strong places, defeated the imperial army sent thither to reduce them, under the command of Henry, cardinal of Winchester, made an irruption into Moravia, which they laid waste; then pillaged the circle of Glatz, and proceeded in such an uninterrupted course of victory, that the emperor was fain to sue for peace, in a deputation to Procopius, who gave the deputies audience at Cuttemburg, and was by this time heartily tired of a war, a which kept him in a continual alarm. He prevailed upon the different orders of the kingdom to assemble at Prague, and proposed that they should receive Sigismund for their king, provided he would indulge them with liberty of conscience. In a word, he sent some noblemen of his adherents with proposals of peace to the emperor, who was then at Moravia. A general truce was agreed to for three months, during which a diet was convoked at Presburg, where Procopius appeared as chief of the Bohemian deputation, and demanded, in the name of his constituents, that they should be allowed to communicate of both species; that Sigismund should confirm all their privileges, and promise upon oath to defend them against all innovation.

b To these demands the emperor replied, that the first article was not in his power; and that, before he could grant the rest, he must examine into the nature of those immunities to which they alluded, and if he should find them equitable, he would confirm them without hesitation. This answer was deemed evasive, and even interpreted into a refusal by the Thaborites; so that the negotiation was laid aside, and hostilities recommenced. The Hussites, to the number of 20,000 horse and 30,000 foot, commanded by Procopius, William de Rostka, and John Smirzlik, entered Misnia, which they ravaged with fire and sword; and having routed Polleutz, general of the troops sent to the relief of that province by the emperor, subdued one place after another, until the whole country was reduced and pillaged. From thence they marched into Thuringia, which, finding in a posture of defence, they immediately quitted, in order to fall upon Franconia, where they ravaged the duchy of Cobourg, obliged a number of princes and towns to redeem themselves from plunder, and then returned to Bohemia with a very considerable booty <sup>a</sup>.

c HAD the princes of the empire united against these adventurers, their career, in all probability, would have been stopped long before this period; but such unanimity was prevented by intestine divisions and feuds that hardly ever ceased to rage among the towns and noblemen. Conrad, archbishop of Mentz, having been appointed Sigismund's vicar in the empire, the electors of Saxony and the Palatinate took umbrage at his being invested with a dignity to which they claimed pretensions; and he prudently resigned the office, rather than endanger the public peace; but, notwithstanding his peaceful disposition, he was afterwards involved in an obstinate war with the landgrave of Hesse. Ernest and Lewis, dukes of Bavaria, had been for several years at variance about some fiefs of that province; and the electorate of Triers was subjected to the horrors of a civil war, by two competitors for the archbishopric <sup>b</sup>.

d THE kingdom of Hungary was no less exposed to continual alarms from the incursions of the Turks, under Amurath II. who, without paying any regard to the truce subsisting between him and Sigismund, committed terrible outrages in Servia, and generally defeated the small bodies of troops which the emperor sent to oppose his progress. All remonstrances to the sultan having proved ineffectual, Sigismund had recourse to Uladislaus king of Poland, and his brother Withond, grand duke of Lithuania, with whom he had an interview at Lutzko in Upper Vohinia, where a congress was opened to deliberate upon the affairs of Hungary, and the reduction of the rebels in Bohemia: but the Poles seemed extremely backward in engaging himself in these troubles. He had no affection for the person of Sigismund, who had supported the Teutonic order in their enterprizes against the Poles; and he was far from being desirous of entailing upon himself a war with the Hussites of Bohemia, who were by this time so much accustomed to victory, and even deemed altogether invincible. He therefore evaded the solicitations of the emperor when he demanded succours, and proposed, that the method of negotiation should be tried, preferably to the hazards of war.

e AT this assembly Sigismund resolved to erect the duchy of Lithuania into a kingdom; and Withond's vanity was so much flattered by the proposal, that his brother Uladislaus in vain used all his rhetoric and influence to divert him from such an extravagant project: nor did he pay the least regard to the remonstrances of the Poles, who gave him to understand, that they would never consent to any scheme so prejudicial to their country, which, by the erection of Lithuania into a kingdom, would be dismembered of one of its fairest provinces. Uladislaus, perceiving the obstinacy of his brother, solicited the interposition and good offices of pope Martin V. who, in pathetic letters to Sigismund and Withond, conjured them to desist from the prosecution of a design which would certainly kindle a civil war in Europe, and involve their allies in confusion and calamity. The emperor and duke lent a deaf ear to all these insinuations, and the day was fixed for the coronation; when Uladislaus, thinking it incumbent upon him to exert himself on this occasion, caused the emperor's envoys to be apprehended in their journey to Lithuania, while all the nobility of Poland took arms, and distributed themselves in different bodies, in order to guard the passages, and oppose the progress of Sigismund's ambassadors, who had halted in Frankfort on the Oder.

WITHOND, finding it would be impracticable for him to obtain the crown without the consent of the Poles, affected to lay aside the scheme, reconciled himself with his brother, and died at Trocko, whither he had accompanied Uladislaus, who had come to make him a friendly visit.

WHILE this idle scheme was on the carpet, the Turks extended their devastations with impunity, and the Thaborites ravaged Bohemia, and the neighbourhood without controul.

A crusade published against them. A. D. 1431.

POPE Martin being informed of this their progress, had sent orders to cardinal Julian, who was legate à latere at the court of Sigismund, to press the princes of Germany to engage in the crusade which he had ordained against those heretics. It was accordingly published anew at the diet of Nuremberg, where the emperor had assembled the electors and other princes, ecclesiastics as well as secular, a great many of whom embarked as volunteers in the expedition; and that each might contribute proportionably to the expence, Sigismund, with their own consent, made a regulation, which is the first register that ever was made for distinguishing the quota of money or soldiers to be furnished by each prince and state, not only for this purpose, but also for every other occasion, in which the interest of the empire might be concerned. In consequence of this regulation, the princes prepared for the war against the Hussites, which they undertook with the more eagerness, because they were excited by fresh instances of Eugenius IV. who had succeeded Martin V. lately deceased. The army which they assembled consisted of 40,000 horse, and the same number of infantry: the emperor bestowed the command upon Frederic, marquis of Brandenburg, and the legate resolved to attend the expedition in person. With these forces they marched into Bohemia, and committed horrible barbarities upon the Hussites that fell in their way; but as soon as the forces of that sect appeared, they were seized with an universal panic, and fled with great precipitation, notwithstanding all the remonstrances, prayers, and threats, of the legate, who finding his endeavours ineffectual, thought proper to fly with the rest. Such was the hurry and trepidation with which they fled, that all their baggage, furniture, and riches, together with the cross of the legation, and vestments of the legate, fell into the hands of the enemy.

The forces of the empire march into Bohemia, and are routed.

ALBERT of Austria, who had begun his march in order to reinforce the imperial army, was obliged to return to Moravia, and thence to Austria, before Procopius, surnamed the Little, in contradistinction to the other of that name, who had acquired the epithet of Great Chieftain. He found all the villages abandoned, and pillaged the whole country without opposition. Then joining his name-fake, they entered Hungary, where they reduced several places, and enriched themselves with booty; but some disputes arising between the Orphans and Thaborites, the two generals parted. Procopius the Sbaven marching towards Moravia, while the other remained in Hungary, though it would have been more for his advantage to retire with the plunder he had acquired; for the noblemen of Hungary no sooner understood that the Hussites were divided, than they took the field under the command of Rozgon, governor of Hava, and advancing to the river Wag gave battle to the Orphans, who were intirely defeated; so that scarce 2000 returned to Bohemia with Procopius.

The Hussites enter Hungary, and are defeated.

Pope Eugenius issues a bull for dissolving the council at Basil.

CARDINAL Julian, after his defeat, returned to Nuremberg, and advised Sigismund to summon the Bohemians to the council of Basil, in which he, the cardinal, was appointed to preside. Pope Martin V. had nominated Julian as his representative at this assembly, to concert measures for abolishing heresy, restoring the tranquility of the church; and this nomination was now confirmed by his successor Eugenius IV. who, nevertheless resolved to transfer the council from Basil to Bologna, where he might preside in person. His pretence for this translation was, that it would facilitate the union of the Greek and Roman churches: but his real motive was the dread of the Hussite interest, and the armies of Austria and Burgundy, which hovered over the city of Basil. In vain did the cardinal represent to his holiness the bad consequences that would attend such a translation; in vain were his representations supported by repeated remonstrances of the emperor, who refuted all the reasons Eugenius urged for removing that assembly. The pope issued a bull for dissolving the council of Basil, and convoking another at Bologna; while the fathers, already assembled, continued their session, to which the Bohemians were invited in consequence of Julian's advice.

a MEAN while the emperor assembled a diet at Presburg, to which he summoned the Bohemians, who sent thither deputies, though they could not be persuaded to enter the town, lest they should be detained, but sojourned in tents pitched in the open field, where the conferences were begun with all the marks of sincerity on both sides. Sigismund expressed his surprize and concern at their rejecting his administration, after they had been governed by his father and grandfather; and promised to redress all their grievances, provided they would acknowledge him as their sovereign. The deputies replied, that their refusal of him was not owing to any aversion which the nation entertained for his person, but the effect of their being overawed by the adverse armies which had ravaged the kingdom. They said the Bohemians had no objection to the proposal of sending deputies to Basil, provided proper security could be given for the safety of their persons: but that they had a right to take this precaution, considering the treatment of John Huss and Jerome of Prague, who had been burnt at Constance, in direct opposition to public faith.

b THE emperor, who could not help assenting in his heart to the truth of what they alleged, assured them he would convoke the assembly at Egra, where they should be informed of the intentions of the council, and satisfied with respect to the security they demanded. Accordingly, the Bohemian deputies and those of the council, together with Frederic, elector of Brandenburg, John, duke of Bavaria, and several other princes of the empire, repairing to that place at the appointed time, the Hussites demanded hostages of the nobility, for the safety of those they should send to the council; and, after great and violent altercation, the princes and deputies assembled agreed to engage their word for the safety of the Bohemians, and a safe-conduct was expedited for them at Basil in the most ample form.

c SIGISMUND, having taken these measures for restoring the quiet and tranquility of Bohemia, and appointed William, duke of Bavaria, protector of the council, chose this conjuncture to pass the Alps, and repair to Milan. In that city, he received the iron-crown from the hands of the archbishop, together with the ring, the sword, the scepter, and the golden apple; though Philip, duke of Milan, would not assist at the ceremony, but staid at Placentia, on pretence of an indisposition. The real cause, however, was a grudge which he had conceived against the emperor, whom he suspected of an attachment to the Florentines and Venetians, the professed enemies of Philip. By this suspicion he was altogether alienated from Sigismund, who had come to Italy on his invitation, though he now refused to admit him with a few attendants into the city of Milan, which he wanted to see out of pure curiosity. This instance of disrespect, together with the non-performance of the promise he had made to assist the emperor with money and troops, provoked Sigismund to such a degree, that he became the duke's implacable enemy. Nevertheless, he found it convenient to dissemble his resentment, and even to reject the offers of the Genoese, who having been for some years oppressed by Visconti, made a tender of their city and territory to Sigismund, which he declined accepting, that he might not add such a powerful prince as the duke of Milan to the number of his enemies.

d MEAN while he employed his whole attention in compromising the difference between pope Eugenius and the council. The fathers assembled at Basil demanded his protection against the pope who had dissolved the council; and this being granted, they sent a legate to persuade Eugenius to annul what he had done in prejudice of their deliberations; or, in case he should not revoke the dissolution of the council within the term of ninety days, to declare they would proceed against him in the severest manner. He was accordingly declared contumacious, and summoned to appear in person, or by proxy, to give an account of his conduct; and as he did not comply with this citation, they certainly would have proceeded to his deposition, had not the emperor interposed his mediation, in consequence of which the pope confirmed the council of Basil.

e HE at the same time impowered them to concert measures for the reformation of manners, as well as the extinction of heresy; while Sigismund, having succeeded in his endeavours, resolved to be crowned at Rome, after having wintered at Parma and Placentia. When he approached the city, the pope sent out several cardinals, prelates, and Roman noblemen, together with a great part of the clergy and people, who conducted him to Rome with great magnificence. He was received by the pope at the steps of the Vatican church, with the usual ceremony, and on the day of Pentecost crowned with the appellation of emperor and Augustus, after he had taken an oath of fidelity to the church, and truckled to the pope in all his demands. Having staid some time at Rome, he retired to Ferrara, and afterwards to Mantua, where he created John Francisco Gonzaga, lord of that city, a marquis, and allowed him to bear the imperial arms. Negotiation between the fathers of the council and the Hussites,

At this time the fathers of the council of Basil were employed in a negotiation with the deputies of the Hussites whom they wanted to re-inclose within the pale of the church. They had sent Procopius the Shaven, at the head of their deputies, to Basil; and after a fruitless dispute with the catholics, which lasted fifty days, he returned to Bohemia, made an alliance with the king of Poland, and ravaged the new march of Brandenburg, belonging to the knights of the Teutonic order, whom they considered as the emperor's adherents.

catholics.

DURING these deliberations, the emperor being informed that the Hussites began to disagree among themselves, and that the barons and nobility of that sect, who could not bear the tyranny of their chiefs, had separated from the rest in a distinct body, he resolved to draw towards Bohemia, in order to take the advantage of this division. Besides, he foresaw that the difference between the council and the pope could never be totally determined, while the first persisted in the opinion of its superiority over the pope, and he continued to arrogate to himself a pre-eminence over the council. His imperial majesty therefore set out for Germany, and on his arrival at Ulm, received information that the Thaborites, who had for several months been engaged in the siege of Pilsen, had been totally defeated by the catholics, whom the Bohemian barons, already mentioned, had joined in this expedition.

THE Calixtins, and almost all the nobility of Bohemia, agreed to the famous treaty of peace called the Compactata, which was drawn up by the bishops in council; but the Orphans and Thaborites opposing it with all their might, Risemberg and Maison Neuve, at the head of the noblesse, attacked them unawares in the city of Prague, and cut 20,000 of them in pieces on the spot. Flushed with this success, they marched against Procopius the Shaven, who was employed in the siege of Pilsen, and charged him with such fury, that notwithstanding the incredible efforts he made, his troops were totally defeated, he himself being mortally wounded, and his namesake left dead on the field of battle. The bravest of the prisoners were burnt alive in a large barn; those that fled were pursued, and massacred without mercy; and, in a word, the whole sect was utterly exterminated.

SIGISMUND did not fail to avail himself of this conjuncture, in his endeavours to regain the affection of both parties; and he managed matters with such dexterity, by means of ambassadors, that they afterward owned him as the lawful heir of his brother Winceslaus: and when he advanced as far as Ratisbon, to hold a general diet of the empire, the deputies of the states of Bohemia, and of the remains of the Thaborites, went thither, and did homage to him as to their king. But, in the mean time, he was obliged to employ his attention in remedying other disorders of the empire. Lewis, duke of Bavaria, of Ingoldstadt, being accused of tyranny, extortion, peculation, robbery, and sacrilege, was summoned to his trial at the diet of Ulm; and as he refused to appear, the emperor put him to the ban of the empire. In pursuance of this sentence, the bishops and noblemen in the neighbourhood declared war against him, and levied troops to make reprisals on his dominions; but he averted the storm, by making his submission to Sigismund, who pardoned him, on condition that he would make good the damage he had done to his neighbours; and renounce all the rights he had to the sovereignty of Donawert, which henceforward enjoyed the liberty of an imperial town.

WITH respect to the restitution he consented to make, it was referred to the diet which the emperor convoked at Frankfort, in order to determine the difference between Frederic the Warlike, marquis of Misnia, Lewis count palatine, the marquis of Brandenburg, and Eric V, of Saxe-Lawembourg, who were competitors for the electorate of Saxony, vacant by the death of Albert III. the last of the electoral branch of the antient family of Ascania. The emperor, upon the demise of this prince, ten years ago, had sequestered the electorate per interim, and declared Frederic the Warlike elector of Saxony, as a fief devolved to the empire; but Eric of Lawembourg appealed to pope Martin V. and afterwards to the council of Basil; and Frederic, surnamed the Peaceable, son and successor of Frederic the Warlike, having protested against this step, as an encroachment upon the German liberty, Sigismund issued an imperial decree, importing, that the cognizance of fiefs, the administration of a justice, and imposition of taxes in Germany, had no dependence upon the church, but were the prerogatives of the emperor, electors, and princes; and, finally, at the diet of Frankfort, with the advice and consent of the noblemen and deputies that were present, he confirmed the house of Misnia in possession of the duchy and electorate of Saxony, which belongs to it at this day; though the family of Larembourg still protest against their possession<sup>1</sup> (B).

b THE next diet was assembled at Ratisbon, where Sigismund gave audience to ambassadors from Bohemia, who came to congratulate him upon his happy return to Germany, and to propose, that all the Bohemians should be obliged to communicate of the two species: but this proposal was rejected by the emperor; and one of the Thaborites belonging to the embassy chancing to die, his body was denied Christian burial.

LEWIS of Ingoldstadt having, at this assembly, made full satisfaction to the noblemen of Bavaria and Suabia, whom he had pillaged, the parties were reconciled, and the emperor repaired to Alba Regalis, where he received an embassy from young Ladislaus, king of Poland, notifying his father's death, and proposing a match between him and the daughter of Albert duke of Austria, who was son-in-law to the emperor; but this alliance was postponed, until the differences between Hungary and Poland could be adjusted.

c IT was during his residence in this place, that the deputation arrived from the states of Bohemia, promising to acknowledge him as their sovereign, and Albert his successor, provided he would agree to certain articles, which he solemnly swore to fulfil; and this affair being so happily established, he interested himself with the deputies of the council, in order to facilitate a total reconciliation between the Bohemians and the church. After abundance of disputes and negotiations, an assembly was called at Iglave, in the diocese of Olmütz, at which these deputies, as well as those of Bohemia, were present. There every thing was regulated by an authentic act, signed and sealed by the emperor and deputies, in consequence of which act, the Bohemians, having protested that they would for the future be obedient to the church of Rome, were absolved from the excommunication, and other censures, which had been fulminated against them, and introduced into the church by the deputies of the council<sup>m</sup>.

d THE emperor resolving to establish a solid peace in that kingdom, and concluding that nothing could contribute so much to re-involve it in new disorders as the affair of churchlands, which had been usurped during the war, and might be a bone of contention, he made an accommodation upon that subject with the principal noblemen, who thought themselves the more obliged to him for this condescension, as the deputies of the council had refused to comply with their demands. In order therefore to manifest their gratitude, they conducted him to Prague, where he was magnificently received, and crowned on the 24th of August. Then the barons and deputies of the cities did homage to him, and took the oath of allegiance<sup>n</sup>.

e A SMALL residue of the Thaborites still held out against Sigismund, under the auspices of a gentleman called John de Robac, who was besieged in his castle, taken by stratagem, and hanged, with 100 of his adherents. The town of Gratz likewise refused to acknowledge the emperor for its sovereign, and sustained a long siege with great valour and perseverance, until, being quite exhausted, it submitted on honourable terms.

He reduces the Thaborites and the whole kingdom of Bohemia to obedience.

f IMMEDIATELY after this pacification, the empress Barbara was crowned queen of Bohemia, with great magnificence; and this ceremony being performed, Sigismund applied himself in earnest to the police of the kingdom, which he found in terrible confusion, occasioned by the miseries of the civil war. He established tribunals, appointed Maison neuve governor of Bohemia, recalled the clergy who had been exiled, and, in order to prevent all possibility of a religious revolt for the future, enlisted the remains of the Thaborites and Orphans to be employed against the Turks, who had made an irruption into Hungary.

(B) One great design for convoking the diet at Frankfort, was to concert measures for a reformation of the empire, both with respect to its head and members; that the reciprocal duties of the emperor and subjects should be ascertained; that the rights and possessions of the empire might be recovered, and all her revenues settled upon a solid footing. But great difficulties arose, on account of the alienations which had been made by Charles VI. in favour of those who refused to part with their possessions, in which the kings at their election promised, upon oath, to maintain them: and though the grievances of the empire, which required an immediate remedy, were specified in sixteen articles, yet, as there was not present a sufficient number of electors and princes to give a proper sanction to their proceedings, the assembly was prorogued, and the attempt proved abortive (1).

Tho' Sigismund had address enough to regain the affection of the Bohemians, his prudence was not sufficient to preserve it. His zeal for religion, and implicit obedience to the church, had entailed upon him the war with the Hussites, in which he had suffered abundance of damage and disgrace; and now, after he had concluded an advantageous peace with those people, instead of improving the footing he had gained in their good-will, by gentle remonstrances and a mild administration, the same indiscreet zeal prompted him to tyrannize as formerly over their consciences, and to use violence in compelling several of their principal men to abjure the religion which they professed. These arbitrary proceedings disobliterated his friends, and revived the hatred of his subjects, which increased to such a degree, that, finding it uncomfortable and inconvenient to live among a people by whom he was not beloved, he resolved to quit the kingdom, and retire to some place where he could end his days in peace and tranquillity. But before he could put this resolution in practice, he found himself attacked by a distemper, which was the consequence of poison. One of his toes was ~~lost~~ by the advice of his physicians, who believed a cure might be effected by such amputation; but some time after, the disorder re-appearing, the empress began to think of securing to herself the throne by a new marriage. For this purpose she privately assembled the greatest part of the barons, who had great authority in that kingdom; and assuring them that the emperor must die in a very little time, observed, that the only expedient for preventing the troubles which could not fail attending his death, would be a regulation before-hand, obliging Sigismund's successor to marry his widow. This advice being relished by the barons, a secret agreement was made for that purpose, and confirmed by the oath of all parties concerned. Yet this treaty was not managed with such secrecy, but that it reached the ears of the emperor, who at the same time was informed by his physicians that he had not long to live. He ordered himself to be transported from the kingdom of Bohemia, which he had great reason to suspect of disaffection, to Znaim in Moravia, that he might see his daughter before his death<sup>p</sup>. There he ordered his empress, who had followed him, to be arrested, and the barons of Hungary and Bohemia being called into his bed-chamber, he, in their presence, nominated his son-in-law Albert, duke of Austria, for his successor, appointing ambassadors, who should, immediately after his death, repair to Bohemia, and present his last will to the grandees of that kingdom. In the meantime all those who were present assented to his nomination, and agreed to acknowledge duke Albert as king of Hungary and Bohemia. In a little time after he had thus settled the succession, he died, on the 9th day of September, in the 70th year of his age, having reigned 50 years in Hungary, 27 in quality of emperor, and 17 as king of Bohemia. His body was, in consequence of the direction which he himself had given, carried to Waradin in Hungary, and honourably interred in the church of St. Laudislaus<sup>q</sup>.

SIGISMUND was remarkable for the beauty of his person, and the majesty of his air. He was liberal, and a patron of learned men (C), - he himself having been so well versed in the languages, as to obtain the epithet of the Light of the world. Though he neither wanted courage nor military skill, he was very unfortunate in all his warlike expeditions, and, what is very remarkable in the disposition of a prince, he had a mortal antipathy to all flatterers, who he usually compared to crows, which pick out the eyes of their fellow-creatures. The Roman catholic writers extol him for his piety and zeal for the advantage of the church, manifested in his concessions to the pope, in his endeavours to remove the schism of the church, and his repeated efforts to extinguish those doctrines, which they thought proper to brand with the name of heresy; but it plainly appears, that every step he took in consequence of this zeal, was the effect of blind superstition, exciting him to the prejudice of sound policy and common sense.

As for his widow, she is said to have equalled the famous Messalina in point of libertinism; and though Sigismund had often caught her in the act of adultery, he always forgave her backsliding, because he knew himself addicted to the same vice. When she recovered her liberty after his death, she retired to Koniggratz in Bohemia, where she lived to a great age, in the midst of a number of courtizans, whom she maintained to administer to her infamous pleasures. To such an excess of debauchery did she degenerate, that she held the

Containing the History of A L B E R T II.

- ALBERT II. duke of Austria, surnamed the Grave and the Magnanimous, was the son of Albert II. Albert of Austria, called the Wonder of the World, and married Elizabeth, daughter of duke of Austria; the emperor Sigismund. Upon the death of his father, his cousin Leopold IV. was, by the states of Austria, declared his guardian; but Ernest, the brother of Leopold, having protested against this disposition, the office was divided between them; and when the former died, Albert took the reins of government in his own hands. By his wise conduct he re-established the security of his subjects in Austria, which had a long time been interrupted by intestine wars, rapine, and licence, the authors of which he severely punished, until the peace and tranquillity of his dominions were restored. The great reputation which he acquired by his merit, joined to the favours of fortune, which never forsook him, would in all probability have rendered him the greatest prince that ever sat upon the imperial throne, had heaven thought proper to prolong his life. In one year he was honoured with three crowns; on the first of January he was raised to the Hungarian throne, in consequence of the last will of Sigismund, whose daughter and heiress he had espoused; on the sixth of May he was elected king of Bohemia, the choice being founded upon an antient convention between the two families, implying, that when the lawful heir-male of the house of Bohemia should chance to fail, they should bestow the crown upon a prince of the house of Austria. Yet notwithstanding this agreement, and the other pretensions of Albert, he met with a strong opposition from one part of the states of Bohemia, who, by the intrigues of Tasm, a Bohemian nobleman, and chief of that faction, elected Casimir, brother of the king of Poland, and even crowned him in the city of Prague. These were the very people who had conspired with the empress Barbara against Sigismund. This competition produced a war against Albert, in which Casimir, being assisted by the Polish troops, for some time disputed the throne.

- CASIMIR, and his brother Ladislav, advanced with a body of troops into Bohemia, where joining the Calixtins, by whom he had been invited, he obtained several advantages over the Austrians, and great barbarities were committed by both sides. At length Albert assembled all his forces, of which he gave the command to the marquis of Brandenburg, who had acquired the appellation of the German Achilles, and then sent a defiance to the enemy, whom he attacked in their intrenchments, and compelled to retreat to Thabor.

- AFTER this action the marquis of Brandenburg made an irruption into Upper Poland; and this diversion obliging Ladislav to retire for the defence of his own dominions, Albert returned to Prague, where he again exacted the oath of allegiance from the citizens, appointed the count de Celley governor of Bohemia; and having taken other means for securing the tranquillity of that kingdom, repaired to Breslau. Here he found Roderic, bishop of Burgos, deputed from the council of Basil, to negotiate a peace between him and his competitor for the Bohemian crown; but all the endeavours of this able minister proved ineffectual, neither would he resign his pretensions; and all that the prelate could obtain was, that both would continue to own the authority of the council against the pope, who attempted to transfer it to Ferrara. At length, however, Albert's fortune prevailed; he dispersed the forces of his competitor, made himself master of the whole kingdom, except one or two places, which still held out for his antagonist, and was crowned at Prague with universal applause, after he had made an accommodation with those noblemen who had espoused the cause of Casimir, and promised, though unwillingly, to be governed by their advice".

(D) Sigismund had two wives. The first was Mary, daughter of Lewis, king of Hungary, and the second Elizabeth, daughter of Herman, count of Celley, by whom he had one daughter Elizabeth, wife of Albert, his successor (1).

Perhaps the empress Barbara owes part of this character to the enmity of the catholics, which she incurred by embracing the doctrines of Husi.

The states of Hungary consent to his elevation to the imperial throne.

THE empress Barbara, about this time, having resigned her right to the fortresses of Hungary, was set at liberty, and accommodated with an allowance of 12,000 ducats a year. In the midst of his expedition against Casimir, Albert received the news of his being elected emperor at Frankfort, by the electors and princes there assembled, in order to concert measures for terminating the differences between the pope and the council of Basil. He was, however, obliged to conceal his sentiments on his election, until he had obtained the consent of the states of Hungary, who had chosen him king on condition that he should not accept the imperial crown, in case he should be solicited to receive that honour; for the barons of Hungary alleged, that it was a great disadvantage to their state to be governed by an emperor, on the experience they had of Sigismund, who, while he was occupied in the affairs of Italy, Germany, and his other dominions, left the kingdom of Hungary exposed to the incursions of the Turks, who pillaged it with impunity. Nevertheless the states, seeing Albert strongly pressed to accept of the imperial dignity, consented to his elevation, rather than run the risque of losing a prince whose merit was so conspicuous *.

BUT two days before he was declared emperor, the electors of the empire, perceiving that the council of Basil and the pope did nothing but publish decrees against each other, resolved to adhere to neither side, until they should have deliberated six months upon their different claims. This was the beginning of the German neutrality, which was protracted to the eighth year, and was equally disapproved by Eugenius and the council (E). Nevertheless, Albert was no sooner in possession of the imperial throne, than he sent ambassadors to the council, to renew the engagements of public faith and security which they had received from Sigismund: while the fathers, in return for this favour, granted him the money which had been raised by indulgences in Austria, on account of the arrival of the Greeks (F).

AFTER his election and coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle, his chief care was to reform the abuses which had crept into the administration of justice: he laid the tribunal of Austregues under proper restrictions; suppressed what was called the secret and Westphalia judgment, said to be as old as Charlemagne, in consequence of which people were condemned to death on simple information, without knowing the crime that was laid to their charge, until the very moment of the execution; and yet, amidst all the salutary regulations, he never dreamed of abolishing the manner of proceeding observed at Klagenfurt, the capital of Carinthia, where a person accused, or even suspected, of theft, is hanged upon the spot, and tried next day, when, if he is convicted, his body is left suspended on the gibbet; but if his innocence appears, his corpse is honourably interred at the public expence *.

Confirms the neutrality of electors and princes.

ALBERT confirmed the neutrality which had been embraced by the electors, and by their advice proposed, that a general council should be convoked in some third town, distinct from the assembly at Basil, as well as from that which was maintained at Ferrara. Though both parties seemed averse to this proposal, the princes of the empire assembled at Mentz, in order to facilitate the expedient: as a previous step to which, they agreed that the council of Basil should be obliged to suspend the depositions of the pope, which was at that time the subject of their deliberations. The deputies of many European states, which were present on this occasion, approved of the step; yet the legates from the fathers would not acquiesce in this measure, but returned to Basil; and those that were sent by the pope repaired to Mentz, where they in vain employed all their efforts in persuading the princes to reject the council, and then retired, after having protested against the neutrality *.

NEVERTHELESS, both pope and council courted the friendship of the emperor, and even exerted themselves in mediating a peace between Hungary and Poland. Their legates employed their influence in his favour, during the diet at Petricow: and a congress being opened at Breslau in Silesia, a treaty of peace was concluded, on condition that Albert should be-

(E) Pope Eugenius having published bulls for transferring the council of Basil to Ferrara, the electors, princes, and prelates, assembled at Frankfort, resolved to continue neutral, that they might be the more able to negotiate a pacification. With this laudable view they wrote letters to the fathers in council, the pope, and Paleologus, emperor of the Greeks, exhorting them to peace and unity, and intreating them to contribute their several endeavours to prevent a schism in the church (1).

(F) This was a sum of money raised to defray the expences of the Greek emperor and the eastern princes, to the number of 700, who arrived this year in Italy, in order to celebrate an œcumenical council (2).

a now his eldest daughter in marriage upon Ladislaus, and give his younger to prince Casimir together with the kingdom of Bohemia, by way of dower<sup>a</sup>.

HITHERTO every thing succeeded prosperously with Albert, and his subjects began to pre-sage happy things under his government, when Amurath, sultan of the Turks, who had employed a whole year in preparing to invade Bulgaria, now resolved to put his design in execution. He accordingly entered that province, though it belonged to his own father-in-law, George, the duke or despot, and began his operations with the siege of Semendria.
Albert, who before his elevation to the imperial throne had rendered himself formidable to the infidels, and engaged in a treaty with this prince, armed for the defence of his ally, as well as of his hereditary dominions, which, in all probability, would be attacked in their b turn, and took the field with such force as he could assemble in those kingdoms and in the empire; but in the midst of excessive heats, having indulged himself in eating a great quantity of fruit, he was attacked with a violent dysentery, which obliged him to quit Buda, in order to return to Vienna; but he never reached that city; for death overtook him in the road, at the village of Long, and his body was interred at Weissenburg<sup>b</sup>. He left the empress with child of a son, who was called Ladislaus, and by the bishop of Strigonia crowned king of Hungary, four months after his birth<sup>c</sup> (G).

his return to Vienna.
A. D. 1439.

His death was no sooner known, than Fredric, son of Ernest, count of Tyrol, his nearest relation, was chosen administrator of Austria, by the states assembled at Vienna, until the empress should be delivered, that in case she should bring a prince into the world, he
 c might take upon him the office of tutor; or if the fruit of her womb should be a female, succeed to the duchy as coheir with his brother Albert.

At the same time the catholics and Calixtins of Bohemia laid aside their mutual animosity; and in consequence of pathetic letters from the empress Elizabeth, assembled in a friendly manner at Prague, and resolved to wait for her delivery, before they would proceed to the election of a new king<sup>a</sup>.

In the short course of Albert's reign, several diets of the empire were held in the city of Nuremberg. In one of these, at which were present a great number of princes, all Germany, except Bavaria and Austria, was divided into four circles; the first comprehended Bava- ria and Franconia; the second including the countries about the Rhine; together with Allé- d mania; Westphalia and the Low Countries were contained in the third; and the fourth was constituted by Saxony alone. In another diet it was proposed to divide the empire into six circles; and this division was afterwards established and followed for the first time by the emperor Maximilian the first, as the death of Albert for the present frustrated the scheme.

This prince having inherited the kingdom of Hungary and Bohemia in quality of son-in-law of the emperor Sigismund, he may be said to have been the basis of that power and grandeur to which the house of Austria hath since attained. He was of a tall stature and extraordinary strength, liberal, just, and virtuous; he cherished a warm affection for his people, a great zeal for religion, and an uncommon esteem for learned men<sup>e</sup>.

AFTER the death of Albert, the electors, assembling at Frankfort, unanimously agreed to fill the vacant throne with Frederic of Austria, surnamed the Pacific, son of Ernest of Austria, of the Stirian line, and Cimburge, daughter of the duke of Mazovia; he was also cousin-german of his predecessor Albert, and no more than twenty-five years of f age at his election<sup>f</sup> (H). The electors had at first agreed to name Lewis III. landgrave of Hesse, as Albert's successor; but he having declined the dignity, on account of the troubles in which the empire was involved, all the suffrages were reunited in favour of Frederic, and the archbishop of Triers was sent to Vienna to notify his election, and invite him to come and take possession of the throne.

(G) He had by the same venter two daughters, Elizabeth and Ann, the first married to Casimir, prince of Poland, and the other to William, duke of Saxony. There was likewise another son, who died in his infancy (1).

(H) This prince is by some called Frederic IV. and by others Frederic V. but the greatest number of writers give him the denomination of Frederic III. because the last Frederic of Austria, who was only chosen by part of the electors, afterwards renounced his pretensions to the crown, and the election of Frederic of Brunswic was not according to form; so that neither the one nor the other are inserted in the number of the emperors.

(1) Heiss, lib. iii. cb. 1.

WE have already observed, that the infant Ladislaus was crowned king of Hungary by the cardinal archbishop of Strigonia. This ceremony was no sooner performed, than his mother Elizabeth carried him to Vienna, and put him under the protection of the emperor, to screen him from the ill offices of one part of his subjects, who had actually offered the crown to Ladislaus, king of Poland, and concluded a treaty with him on that subject.

The Calixtins offer the crown of Bohemia to Albert, elector of Bavaria.

As for Bohemia, it was still divided between the catholics and Calixtins, the former of whom were inclined to appoint administrators, until the young Ladislaus should be capable of assuming the reins of government: but Ptaczek, at the head of the Calixtins, made violent efforts in favour of a new election, and even sent ambassadors to Munich, to notify to Albert, elector of Bavaria, that they had elevated him to the throne of Bohemia; that prince, however, having made proper acknowledgements for their good opinion and intended favour, declined interfering with the interest of the lawful heir.

BEING disappointed in this quarter, the Calixtins agreed to assemble with the catholics, in order to provide for the security of the kingdom; and as it appeared absolutely necessary to appoint some person who should take upon him the administration of affairs, they pitched upon the emperor, who desired to be excused from accepting such a troublesome office. Nay, such was the moderation of this prince, that when the states of Bohemia made him a tender of their crown, he refused their offer, protesting he would preserve it for Ladislaus, the son of Albert II. his relation and pupil, whom he considered as the lawful heir of the crowns of Bohemia and Hungary &c.

THE Bohemians having suffered these two repulses, proceeded to the election of administrators from among their fellow subjects, when Ptaczek was chosen by the Calixtins, and Maison-neuve by the catholics; and their government was for some time very quiet, those of both communions enjoying full liberty of conscience.

MEAN while the king of Poland, assisted by the famous Hunniades, had obtained a victory over queen Elizabeth, mother of young Ladislaus; tho' his progress was soon stopped by his German allies, commanded by a Bohemian gentleman called John Gisor, who gave surprising proofs of his gallantry and conduct. Pope Eugenius being informed of these troubles in Hungary, sent cardinal Julian thither to negotiate a peace, which was effected on these conditions. That the king of Poland should be declared regent of Hungary, during the minority of Ladislaus, and succeed him on the throne, in case he should die without issue; that the Pole should espouse queen Elizabeth's eldest daughter, and his brother Casimir take the younger to wife; and that all the acts and military promotions made in Hungary by the king of Poland should be confirmed <sup>h</sup>.

A. D. 1441. Prussia revolts from the Teutonic order.

WHILE these measures were taken for restoring the peace of Hungary, the knights of the Teutonic order were guilty of such outrages and oppression in the neighbourhood of Culm, that the nobility entered into an association for their mutual defence, and the difference was referred to the arbitration of the emperor, who decided in favour of the knights; this sentence reduced the states of Prussia to such despair, that they revolted from the Teutonic order, and acknowledged the king of Poland as their sovereign, after he had promised to confirm the rights and privileges of Prussia <sup>i</sup>.

Frederic interests himself in the affairs of the church. Has an interview with Felix.

FREDERIC, in the beginning of his reign, made sundry regulations touching the administration of justice, the police, and coin of the empire; nor did he manifest less concern in his endeavours to extinguish the schism that still continued in the church. He convoked several diets, to deliberate upon this subject, in consequence of an embassy which he received at the same time from Eugenius and the council of Basil, which had elected to the papacy Amadeus, duke of Savoy, under the name of Felix. These ambassadors attended him during his coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle, which being performed, they returned to the assembly at Frankfort (I), where each party pleaded their own case; and, after long debates it was agreed, that the empire should still adhere to the neutrality, until another council should be convoked in some part of Germany, in order to determine all difference, and re-establish the tranquillity of the church <sup>k</sup>. Deputies were accordingly sent to notify what had passed to the fathers of the council at Basil, and to pope Eugenius at Florence, though the behaviour of the states of the empire on this occasion was agreeable to neither party.

- a. one of his daughters in marriage, a young princess of exquisite beauty, and a portion of 200,000 ducats : a proposal which he rejected with disdain, and upon which he said to one of his courtiers, by way of pleasantry, " This man would fain purchase holiness, if he could but find a seller (K)."

ALTHO' Frederic failed in his efforts to abolish this schism in the church, he was more successful in the war which he carried on against his brother Albert VI. surnamed the Prodigal. This prince, under the pretext of having been defrauded of his share of his father's estate, had assembled some forces, with the assistance of Walrick de Celley, and several other noblemen, besieged the city of Laubach, the capital of Carniola, and suffered a repulse from the inhabitants, supported by some Austrian troops which had come to their succour. Albert being incapable of paying the auxiliaries, they abandoned his cause, and resolved to invade Austria, in order to extort money from Frederic the emperor. They accordingly began their ravages, and the disorders continued till Frederic was obliged to set on foot a treaty with his brother, to whom he paid a certain sum of money, and yielded Suabia, and his territories bordering upon the Swiss, for the space of six years. He was likewise obliged to gratify his brother's soldiers with 70,000 ducats, before they would desist from the rapine and robbery which they had so long practised with impunity <sup>1</sup>.

Makes peace with his brother Albert.

DURING all these disputes, the war had still raged between the king of Denmark and the princes of Holstein; and now, in the 18th year of this dispute, an accommodation took place between the contending parties, who agreed, that count Adolphus should retain, during life, the portion of Sleswic which he then possessed, together with the isle of Femeren and lesser Friesland; but that on the expiration of two years after his death, the king of Denmark and his heirs should submit to a fair trial of his pretensions. In consequence of this treaty, the towns of Lubec, Hamburg, Lunenburg, and Wismar, made their submission to his Danish majesty, who did not, however, long enjoy the fruits of this pacification.

HE resolved to settle the succession upon his nephew Bugislaus, duke of Pomerania; and this attempt, so contrary to the liberties of Denmark, the crown of which was elective, gave such disgust to the states, that they summoned him to the diet at Horsloe, and he refusing to appear, they deprived him of the sovereign power, and elected Christopher of Bavaria, who was acknowledged king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, and solemnly crowned at Rypen by the archbishop of Lunden.

A. D. 1443.

THIS revolution was succeeded by a war between the Austrians and Swiss, which engrossed the emperor's whole attention. A difference had happened between the Swiss and the city of Zurich, on account of Toggenburg, and of its having put itself under the protection of the emperor, who not only refused to confirm the privileges of the Swiss, but likewise demanded the restitution of all the territories which they had wrested from the house of Austria. The inhabitants of Zurich refusing to renounce the treaty which they had made with the emperor, the Swiss had recourse to arms, and actually invested the city. Frederic, in this dilemma, demanded succours against the Swiss from the princes of the empire, not one of whom would take the field in his behalf. He then solicited the assistance of Charles VII. of France, who sent the dauphin his son into Germany, at the head of 40,000 men, although he had only engaged to furnish 5000; for whom the emperor promised to find free quarters in Alsace. The king of France may have been induced, by several motives, to send such a considerable army into the empire. Perhaps he wanted to revenge an irruption which had been made by the governor of Montbelliard into the territories of France. He might have had designs upon Alsace: his intention might have been to assist Rene, duke of Lorraine, to make himself master of the city of Mentz; and it is not improbable that he was solicited to make such a powerful armament by Sigismund of Austria, or pope Eugenius, in order to dissolve the council of Basil. Be that as it will, the dauphin approached this city at the head of his army, in which were 8000 English, under the name of auxiliaries. The Swiss, though few in number, not only kept the field, but also gave them battle; but they were almost all cut in pieces by the French cavalry, who nevertheless, paid dear for the victory <sup>m</sup> (L). The Dutch ascribe this excellent and happy invention to Laurentius Janson, an inhabitant of Leyden, while the city of Mentz attributes that honour to a gentleman of their city, called John Guttenburg; and others contend for John Mentzel, and John Faustus, inhabitants of the same place (1).

(L) The Swiss army is said to have amounted to no more than 4000 men, who slew double their number of the French; and, rather than own themselves conquered, died upon the spot, except one man, who, at his return to his canton, was beheaded for cowardice (2).

Ladislaus of Poland is acknowledged king of Hungary.

fore Zurich, which obliged them to raise the siege, and the dauphin returned to Germany.<sup>a</sup> He thought proper, however, to seize upon Montbelliard, and some other cities of Alsace.

IN the midst of these transactions, Ladislaus, king of Poland, taking advantage of his namesake's minority and absence, as well as of the sloth of the emperor, who neglected the interest of his people; encouraged, I say, by these favourable circumstances, the Poles formed a strong party in Hungary, and was actually acknowledged sovereign of that kingdom. Immediately after his elevation, he, at the desire of pope Eugenius, espoused the cause of Stephen, despot of Rascia, whom Amurath had stripped of his dominions, and raising an army of Poles, Walachians, Germans, and Bohemians, under the command of the gallant Gisera, he passed the Danube, made himself master of the town of Sophia, and by the valour and conduct of his general Hunniades, obtained a complete victory over the Turkish army, commanded by the famous Scanderbeg, who, by the bye, was suspected of partiality towards the Christians.<sup>b</sup>

AMURATH was greatly disheartened by this defeat, especially as he found himself attacked on one side by Ibrahim, prince of Cilicia, and on the other side by Scanderbeg, who immediately after this battle revolted, declaring himself a Christian, and took possession of Albania, which was his paternal inheritance. The sultan therefore, in this emergency, sued for peace, which was ratified on conditions very advantageous to the Hungarians, and solemnly sworn to by Ladislaus, who, nevertheless, regardless of his oath, from which he was absolved by the pope, and instigated by the Greek emperor Paleologus, he and Hunniades resumed their arms, and inviting Scanderbeg to join them, advanced by the way of Thrace towards the Euxine sea. They came in sight of the Turkish army, commanded by Amurath in person, at a village called Varna<sup>m</sup>, where a bloody battle ensued, in which Ladislaus lost his life, Hunniades his liberty, and the Christian army was entirely defeated.<sup>c</sup>

Casimir is elected king of Poland.

THE fate of Ladislaus was no sooner known in Poland, than the diet, assembling at Cracovia, elected his brother Casimir in his room; and the Hungarians having in vain solicited the emperor to send his young pupil as their king, committed the administration of their kingdom to Hunniades, whom they revered as the saviour of their country. This general having been ransomed after the battle of Varna, had defeated the Turks in Upper Mesia, and compelled the count de Celley, though the emperor's father-in-law, to do homage for his dominions to the kingdom of Hungary.<sup>d</sup>

THE states assembled at Pest, sent deputies to the emperor to demand their crown, which had been delivered to him by queen Elizabeth; and, upon his refusal to give it up, they resolved to obtain it by force of arms. With this view they declared war against him, and Hunniades, at the head of 10,000 chosen men, made an irruption to the very gates of Vienna, from whence he returned to Presburg laden with booty, and terrified the emperor to such a degree, that he durst not quit the fortress of Neustadt, until a truce for three years was established through the good offices of the count de Celley.<sup>e</sup>

The diet of Prague sends ambassadors to the emperor and the pope.

By this time the Bohemians, tired and harassed by the factions supported by their two administrators, began to long for the arrival of their young king, under whose authority they hoped peace and union might be re-established in the kingdom. Mean while, Ptacek dying, the Hussites elected George de Podiebrad in his place, that he might counterbalance the power of Maison Neuve, who was their enemy; and their religious disputes continuing, the diet of the kingdom was convoked at Prague, where it was resolved to send one embassy to the emperor to demand their young king, and another to the pope, soliciting the confirmation of their archbishop Rockizane, who had been excommunicated by the court of Rome.<sup>f</sup>

FREDERIC's attention was at this period employed in contriving expedients for defending the dominions of the empire from the troops of the dauphin, called Armagnacs, which committed terrible ravages in Alsace; when the princes of the empire, incensed at these hostilities, resolved to take arms against France, and entrusted Lewis count palatine with the conduct of that expedition; but, before things came to that extremity, a diet was held at Spire, in which, by the mediation of the archbishops of Cologn and Triers, who were in the French interest, it was resolved first to try the expedient of a negotiation. In consequence of this resolution, ambassadors were sent to the dauphin to demand satisfaction, upon which he nominated five persons of rank as his deputies, who had orders to declare, in his name, that, as the emperor had invited him into Germany, he insisted upon a confirmation of the treaties made with the nobility of Alsace, and upon having winter-quarters assigned to his troops, otherwise the hostilities should be continued. The French had been for some time in possession of Lauffinburg, Sickingen, and some other places; but, not contented with these, they likewise demanded Brisac and Fribourg; finally, they proposed that Sigismund duke of Austria should repair to France, and consummate the marriage<sup>g</sup>

- a with the daughter of king Charles, the dauphin's sister, and for that purpose remit the jewels and money which had been left to them by Frederic of Austria. To these demands the emperor replied by the mouth of Albert of Brandenburg, that he had indeed solicited the king of France for a succour of 5000 men, but had never dreamed he would send 40,000; and that, by the custom of Germany, the treasure and jewels of princes always devolved to their successors. At length it was agreed, that the dauphin should retreat with his troops from the territories of the empire, and that the Germans should demand no reparation for the damage they had sustained<sup>a</sup>.

- b THE dauphin's retreat did not re-establish the peace of Alsace; for the troops of the count palatine plundered the fiefs belonging to the noblemen and towns that favoured the French; and the Austrians committed the same excesses upon the territory of Basil, which was in alliance with the Swiss. These outrages were retorted with great rancour upon the lands, subjects, and allies, of the house of Austria, and the whole country became a scene of rapine, cruelty, and confusion, until peace and order were restored by the mediation of the elector palatine; the marquis of Baden; and the count of Willemburg<sup>c</sup>.

- c THESE troubles being appealed, the electors of the empire assembled at Frankfort on account of Theodoric archbishop of Cologne, and James archbishop of Triers, whom Eugenius had deposed, because they adhered to Felix and the council of Basil, agreed among themselves, that unless Eugenius would declare their deposition void, suppress the taxes with which the German nation was burthened by the court of Rome, and own the authority of councils, such as it had been declared at Constance, they would assent to the sentence which had been pronounced against him at the council of Basil. This resolution being intimated to Frederic, he sent Aeneas Sylvius, his secretary, to Eugenius, exhorting him to treat the electors of the empire with more respect, and, above all things, to restore the archbishops to their former dignity, if he expected to see an end of that schism which divided the church. His remonstrances had such weight with Eugenius, that he promised to be swayed by the emperor's advice; and sent ambassadors to another assembly at Frankfort, in which certain articles of accommodation were proposed, and afterwards ratified at Rome<sup>d</sup>.

- d THE fathers of the council of Basil, finding themselves in danger of being utterly deserted, had, a little before this accommodation, published a decree, in which, after having observed, that the best method for removing the schism would be to hold a new council, they professed their readiness to concur with that expedient, and agree to any place that should be pitched upon by the emperors and electors assembled at the diet of Frankfort. But no measures could be contrived to heal the divisions that still remained in Bohemia. The politicians convoked diet after diet, without being able to form any resolution, but that of sending another deputation to demand Ladislans of the emperor, who would not even indulge them with an audience. In vain did the pope send cardinal Carvajal to pacify the troubles at Prague: though the catholics and Maison Neuve submitted to the directions of the holy see, Podiebrad and his Hussites persuaded the people that the pope and Frederic intended to deprive them of their religious liberties; and taking advantage of the commotion they had raised, attacked and imprisoned Maison Neuve; who died in a few days after this misfortune, not without suspicion of poison. In consequence of his death, Podiebrad remained in peaceable possession of Prague and the whole kingdom, and Rockizane was re-established in his cathedral<sup>e</sup>.

- e JUST as Bohemia began to respire from the horrors of a civil and religious war, Alsace was involved in fresh confusion by a quarrel between Frederic elector palatine and the counts of Lutzelstein, who declared war against him on pretence of his having seized their castle of Einertzhausen, and plundered their subjects. They first of all wrote him a letter, containing a detail of their grievances, and then committed hostilities on his lands and officers. Frederic, incensed at their presumption, levied a numerous army, and, investing the castle of Lutzelstein, carried on the siege with such vigour, that notwithstanding the brave defence made by count James, who commanded the besieged, he was fain to make his escape over the Palatine's intrenchments, and the garrison surrendered upon honourable conditions. As for the counts, they were obliged to go in quest of a livelihood in some other country, where they died without issue, after having made some fruitless efforts to relieve their castle.

War in Alsace between Frederic, elector palatine, and the counts of Lutzelstein, who lose their all.

- f THE emperor concerned himself very little in these private quarrels, so much was he engrossed in the affairs of religion; however, his endeavours to terminate the schism were at last crowned with success; for about this time he prevailed with Felix to abdicate upon certain conditions, which were confirmed by Nicholas V. who had succeeded Eugenius (N).

(N) In the year 1447, pope Nicholas, after his election, sent a legate into Germany, to take cognizance of certain grievances touching church benefices, of which the Germans loudly complained. These grievances were accordingly

FREDERIC, who acknowledged Nicholas for lawful pope, had ordered the inhabitants of Basil to put an end to the council which was held in their city, and dismiss the fathers of it before the feast of St. Martin. To this first order, which was published on Michaelmas-day, the citizens of Basil having paid no regard, the emperor, towards the latter end of the same year, sent to them a second imperial decree, and afterwards a third, in which he threatened to put them to the ban of the empire for disobedience. In consequence of these menaces, the fathers were obliged to transfer their council to Lausanne, where they earnestly exerted their endeavours to terminate the schism; and this grand affair was afterwards concluded, on condition that Felix should renounce the papacy in favour of Nicholas, who should confirm the decrees of the synod of Basil <sup>a</sup>.

A war between the marquis of Brandenburg and the city of Nuremberg.

FREDERIC, besides his endeavour to re-establish the peace of the church, employed his good offices, though in vain, to terminate a contest, which had lasted some years, between the city of Nuremberg and Albert marquis of Brandenburg, who was distinguished by the appellation of The German Achilles (O). The city pretended to be free, and independent of any other sovereignty than that of the emperor and the empire; while the marquisses of Brandenburg, being likewise burgraves of Nuremberg, affirmed, that not only the city, but all the country adjacent belonging to the city, depended upon and held of their burgraviate. This dispute was gradually inflamed to an open war. Albert, by the assistance of seventeen provinces of the empire, who were his friends or relations, had raised a strong army, with which he attacked the city; and the magistrates and burghers of Nuremberg, being well provided with ammunition, provision, and men, which they received from several imperial cities, sustained the siege with great bravery and resolution. In a word, the war being maintained on both sides in ravaging and ruining the little towns, boroughs, and villages, in the neighbourhood, together with the whole adjacent country, both sides were constrained, by the dearth of provisions, to listen to proposals of peace, which was accordingly concluded <sup>b</sup>.

Christian II. succeeds Christopher king of Denmark.

In the course of this year Christopher of Bavaria, king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, dying, was succeeded by Christian II. son of Theodoric count of Oldenbourg, from whom the present king of Denmark is descended; but the Swedes, being tired of a foreign dominion, elevated Canutson their grand marshal to the throne of that kingdom; and at the same time he had address enough to acquire the sovereignty of Norway by the unanimous election of the states of that antient monarchy, to which he repaired; and, after his coronation at Drontheim, conferred the charge of the administration upon two principal noblemen of the country <sup>c</sup>.

Hunniades is defeated by the Turks.

A. D. 1449.

HUNGARY being again threatened by Amurath, Hunniades made preparation for giving him a warm reception; and, hurried on by the impetuosity of his courage, passed the Danube, and advanced to the frontiers of Bulgaria, in order to stop the sultan in the midst of his career. Though his troops were greatly inferior in number to the Turks, he attacked them with an undaunted valour; but, after having maintained the battle three days, was at length overpowered, and intirely defeated. The greatest part of the nobility, together with the pope's legate, were left dead upon the spot; and Hunniades himself, after having sustained incredible hardships in making his escape, fell into the hands of George, despot of Rascia, who would not release him until he had given one of his sons as hostage <sup>d</sup>.

One would imagine the inhabitants of Ladislaws had been in a peculiar manner destined to unceasing calamities. The Catholics of Bohemia, being oppressed by Podiebrad and his Calixtins, had recourse to arms, and the war revived with all its former vivacity, tho' it was in a little time suspended by a truce; during which the states assembled at Czastlaw, in order to concert measures for appeasing the troubles; and the party of Podiebrad proposed, accordingly discussed in presence of the emperor and the ecclesiastical and secular princes, and certain articles agreed upon, under the name of Concordata, which were afterwards confirmed and ratified by the pope. These concordata, which are almost as famous as the articles of the golden bull, shall, for the information of the reader, be inserted at the end of this history.

(O) The foundation of Albert's claim was this: Frederic IV. his father, had appropriated to himself the title of burgrave of Nuremberg, not that he had any right of sovereignty over the city, but only because he had acquired a sort of right of protection, from having frequently assisted it against his neighbours. The emperor, Lewis of Bavaria, had, in the year 1315, mortgaged

Nuremberg to Adolphus of Austria, who did not enjoy it above twenty years; for the people, having shook off his yoke, entered into an association with the Swiss cantons for the mutual defence of their liberties, and engaged in their confederacy the cities of Constance, Basil, and Straßburg, which still retained their freedom (1).

This Albert was distinguished by the names of the German Achilles and the Fox of Germany. He was a prince of great personal prowess, and abounded with all the stratagems of war; was remarkable for his vivacity, eloquence, and craft, as well as for the innumerable scars with which his whole body was covered (2).

a that they should elect a sovereign from among the natives, without exposing themselves to further repulses from the emperor; but the majority were of opinion, that they should send another embassy to redeem Ladislaus; and Podiebrad assenting to this proposal, it was forthwith put in execution.

FREDERIC, however, still excused himself, on account of the minority of his pupil; but being alarmed at the design of the Hussites, he sent his secretary Æneas Sylvius to remonstrate to the Bohemian diet upon the injustice and ingratitude they should be guilty of in chusing another king to the prejudice of Ladislaus, whose ancestors had laid their country under such obligations. In a word, this minister, by his ability, eloquence, and insinuating address, disposed the Bohemians to acquiesce in the conduct of the emperor, who promised to send Ladislaus to Prague, as soon as he should be capable of performing the kingly function; and at the same time he gained over Podiebrad to the interest of Frederic, who afterwards acknowledged his services, by creating his two sons princes of Munsterberg <sup>a</sup>.

The emperor sends Æneas Sylvius to the states of that kingdom, and gains over Podiebrad to his interest.
A. D. 1450.

THE peace of Bohemia being thus restored, and the important dispute touching the council in which all Christendom had been interested, happily compromised, Frederic began to direct his attention to the affairs of Italy. Upon the death of Philip Maria, the last of the family of Galeazzo, who, had no legitimate male issue, several pretenders to the succession started up, though the duchy, as a fief, of right devolved to the empire. Nevertheless, Alphonso king of Naples demanded it, on pretence, that the last duke had declared him his heir. On the other hand, Charles duke of Orleans, son of Valentina, who was daughter of John Galeazzo, the first duke of Milan, claimed that duchy, by virtue of his mother's contract of marriage; in which it was expressly stipulated, that her children should succeed to the duchy of Milan, in case her brother should die without heirs male; and this clause was confirmed by the pope's approbation. The third competitor was Francis Sforza, one of the greatest warriors of his time, who having married Blanche Maria, natural daughter of Philip Maria Galeazzo, by whom he was also adopted, aspired to the possession of his fortune, and resolved to support his pretensions by force of arms. The city of Milan was of course divided into factions, who espoused the cause of this or that pretender; but the people, desirous of profiting by this occasion, chose twelve persons, into whose hands they put the administration of the state, and offered a certain annual sum to the emperor, provided he would allow the city to be erected into a republic. Mean while the succession of duke Philip became a prey to all who had inclination and force to seize it. Placentia, Cremona, and Lodi, fell into the hands of the Venetians; the duke of Savoy made himself master of Valentia and Conflans; other territories were usurped by other powers; and Francis Sforza attached himself to the city of Milan, the siege of which he undertook in form. The inhabitants, seeing themselves thus invested, had recourse to Frederic, who sent two of his ministers to assist them with their advice. The besieged offered to put themselves wholly under his power, provided he would raise the siege; but after having in vain waited for succour two whole months, and endured the utmost extremity of want, they were fain to capitulate, and open their gates to the conqueror <sup>b</sup>.

The affairs of Italy.

e NEXT year Frederic resolved upon a journey to Italy, in order to be crowned at Rome, with Eleonora, sister of the king of Portugal, to whom he was contracted in marriage, and whom he had promised to meet at Sienna. Mean while he dispatched Æneas Sylvius, with an intimation of his design, to the pope, who at first seemed very well disposed for his reception; but was afterwards so terrified by the insinuations of the duke of Milan and other Italian noblemen, who represented Frederic as an ambitious prince, who wanted to invade the ecclesiastical dominions, that he sent his secretary to dissuade the emperor from his journey, as an expedition impracticable in the winter. But Æneas Sylvius, who tarried at Sienna, being informed of his apprehensions, found means to dispel them so effectually, that Nicholas no longer dreaded the views of the emperor, whom he now invited to Rome with great cordiality; for, at bottom, he was ambitious of having the honour to confer the imperial crown <sup>c</sup>.

The duke of Milan endeavours to create a jealousy between the emperor and the pope.

FREDERIC's departure, however, was retarded by a revolt in Vienna, excited by a Bavarian gentleman, called Eisfinger, who had quarrelled with the emperor about the purchase of a castle belonging to the duke of Austria. He alleged, that Frederic had defrauded him of his purchase, and in order to be revenged, instigated the Austrian noblemen to assemble at Meilperg, and demand that the emperor would send Ladislaus among them, otherwise they would renounce his authority, and expel the governor, whom he had established. The malecontents afterwards entering Vienna, raised an insurrection among the people, and finally, being joined by the counts of Celley, ravaged all the towns, villages, and lands, belonging to the friends and adherents of Frederic, who, having tried to appease these disorders by remonstrances, invested the duke of Austria with full power and authority to levy troops for opposing the progress of the rebellion; and, in the mean time, he himself departed for Italy, accompanied by young Ladislaus, and great part of the Bohemian and Hungarian nobility <sup>a</sup>. The princess Eleanora at the same time embarked at Lisbon; and arriving at Pisa, was conducted to Sienna, where she found the emperor waiting to receive her <sup>c</sup>. Frederic was met, just as he crossed the Alps, by the ambassadors of Venice, who conducted him to their city, where he made his public entry with great magnificence (O): from thence he repaired to Ferrara, where he found ambassadors from Francis Sforza duke of Milan, inviting him to return by that city, where he should receive the iron crown; and here too he was waited upon by the deputies of Florence and Bologna, <sup>b</sup> who craved the honour of entertaining him at these cities, which he accordingly visited: from Florence he took the route of Sienna, where (as we have already observed) he was joined by the princess Eleanora, attended by a splendid and numerous retinue; and in this city he gave audience to the pope's legates, who represented to him, that by ancient custom, and established right, the emperors always took an oath to the pope before they entered the territories of St. Peter's patrimony; and demanded, that, if he designed to proceed, he should conform to the same practice. Frederic, in this particular, complied with the desire of his holiness (P).

WHILE he spent a few days in this place, until the princess should be recovered from the fatigue of her voyage, which had been long and dangerous, he was solicited for recommendation to the court of Rome by the chief of an embassy from the Austrians, who pretended they were sent by the states to request some favours of his holiness; but Frederic, suspecting his sincerity, ordered his papers and instructions to be seized, and found that this deputation was from Eisfinger, and the malecontents, who represented Frederic to the pope and cardinals as a tyrant, oppressor, and usurper of the dominions belonging to young Ladislaus; and gave the college to understand, that for these reasons they had withdrawn themselves from his authority. These remonstrances might have operated at the court of Rome to the prejudice of the emperor, had not he luckily made this discovery; in consequence of which he anticipated the malice of the Austrians, and found means to justify himself to the pope in such a manner, that his holiness entered into his resentment, and promised to excommunicate the rebels as soon as Frederic should be in a condition to chastise them with the temporal sword. <sup>d</sup>

THE emperor was received at Viterbo with great splendor, according to the directions of Nicholas. Nevertheless, a great tumult happened when he approached the palace at which he was to alight. Some young people, who had taken possession of an elevated place, drew towards them with iron hooks, the cloth of gold that adorned the canopy under which the emperor rode; and, a dispute arising among themselves, it was torn to pieces. This example encouraged others to practise the same licence. The pope's soldiers advancing, endeavoured to pull the emperor from his horse, which they imagined

It was scarce set down, when his jester, directed by his nod, shook the table to such a degree, that the cup-board fell off, and broke into a thousand pieces; upon which the emperor observed with a smile, that; if it had been made of gold, it would not have met with such a misfortune; a hint, in consequence of which he was afterwards presented with some other curiosities of that precious metal (1).

(P) The oath, which the emperor took, was conceived in these terms: "Sanctissimo Domino nostro, domino Nicolao, Divina Providentia papæ, Ego Fredericus, rex Romanorum, promitto et juro, per Patrem, et Filium, et Spiritum Sanctum, et per lignum vivificæ crucis, et per has reliquias sanctorum, quod si, permittente Domino, Romam venero, sanctam Romanam ecclesiam, et sanctitatem suam rectorem ipsius exaltabo, secundum meum posse. Thus englished: "To our most holy lord, Nicholas, by the Divine Providence, pope, I Frederic king of the Romans, promise and swear, by the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, by the wood of the vivifying cross, and of these relics of saints, that if, by permission of the Lord, I shall come to Rome, I will exalt the holy Roman church, and his holiness, who presides over it, to the best of my power. Nor will I, in the city of Rome, make any law or decree, touching those things that belong to his holiness or the Romans, without your advice. - a would become the property of that person who should have address enough to seize him; and others, still more presumptuous, attempted to snatch off his hat, which they saw adorned with a jewel of great value. In the midst of this tumult, Frederic turning towards the legates, "I find, said he, we must make use of our hands, and think of repelling force " by force." With these words he snatched a staff from one of his domestics, and, disengaging himself from those who attacked him, wheeled about, put spurs to his horse, and charged them with great fury, overturning all that stood in his way. The legates followed the example of the emperor, and, arming themselves with the same kind of weapons, employed them to the same purpose. The gentlemen of Frederick's retinue drew their swords, rushed among the crowd, and this sort of battle lasted upwards of an hour;
- b when the populace, being no longer able to resist the blows and wounds which were dealt among them, betook themselves to flight. The governor of the Patrimony, who was the pope's own nephew, committed several of those seditious people to prison; but Frederic, who was more apt to forgive than to revenge an insult, interposed in their behalf, and obtained their release <sup>f</sup>.

FROM Viterbo, Frederic repaired to Rome, accompanied by the empress and the young king of Bohemia and Hungary, who was still under his tuition. He was no sooner in the sight of that capital, than the whole college of cardinals went out to meet him; and as it was customary for the emperor, who went thither to be crowned, to stay some time before the town, Frederic ordered tents to be pitched before the walls, where he passed that night.

- c Next day he made a public entry, and was crowned king of Lombardy, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the deputies of Milan, who protested against this coronation, which was performed at the request of the emperor, on account of the plague of Milan, as well as of the umbrage which that city had given to Frederic, in embracing the yoke of a stranger, to the prejudice of the empire, to which it properly belonged.

THE cardinals, being consulted upon this subject, were of opinion, that the pope, by virtue of the plenitude of his power, could confer the crown of Lombardy; and that the emperor's request ought not to be refused; tho' they instituted a new oath, which he took upon the occasion. Three days after this ceremony, he was married to Eleonora, and with her received the imperial crown; then he and the pope ratified the Concordata of the Ger-

- d man nation, touching the collation of prelacies and other benefices, which had been some years before agreed to by cardinal Carvajal, his legate in Germany. A few days after his marriage he and the empress set out for Naples, on a visit to king Alphonso, who was her uncle. There being treated with incredible magnificence, during Holy Week and Easter, he returned to Rome, where, in two orations spoken publicly by his secretary, he returned thanks to the pope and cardinals for the great favours he had received, and exhorted them to promote the general passagium, or military expedition, in favour of the Greeks against the Mahometans <sup>g</sup> (Q).

HAVING transacted his affairs at Rome, he departed from that city on his return to Germany, and in his passage thro' Ferrara was waited upon by Borfi marquis of Este, a prince of extraordinary merit, whom he created duke of Modena and Reggio. There also he knighted Galeazo, son of Francis duke of Milan, a youth of most engaging behaviour and great expectation <sup>h</sup>. Being afterwards royally received at Venice, he quitted Italy, leaving behind him a very contemptible character, both in point of understanding and liberality; nor was he altogether pleased with the success of his journey, as having had occasion to see a great many territories of the empire usurped by those who had no other right to possess them, than that which was derived by force of arms. The duke of Milan had applied to him for the investiture of his duchy, which the emperor refused to grant, unless he would agree to pay him a certain yearly sum, or put him in possession of the city of Corno and Parma.

- f ON his return to Austria he found himself involved in abundance of difficulties, particularly in a dispute with the Hungarians, who had often intreated him to send home their king Ladislaus, whom he still detained at his court, on pretence of being guardian to that young prince. They had likewise, by the most earnest repeated instances, besought him to restore their crown and regalia, which were in his custody; but he found means, under various pretences, to postpone his compliance with their demands. The Austrians being joined by a number of Bohemians, and encouraged by several princes of the empire, sent another deputation to expostulate with them upon the same subject; but he still lent a deaf ear to their request, and amused them with fresh evasions, till at length, tired with his excuses, and provoked by his delays, they had recourse to arms, took the field under the conduct of Eisfinger, surprised and besieged him at Neustadt, and compelled him to sign an accommodation; in which it was concluded, that Ladislaus, being yet of too tender an age to take upon him the administration of his kingdom, he should be put under the tuition of Ulric count Celley, his uncle by the mother's side, and that the dispute, touching the wardship of the emperor, should be discussed and determined at Vienna<sup>i</sup>.

COUNT Celley's ambition increased with the power which he derived from being governor of Ladislaus. He attempted to make himself absolute master in Austria: he secured the principal fortresses, by giving the command of them to his creatures; and gradually removed Eisfinger and the Austrian nobility from all offices of importance, which he bestowed upon his own friends and favourites.

THESE proceedings gave great umbrage to the people; and Eisfinger profiting by their discontent, roused their resentment to such a degree, that the count was obliged to retire to his own country, after having delivered up the person of Ladislaus, who consented to take the oath imposed upon him by the Bohemians, and repaired to Prague, where he was crowned with great solemnity<sup>k</sup>.

DURING these contests, Mahomet II. succeeding his father Amurath II. and being equally ambitious of extending his conquest, subdued the rest of Greece, took the city of Constantinople by assault, in which the emperor Constantine Paleologus was slain with all his followers. By this expedition the Roman empire in the east was utterly annihilated, under a prince of the same name with him to whom it owed its beginning; and the Turks at that time seemed bent upon adding the western empire to their conquest. This progress of the Mahometans alarmed the princes of Christendom, and induced them to unite, in order to check the career of the common enemy. A diet was convoked at Ratisbon on this subject, and the members unanimously agreed, that there was a necessity for taking some speedy methods to stop the progress of the infidels; but what these methods should be, was a consideration referred to another assembly at Frankfort, where, though there was a great concourse of princes, and a vast appearance of zeal, very little was done for the common cause. It was agreed, indeed, that the Hungarians should be reinforced with ten thousand horse and two-and-thirty thousand infantry; and that the electors and princes should repair to Neustadt, to concert measures with the emperor for raising these troops. Pope

A. D. 1455.

Nicholas dying in the interim was succeeded by Calixtus III. who sent legates to all the princes in Christendom, exhorting them to engage in a crusade; and all of them expressed abundance of zeal for the interests of Christianity: but, how promising soever appearances might be, they produced very little effect to the advantage of the common cause. The pope himself, indeed, by dint of presents and solicitations excited the sophi of Persia to make a diversion on his side, while the Christians should attack them on the other. The Germans, by the exhortations and remonstrances of cardinal Carvajal, legate of the holy see in that country, were prevailed upon to raise troops and send them to Hunniades, who alone sustained the efforts of the Mahometans in Hungary. Reinforced by these succours he marched directly to Belgrade, which was invested by Mahomet, and, after a very obstinate engagement, compelled him to raise the siege, and retreat with the loss of 40,000 men killed on the spot<sup>l</sup>. But Hunniades dying a few days after of a fever, occasioned by the fatigue he had undergone in the battle, the Christians were so disconcerted by the loss of their general, that in minding their own particular affairs, they utterly abandoned the common cause. Indeed all the schemes, which had for two years been projected for the support of this holy war, proved abortive, thro' the interruptions occasioned by particular quarrels in Germany as well by the sloth and timidity of the emperor himself; for Frederic, notwithstanding the pressing instances of the pope, the zeal and industry of the legate Carvajal, who had effected the convocation of two diets to deliberate upon measures for the support of this war, preaching up the crusade with great energy and eloquence; I say, notwithstanding these incitements, the emperor would never heartily embark in the undertaking. He even declined an interview with Philip duke of Burgundy, who had come into Germany on purpose to confer with him and the princes on that subject; being in all probability, averse to a war, which would infallibly expose him to danger and expence.

BESIDES, a misunderstanding happened between pope Calixtus III. and the princes of the empire. Frederic had sent an ambassador to congratulate the new pope upon his elevation, and to assure him of his implicit obedience. This step he had taken contrary to the inclination of some electors, who used their utmost endeavours to persuade him, that it was time to bridle the power of the popes, who could not reasonably expect to be obeyed, until they should have granted better conditions; for the Germans were much more oppressed by them than either the Italians or French. The electors of the Rhine also assem-

- a bled and drew up a schedule of the grievances, which the nation sustained from the tyranny of the court of Rome. This remonstrance, among other things, imported, that the pope did not observe the decrees of the councils of Constance and Basle: that he did not think himself obliged by the Concordata made with pope Nicholas V. his predecessor: that he despised the German nation, and seemed bent upon exhausting it intirely: that the elections of prelates were generally rejected: that the benefices and dignities of any consideration were reserved for cardinals and prothonotaries: that livings, for the most part, were promised before they became vacant: that the annates were not only exacted with extreme rigour, but more was extorted on that account than was really due: that the government of churches was not conferred according to merit, but always upon those who paid the highest price: that new indulgencies were granted every day, by which the empire was drained of its money: that, under the pretext of a war against the Turks, the ecclesiastic tythes were seized, without the privity or consent of the bishops: that causes which ought to be tried in Germany, were continually appealed to the tribunal of the pope; and a thousand methods invented to attract all the money of the empire to Rome. The emperor himself was disposed to join the electors in this remonstrance, but he was hindered by the influence which his ministers had over him; and the pope answered this accusation article by article in several epistles contained in the collection of Aeneas Sylvius, who indeed wrote them for the justification of his holiness <sup>m</sup>.

strance.

- c As it was absolutely necessary for checking the progress of the Turks, that the Christian princes should act with concord and unanimity, the pope, understanding that the old grudge between the emperor and Ladislaus, originally owing to Frederic's having detained him longer than he desired under his tuition, had now broke out into open war, he not only wrote letters to both, exhorting them to peace and reconciliation, but also sent his apostolic legate, John cardinal of St. Angelo, to use his endeavours for an accommodation, which Lewis duke of Bavaria undertook to effect as mediator between them <sup>n</sup>: but, before this peace could be established, Ladislaus being at Prague, in order to celebrate his nuptials with Magdalen, daughter of the king of France, he was suddenly taken ill, and died, not without suspicion of poison, which the Catholics fix upon Rockizane, who had declared himself protector of the Hussites, to whom he knew the king was averse; while others charge it to Podiebrad, who was supposed to aspire to the sovereignty. Upon the death of this young prince several competitors arose for the succession of the crown of Hungary and Bohemia <sup>o</sup>.

accommodation
between the emperor and Ladislaus,

treaty.

- The emperor pretended to dispose of the crown of Bohemia, because Ladislaus had neglected to do homage to the empire, and intended to bestow it either upon himself or upon some other prince of his house. Casimir, brother-in-law of Ladislaus, claimed it in right of his wife: William duke of Saxony demanded the preference of this prince, because he had married the eldest sister of the last king; while Albert and Sigismund, dukes of Austria, founded their title upon a pactum familiae between the two houses, touching a reciprocal succession, in case of failure of male issue; but Podiebrad, by means of Rockizane, had the good fortune to foil all his competitors, and was actually proclaimed king of Bohemia, almost without opposition <sup>p</sup>.

- HUNGARY* likewise was claimed by fundry pretenders; but the remembrance of the great services done to that kingdom by Hunniades united all the suffrages in favour of his son Matthias, who was then a prisoner in Bohemia, whither he had been removed by Ladislaus, in consequence of the murder of the count de Celley, for which the elder brothers of Matthias had been beheaded at Buda.

elected king of Hungary.

- PODIEBRAD*, understanding that this young prince was elected king of Hungary, promised to set him at liberty, provided he would marry his daughter; and this condition was fulfilled with the consent of the Hungarian states.

- f As for the dominions of Austria that belonged to Ladislaus, the succession involved the emperor in a war with two princes, from which he reaped nothing but damage and disgrace. These were his own brother Albert IV. surnamed The Prodigal, and Sigismund count of Tyrol, his cousin-german, who, as well as himself, were descended from Albert the Sage. Frederic, as eldest, claimed the possession of Austria; Albert, his brother, alleged that he already was in possession of too many provinces; that he had already too much availed himself of his birth-right in sharing the succession of his father; and that, in case of this duchy, it was but reasonable he should have some regard to the rights of his brother and cousin. On the other hand, the states of Austria would not yield obedience to either of these competitors; so that all three concurred in desolating the country <sup>q</sup>. palatine. By this agreement the emperor acquired the possession of Lower Austria as far as the river Ems; the country on the other side of that river was given to Albert; Upper Carinthia, in the neighbourhood of Tyrol, became the portion of Sigismund; and it was agreed, that each of these princes should have a separate palace in the castle of Vienna.

THIS dispute furnished Frederic with an excuse for absenting himself from the assembly at Mantua, convoked by Æneas Sylvius, who had by this time succeeded to the papacy by the name of Pius II. To this congress the new pope invited all the princes of Christendom, that they might form a league against the Turks; but so many countries, and Germany in particular, were embarrassed with intestine broils, that the success of this assembly did not answer the zeal and expectation of his holiness. The northern parts of the empire were embroiled by Christian king of Denmark, who seized upon the duchies of Holstein and Sleswic, upon the death of duke Alphonfus, and did homage for both to the emperor.

A storm ready to burst upon the head of the emperor.

PODIEBRAD was not yet firmly established upon the throne of Bohemia, which he had mounted in direct opposition to Frederic and the pope: Matthias did not think himself secure of the kingdom of Hungary, because he had not yet received the crown, which the emperor detained without any shadow of pretence; and this defect in Matthias had great weight with his superstitious subjects. The kings of France and England absolutely refused to engage in this crusade; Sigismund of Austria had incurred the sentence of excommunication from the pope for having outraged and imprisoned cardinal Cusa; the dukes of Bavaria, the elector of Mentz, the count palatine of the Rhine, and almost all the princes of Germany, were so much disgusted at the indolence, pusillanimity, and sordid disposition of Frederic, that they held private consultations, in order to deliberate on the means for setting him aside, and electing a new king of the Romans.

He found means, however, to appease Matthias with fair promises, and to attach Podiebrad to his interest, by renouncing his pretensions to the crown of Bohemia, and undertaking to support the new king with all his influence; and he was screened from the resentment of the other princes by the interposition and good offices of Albert marquis of Brandenburg.

Lewis duke of Bavaria-Landshut revives his pretensions to Donawert. A. D. 1460.

BESIDES those dissensions, which in a great measure prevented the success of the assembly at Mantua, other disputes intervened to harass and distract the empire. Lewis duke of Bavaria-Landshut revived his pretensions upon Donawert, which the emperor Sigismund had declared a free imperial town, and actually invested the place with an army of 20,000 men, which he was enabled to raise by a treaty he had made with Frederic elector palatine, Otho and John counts palatine of the Rhine, Ulric of Wurtemberg, and several other noblemen of the empire.

FREDERIC complained of these proceedings to the diet held at Nuremberg; and the Bavarian refusing to withdraw his troops, war was declared, and a strong body of forces sent against him under the command of Albert the German Achilles, who soon retook the city of Donawert, which had surrendered to Lewis; and conducted himself with such intrepidity and discretion, that the emperor created him judge through all Germany, with a delegated power to summon all persons guilty of state crimes before his tribunal.

He is put to the ban of the empire. Engages in a war with Albert marquis of Brandenburg, whom he defeats.

LEWIS duke of Bavaria-Landshut appealed from this authority to the diet at Nuremberg, and demanded a sight of the patent that established his office, which, being presented to him for his perusal, he read, and tore it in pieces, even in presence of the emperor, who was so much incensed at his presumption, that he forthwith put him to the ban of the empire. The states were ordered to furnish the margrave of Brandenburg with troops to execute the sentence; and tho' the imperial towns of Suabia obeyed, those of Franconia refused their contingent; while the Hussites of Bohemia, part of Austria, and all Bavaria declared for Lewis. Both armies took the field, hostilities commenced, and notwithstanding the efforts of Podiebrad, who endeavoured to mediate a peace, the war was protracted about three years with various success: Brandenburg and Lower Bavaria were ravaged in their turns: Lewis was assisted by the count palatine of the Rhine, the bishops of Wurtzburg and Bamberg, and Otho duke of Mosbach; the elector of Brandenburg numbered among his allies the count of Wurtemberg, the margrave of Baden, and thirty-two imperial towns of Suabia. At length the two armies met between Ulm and Noddingen, and a very obstinate and bloody battle ensued, in which the German Achilles, being utterly defeated, was obliged to sue for peace. This was accordingly effected by the mediation of Podiebrad, in a treaty concluded at Prague, importing, that the emperor should permit Lewis to enjoy the rights he claimed to the bishopric of Archielet, the honorary of the Jews at Ratisbon, and the fiefs he demanded as of right belonging to the Bavarian house in Austria.

a THIS was not the only war that distressed the interior parts of the empire. Another flame broke out between Diethric count d'Usembourg, and Adolphus of Nassau, who were competitors for the archbishopric of Mentz. The first had been elected by a majority of the canons; but he was excommunicated by pope Pius II. because he had not paid the annates; and, by direction of his holiness, recourse was had to a new election, which determined in favour of Adolphus. Then both parties appealed to the decision of arms, and mutual ravages were committed for some years, until Diethric, tired of the dispute, ceded his right to Adolphus, received absolution from the pope's nuncio, and spent the remainder of his life as a private gentleman.

b BEFORE these differences were compromised, Albert of Austria, still dissatisfied, and being supported by Lewis of Bavaria, took up arms again against the emperor, still on pretence that he had been injured in the division of his father's dominions; though he now reinforced that pretext by alledging the Austrians complained that the emperor had incroached upon their privileges. This quarrel was also made up for the present by the interposition of the king of Bohemia, who prevailed upon both parties to lay down their arms; but the dispute was afterwards inflamed to a greater degree of rancour, which broke out in a more cruel intestine war. Albert, appearing before Vienna at the head of his troops, was engaged by the emperor's forces, who obliged him to retreat. The inhabitants of that city, tho' very little attached to the emperor, were divided into two factions; the senate, and wiser part of the burghers, seemed to espouse the interest of Frederic, while the people, and the c consul Holzer at their head, inclined to Albert. In the midst of these transactions, the emperor presented himself before Vienna at the head of 4000 men, and was at first refused admittance. Some time after, however, the gates were opened, but not before he had promised to overlook the affront he received. He then took cognizance of their affairs, changed the magistrates according to the inclination of the burghers, and re-established the tranquillity of the city, which, however, was soon interrupted by a tumult that arose among the people. In the neighbourhood of the city were some soldiers, part of whom, during the preceding wars, had been in the service of the emperor, and part of them in the army of Albert. These, joining in a body, demanded the arrears that were due to them; and, as no satisfaction was given, they began to pillage the country. Complaints of these rava-d ges were carried to Frederic, who being either distressed for want of money, or desirous of trying the affection of the people, demanded of the city a loan of 6000 ducats, to which, he said, he would add the like sum, in order to maintain the troops necessary to quell the disturbances of which they complained. The inhabitants of Vienna, refusing to comply with this request, or even to furnish the half of that sum, to which he afterwards lowered his demand, he threatened the city with his resentment, and would neither satisfy the soldiers, nor take any step for putting an end to the violences which they daily committed. The disorders of consequence increased, and the mutineers, rendered more audacious by impunity, insulted the vintages, and would not suffer them to carry their wine into the city; while those inhabitants who were in Albert's interest, took this opportunity to raise an insure rection against the emperor. The populace accordingly assembled in a tumultuous manner, renounced their allegiance, and seized all the money that was found in the public offices. Frederic, who with the empress, and his young son Maximilian, resided in the castle, thought he could appease the sedition by sending two of his officers to make representations to the ringleaders, and exhort the rest to return quietly to their homes: but, instead of listening to these remonstrances, they imprisoned the two officers, and actually formed the siege of the castle, after having concluded, for two years, a treaty of alliance with Albert. In a word, the emperor was so harrassed, and reduced to such extremity, that he and all his attendants must have perished by famine, had he not been relieved by the interposition of George Podiebrad, king of Bohemia. By his management a treaty was con-

f cluded, importing, that the prisoners on both sides should be released: that Albert should restore the fortresses, towns, and territories, of which he had possessed himself: that he should for eight years enjoy the government of Lower Austria in quality of vicar, and pay yearly to his brother the sum of 14,000 ducats*. Yet the articles of this agreement were observed by neither side. Albert could not prevail upon himself to part with his acquisitions, and Frederic not only refused to bestow upon him the administration of Lower Austria, but even put him to the ban of the empire, and persuaded the pope to saddle him with the sentence of excommunication.

THESE violent proceedings induced them both to have recourse again to arms; and their troops engaging near Neustadt, a battle ensued, in which a great deal of blood was spilt on both sides. Sigismund of Austria, Lewis of Bavaria, the empress Eleonora, and the pope, used their utmost endeavours to promote a reconciliation between the two brothers; but all their efforts proved ineffectual: Albert would not yield what was in his possession, and Frederic insisted upon being master of all Austria, in consideration of a sum of money, which he was willing to pay. What could not be compromised by human intercession, was determined by the decrees of heaven. Albert was overtaken by a sudden death, which some considered as a punishment from above, on account of his wicked life, and undutiful behaviour; while others ascribed it to poison; and a third set to an apoplexy, occasioned by his debauchery and incontinence. The physicians confirmed the suspicion of poison, by declaring they had observed marks of it when they inspected the body, and several persons were apprehended in consequence of their declaration; but, as no proofs of their guilt appeared, they were in a little time set at liberty. In the beginning of the following year, Sigismund yielded to the emperor that portion of Austria which he inherited from Ladislaus; so that Frederic at length found himself in peaceable possession of that whole duchy.

THE Hungarians, as we have already observed, seeing the difficulties in which the emperor was involved, instead of chusing a king from the house of Austria, had elected, in the room of Ladislaus, Matthias Corvinus, son of the valiant Hunniades; but the ceremony of his coronation was not performed at that time, because the emperor still detained the crown which they had always used for that purpose; besides, he had actually declared open war against them, with design to add that kingdom to his hereditary dominions; but his efforts were so feeble, that they had no apprehension of his being able to accomplish his aim by force of arms. At length, however, being heartily tired of the war, he consented to restore the crown, and concluded a treaty with Matthias, in which it was stipulated, that a mutual adoption of father and son should take place between these two princes; and that in case the king of Hungary should die without legitimate children or nephews, the crown should devolve to Frederic and the heirs of his body.

A. D. 1465.
Affairs of Denmark.

POPE Paul II. who had succeeded to the pontificate on the death of Pius, understanding that Mahomet II. was employed in making great preparations against Scanderbeg king of Albania, wrote to the states of Germany, demanding the 32,000 men to fight against the Turks, according to the promise their deputies had made in the assembly at Mantua; and at the same time he sent a legate to exhort Christian king of Denmark to join the German troops in this expedition; but the princes paid very little regard to his representations, and his Danish majesty was too much embarrassed at home to engage in a foreign war. Gerhard count of Oldembourg, on pretence of demanding certain sums that were due to him as successor to his brother Maurice, took advantage of Christian's absence in Sweden to invade Holstein and Lower Friesland, from the inhabitants of which he exacted the oaths of allegiance. The king of Denmark, being informed of this irruption, postponed his operations in Sweden against Charles Canutson, who had ascended the throne of that kingdom, and began his march towards Holstein, to check the progress of his brother Gerhard. Nevertheless, he was prevailed upon, by the mediation of his senators, to pardon this prince, who made his submission to him at Segeberg, and the Frieslanders took the oath of allegiance anew to Christian.

The pope excommunicates Podiebrad.
A. D. 1466.

MEAN while every thing tended to a rupture in Bohemia and Silesia. Podiebrad laid such religious restraints upon the catholics of Silesia, that the pope declared them exempted from all submission to that prince, and put them under the protection of Matthias king of Hungary. At the instigation of Rockizane he exerted the same tyranny over his catholic subjects of Bohemia, forcing upon them the ritual of the Calixtins, and punishing severely those who refused to communicate of both species. This spiritual oppression drove them to such despair, that they revolted against their sovereign, and were absolved from their allegiance by the pope, who summoned Podiebrad to appear at Rome within a specified time, empowered his legate to publish a crusade against him, and, finally, declared him convicted of perjury, sacrilege, and heresy, deprived of his crown, and all his children and posterity incapable of receiving any dignity whatsoever.

Peace between the Poles and the Teutonic knights of Prussia.

THO' Rodolphus did not succeed in his endeavours to excite the German princes against Podiebrad, he was more lucky in another negotiation, which he undertook at the same time; namely, that of mediating a reconciliation between the Poles and Teutonic knights, which, after a war of fourteen years, was confirmed by a treaty, importing, that all Pomerania, and some other provinces, should revert to the Poles: and that the Teutonic order in Prussia should be feudatory to the king of Poland.

As for the emperor, he indulged his indolence and timidity to such a degree of carelessness and indifference for the affairs of the empire, that he never dreamed of interposing his good offices or authority in order to prevent the desolation and slavery of Liege, which had revolted against its bishop, Lewis of Bourbon, on account of some privileges he wanted to retrieve, and by this insurrection intailed upon itself a war with his uncle, Philip, duke of Burgundy. He had by this time united Luxemburg to his dominions by a solemn contract

- a with the duke and duchess of Saxony, who quitted all their pretensions to that duchy, in consideration of 50,000 crowns of gold; and this purchase was ratified by Lewis XI. of France, who likewise pretended to have some right to Luxemburg, and its dependencies: but a war afterwards breaking out between the French king and Philip, the inhabitants of Liege solicited the assistance of that monarch, who sent them a small reinforcement; and now they breathed nothing but reproach and defiance. The citizens of Dinant in particular, trusting to the strength of their fortifications, let slip no opportunity of mortifying the pride and reviling the person of Philip's son, the count de Charolois, who had taken the field, and entered the territory of Liege. But they soon repented of their intolerance; for he invested the town, which he carried by assault, and reduced to ashes, after having put all the men to the sword, without mercy or distinction; and those of Liege were fain to deprecate his wrath by the most abject submissions, reinforced with 300 hostages chosen by their bishop.

- NEVERTHELESS, upon the death of Philip, they had recourse to arms again, confiding in the temerity and inexperience of Charles his successor; and arrested the bishop, who found means, however, to escape, and repaired to his patron at Brussels. Duke Charles, incensed at this outrage, levied an army, with which he entered the Liegeois, and invested St. Trou; and the inhabitants of Liege marching out to the relief of the place, were intirely defeated. In consequence of this battle, St. Trou surrendered, and was dismantled: 300 of the principal citizens of Liege came with the keys of their town to implore the clemency of the duke, who entered the place sword in hand, ordered all the fortifications to be razed, the territory to be pillaged, and the whole country to be loaded with taxes<sup>c</sup> (S).

- NOR did Frederic interest himself with more spirit in the troubles of Bohemia, which was now threatened with a civil war, in consequence of the excommunication thundered out by the pope against Podiebrad. The catholics, thinking themselves absolved by this sentence from their allegiance, sent deputies with a proffer of their crown to Casimir king of Poland, who had married the sister of their last monarch; but that prince declined accepting it, because he dreaded the power and policy of Podiebrad, who besides was supported by Lewis of Bavaria-Landsbut, and some other princes of Germany. Then the pope made a tender of it to Matthias king of Hungary, who would have gladly embraced this occasion of gratifying his ambition, had not he dreaded the resentment of the emperor, naturally jealous of such an addition to his power; and, moreover, being engaged in a war with the Transylvanians and Moldavians, which did not much redound to his honour; for, in the course of his operations, he was surprised in Batka, dangerously wounded with an arrow, and obliged to fly for his life across the mountains of Walachia.

The catholics of Bohemia offer the crown to Casimir of Poland; and to Matthias of Hungary.

- POPE Paul II. disappointed in both these quarters, solicited the emperor to declare against Podiebrad; but all he could obtain was the convocation of a diet at Nuremberg, to deliberate upon this affair, as well as upon a war against the Turks. At this assembly, the bishop of Ferrara, as legate from the pope, used all his endeavours to engage the princes in a war against the king of Bohemia, who oppressed the catholics, and refused to submit in matters of religion to the holy see: but their different interests influencing them differently, and Lewis of Bavaria-Landsbut openly espousing the cause of Podiebrad, no step was taken to the prejudice of that prince. The diet broke up, after having resolved, that, for the term of five years, the empire should maintain 20,000 men to serve against the Turks; and that the pope should be exhorted to negotiate a solid peace among the princes of Christendom<sup>e</sup>.

Diet at Nuremberg. A. D. 1468.

- MEAN while the catholics of Bohemia and Moravia, assembling at Iglaw, sent an embassy to offer the crown to Frederic, who seemed very well pleased with the compliment, but desired time to consider on an affair of such importance: but before he could take a final resolution on this subject, Matthias, at the pressing solicitations of the pope, accepted the crown, advanced with his troops into Moravia, and besieged Gradisch, while Zdinion de Sternberg, chief of the Bohemian malcontents, ravaged the fiefs of Podiebrad, as minister of the holy father, who had declared that prince an excommunicated heretic. But all these efforts were ineffectual. Matthias, was obliged to raise the siege; and after having had a fruitless conference with Podiebrad between the two armies, retired to Hungary at the approach of winter<sup>f</sup>.

Proceedings of the diets of Milbenstadt
and Neustadt.

THE emperor being at the same time pressed by his holiness to reconcile the princes and towns of Germany that were at variance with each other, in order to draw succours from them against the infidels, he convoked a diet at Milbenstadt, where he expatiated upon the fatal effects of civil discord, and exhorted the states to forget their mutual animosities, that they might be the better enabled to revenge the cause of religion against the infidels. His exhortations had some weight with the members of the assembly; and it was proposed, that a tribunal should be erected for terminating the differences subsisting between particular towns and noblemen, as well as to punish rapine, repress violence, and re-establish good order.

THE confirmation of this scheme, however, was referred to a subsequent diet at Neustadt, where every article and appointment of the tribunal was regulated; but the towns, which complained of being already almost overwhelmed with burthensome taxes, refused to contribute to the expence of such a college, though its duration was limited to five years; and the assembly broke up without having done any thing material for the public peace <sup>b</sup>.

SOME states, indeed, seeing the necessity for establishing tranquillity in the empire, compromised their reciprocal disputes; and the electors, with several other princes, meeting at Landshut, endeavoured to pacify the troubles of Bohemia; but this convention was also ineffectual, because the catholics demanded liberty of conscience, and Podiebrad insisted upon communicating of both species.

The inhabitants of Liege revolt against Charles duke
of Burgundy.

WHATEVER precautions might have been taken by some of the princes and states for terminating their quarrels in an amicable manner, it was hardly possible that peace should long subsist between individuals who hated one another personally. The duke of Bavaria-Landshut omitted no opportunity of exciting the enemies of the elector of Brandenburg: Sigismund, archduke of Austria, could not abandon the hope and design of one day subduing the Swiss; and the people of Liege watched for an occasion to break with the duke of Burgundy, whom they detested with the most implacable rancour. Inspired by these sentiments, they surprised the town of Tongres, put the Burgundian garrison to the sword, made their own bishop prisoner, and murdered several canons before his eyes, with circumstances of horrid barbarity.

THE news of this massacre arriving at Peronne, where Charles of Burgundy then resided, with Lewis XI. of France, who had visited him on the faith of a safe-conduct, and the duke being at the same time informed that the Liegeois had been instigated to this revolt by the intrigues of France, he was so transported with rage, that in all probability Lewis would have perished by his resentment, had not that prince signed the treaty of Peronne on the duke's own terms, and consented to serve as a volunteer in his army against the rebels of Liege. Thus appeased with respect to the French king, but glowing with indignation against the Liegeois, he marched directly to their city, whither he was accompanied by Lewis; refused all their tears, intreaties, and submissions; invested the place, which he carried by assault, after the besieged had made several desperate sallies; ordered the prisoners to be murdered, without distinction of sex or age, and the city to be burnt to ashes. Not yet satiated with these spectacles of horror, he laid waste the country of Franchemont with fire and sword; while the wretched inhabitants fled for shelter to the woods, where they perished by famine or the rigour of the winter, which was remarkably severe <sup>c</sup>.

Rome;

It was in the course of this year that the emperor, finding himself exposed to numberless disquiets from the continual irruptions which the Turks made upon the frontiers of his dominions, was alarmed to such a degree, that he resolved to make another journey into Italy, to consult with pope Paul II. upon ways and means for engaging the Christian princes in a new association against the infidels, and to accomplish a vow which he pretended to have made, though he never explained himself on this subject. For these purposes therefore he set out, with a small retinue, in the severest season of the year, and on Christmas-eve arrived in Rome, where he was received by torch-light <sup>k</sup>. Mattins being begun in St. Peter's church, where he alighted, he was present during the service, performed his vow, and received the communion from the hands of the pope. He staid in this city fourteen days, during which he had divers conferences with his holiness, touching a war with the Turks; but these consultations produced little or no effect. He proposed to hold a council at Constance, at which he and the pope should assist in person, with a view to promote a general expedition against the infidels; but this expedient was declined by Paul, and all their deliberations amounted to this issue: That letters should be written, in the name of the emperor and the pope, to all Christian princes, desiring and exhorting them to send ambassadors to Rome, at an appointed day, to treat of measures for defending the faith; and that the Venetians, who were exhausted in a tedious war against the Turks, should be indulged with a tenth of the clergy, a twentieth of the Jews, and a thirtieth of the laity, <sup>f</sup> a within their own dominions<sup>1</sup>. These negotiations being transacted, he set out on his return to his own dominions, whither he travelled with the greater expedition, as he received information that Matthias king of Hungary, taking the advantage of his absence, had made divers incursions into Bohemia and Moravia, and laid waste the whole country. He was likewise given to understand, that Charles duke of Burgundy, who had three years before succeeded to the extensive dominions which Philip the Good, his father, had so long governed in peace, not contented with that fair inheritance, had increased it with the addition of the duchy of Guelderland and the county of Zutphen, and even intended to proceed farther in point of acquisition: for the ambition of this prince was unbounded; and, in order to gratify it, he had augmented the taxes, and saddled his subjects with new impositions: neither did he wholly depend upon his riches and power for accomplishing the scheme which he had projected to aggrandize his name: he set on foot secret negotiations in the empire, and privately tampered with the electors, in hopes of being chosen king of the Romans. Frederic was not ignorant of his practices, being apprized of all these transactions by Lewis XI. of France, who narrowly watched the conduct of Charles, with a view to countertermine his ambition<sup>m</sup>.

A. D. 1470.

DURING these transactions, Matthias was proclaimed king of Bohemia by the catholic party, and his interest increased every day in that kingdom, when Podiebrad, by the advice of the emperor, assembled the states at Prague, and proposed they should settle the succession upon Ladislaus, son of Casimir king of Poland. This proposal they readily embraced, c not without admiration and applause of the disinterestedness of Podiebrad, who, for the peace and advantage of his subjects, had voluntarily made this motion, to the exclusion of his own children. This settlement composed the disquietude of the nation, so as to enable Podiebrad to oppose the progress of Matthias, to whom he gave battle, in which the Hungarian was vanquished, and obliged to fly for shelter to his own country<sup>n</sup>.

MEAN while a diet being called at Ratisbon, at the desire of the pope, in order to concert measures for carrying on the war against the Turks, the princes and states assembled in great numbers, ambassadors from Charles duke of Burgundy were present, and Campanus, in the name of cardinal Francis Piccolimini, who was sent thither from the court of Rome for that purpose, made an elegant harangue; in which he expatiated upon the glory of their d ancestors, and the zeal which they on all occasions manifested in behalf of the church; and exhorted them, in imitation of such noble examples, to take arms against the infidels, whose progress and success were not so much owing to their own valour, as to the indolence and unjustifiable neglect of the Christian powers. The bishop of Trent spoke to the same purpose; and their remonstrances had such an effect upon the assembly, that they seemed zealously determined to prosecute the war with vigour. Accordingly, after much deliberation and debate, it was unanimously decreed, that every person, who enjoyed a revenue of a thousand ducats, should furnish one horseman; and that a foot soldier should be provided by every person who possessed one half of that fortune. Had this expedient been carried into practice, an army of near 200,000 men might have been brought into the field; e but the pacific and slothful disposition of the emperor, which was altogether averse to war and expence, threw a damp upon the scheme, and the spirit and zeal of individuals insensibly decayed. Notwithstanding the admonitions and solicitations of the Venetians, in whose behalf Paul Morosini, in a pathetic and nervous oration, represented the necessity of taking some measures to stop the career of the Turks, and plainly demonstrated the probability of putting a stop to their conquests, provided the Germans would attack them by land, while the Venetians, assisted by Ferdinand king of Apulia, should undertake to cope with them at sea<sup>o</sup>.

f IN this year George king of Bohemia dying, great contests arose among the subjects touching a successor (for the party of Matthias still subsisted), till at length the friends of Ladislaus, the king of Poland's eldest son, prevailing, that young prince, whose mother was sister of Ladislaus, the predecessor of George, ascended the throne, in the fifteenth year of his age, and was crowned at Prague, though not without considerable opposition from Matthias, who was exasperated at his election<sup>p</sup>. This George Podiebrad was not long survived by pope Paul, who had condemned him as an heretic, and deposed him by virtue of his apostolic power; for he was suddenly carried off by a fit of the apoplexy, after he had made a chearful meal (no person being present when he expired T), and succeeded in the papacy by Francis Ruverens, cardinal of St. Peter ad Vincula, who after his elevation, assumed the name of Sixtus IV.<sup>1</sup>. This new pope was no sooner raised to the chair, than he exerted his endeavours in perfecting the plan against the Turks, for the execution of which his predecessor had laboured so ineffectually. Legates were sent with full powers to reconcile the Christian princes, who were at variance with each other, that they might unite in the common cause against the enemies of their faith. Indulgencies were granted, and subsidies raised, to forward the expedition, and the emperor very warmly solicited to act with vigour as the chief power of this confederacy<sup>2</sup>. But Frederic, whose genius was better turned for negotiation than war, found means to procrastinate all the measures that were concerted for the benefit of this grand association, employing his chief attention in those domestic affairs, which he thought more nearly concerned his interest. He had, for some time, been engaged in treating privately with the electors about obtaining their votes for chusing his son Maximilian king of the Romans; and the steps which he had taken in this affair, were the chief obstacles which Charles duke of Burgundy met with in aspiring to the same honour. That enterprizing prince, therefore, finding it impracticable to carry his point, altered his scheme, and resolved to cultivate the friendship of the emperor, who, he did not doubt, would be prevailed upon to erect his dominions into a kingdom, and confer upon him the title of king of Burgundy, and vicar of the empire in these parts. In consequence of this resolution, he made the proposal to Frederic, by which he laid all the countries, which had been dismembred, would be re-united to the empire, and at the same time offered his only daughter Mary in marriage to Maximilian, son of the emperor. While this treaty was upon the carpet, he invited Frederic to a conference at Triers, where he did not doubt of being able to manage him for his own interest. Nay, so sure was he of his compliance, that he had prepared his royal ornaments and regalia, together with the throne, canopy, and all the other requisites for a pompous coronation. The emperor, who had his own private designs upon Charles, accepted of the invitation, and repaired to Triers, where he was treated with infinite splendor. The match was seemingly agreed to, though the emperor desired it might be consummated before the duke should be crowned; but Charles insisted upon its being deferred until that ceremony should be performed. At last Frederic, in all appearance, yielded to his intreaties, and, the following day being fixed for the coronation, he in that expectation did homage to the emperor, and took the oath of fidelity for Guelderland, and all the other territories he possessed within the dominions of the empire. Frederic, having thus accomplished his aim, and being unwilling to cater for the ambition of a prince, who was already too proud; insolent, and formidable, retired next morning from Triers, in the dawn, on pretence of going to compromise a difference between the archbishop and city of Cologne, leaving the duke overwhelmed with shame and vexation<sup>3</sup> (U). Affronted and chagrined as he was at this disappointment, he did not desist from his enterprize; but, on the contrary, employed all his efforts to atchieve it, sparing neither men nor money in the exertion of his endeavours. Among other things, he thought proper to grant his protection to Robert count palatine, who disputed the archbishopric of Cologne with Herman landgrave of Hesse. For this purpose he besieged the town of Nuys, situated upon the Rhine, which was defended with great valour and perseverance by Herman, for the space of a whole year, until the besieged were reduced to the utmost extremity and want; when the troops of the empire marched to its relief, and obliged him to raise the siege<sup>4</sup> (X)<sup>i</sup>

LEWIS XI. of France, having attempted ineffectually to engage the Germanic body in a war with Charles, endeavoured to form an alliance against that ambitious prince, with Rene duke of Lorraine, Sigismund duke of Austria, and the Swiss cantons; and in these negotiations he succeeded to his wish. The first was persuaded, by the emissaries of Lewis, that Charles duke of Burgundy intended to include Lorraine in the kingdom which he had projected for himself; Sigismund was flattered with the hope of recovering the county of Ferrefe, Suntgau, and other fiefs in Alsace, which he had mortgaged to the Burgundian;

(U) Heiss alleges, that the duke of Burgundy incurred the suspicion of Frederic, in consequence of the underhand insinuations of Lewis XI. of France, who was alarmed at the prospect of such a formidable alliance; while the author of the notes upon that historian pretends, that Charles, having assumed the arms of Austria, because some territories belonging to that family had been mortgaged to him by Sigismund, Frederic was extremely incensed at this instance of his presumption, and for that reason commenced his inveterate foe.

(X) Krantz affirms, that the siege was raised in consequence of a treaty with the emperor, confirming the match which had before been projected between his daughter and Maximilian; while Philip de Commines imputes his retreat to the remonstrances of the English, who had made preparations for invading France at his instigation, and now threatened to desist from the expedition, unless he would immediately march into that kingdom, that they might the more easily act in conjunction. He was alarmed by the incursions of the duke of Lorraine, who had declared war against him, and invaded his dominions, at the desire of Lewis XI. of France.

a and the Swiss entered into the pay of France, after Lewis had terminated, in an amicable manner, a war that raged between them and Basil, assisted by Strasburg and the imperial cities of Alface; and reconciled them with Sigismund, whose family they had stripped of the towns of Raperswil, Dressanbau, Frewensfeld, and the county of Turgow.

THIS league being established, Sigismund offered to redeem the mortgage with a sum of money which he had borrowed from the imperial towns for that purpose; and Charles refusing to part with the fiefs, he had good reason to complain of the injustice. At the same time Hagenbach, governor of the towns for the duke of Burgundy, oppressed them in such a manner, that their patience forsook them, and they revolted from his authority. Ensisheim was the first that shook off his yoke, and repulsed him in the attempt he made to enter and destroy the town. Enraged at his disappointment, he retired to Brisac, where he laid a scheme for massacring the inhabitants; but the garrison, composed of Germans and Walloons, refused to execute his orders. His person was seized upon by the burghers; he underwent a fair trial, in which being convicted of tyranny, murder, and treason, he was condemned to lose his head, and suffered accordingly, by torch-light, in the presence of an innumerable concourse of people.

THE duke of Burgundy, exasperated at this execution, sent six thousand men into the Suntgau, under the command of Hagenbach's brother, who committed horrible ravages; but he was soon obliged to retire before the Swiss, who hastened to the relief of that province. They were joined by the inhabitants of Basil, Strasburg, and other towns on the Rhine; and, advancing into Franche Compté, they defeated Blamont, the marshal of Burgundy, who had come to raise the siege of Hericourt, which afterwards surrendered to the victors.

THIS was the prelude of a war, that ended in the destruction of Charles. Had that prince contented himself with maintaining the war against Lewis, he might have acquired reputation and advantage from his riches and his power; but, blinded by ambition, he neglected to cultivate the friendship of the duke of Lorraine, and his confederates the Swiss, who entered into alliance with Lewis, and defeated Charles in three battles; in the last of which, fought at Nancy on the fifth of January, he was mortally wounded, and next day found dead upon the ice<sup>u</sup> (Y).

The duke loses a battle, and his life.
A. D. 1477.

As he had exhausted his finances, and ruined his troops with continual wars, so as to impoverish his subjects, the principal noblemen of his dominions resolved to bestow his daughter upon some prince, who should be capable to protect them in their independency. Lewis XI. demanded the princess for the dauphin, and the emperor claimed her as being already betrothed to his son Maximilian. Lewis, immediately after the death of Charles, re-united to his crown all Burgundy, Picardy, and Ponthieu, Artois, with the cities of Arras, Tournay, and those upon the river Somme, as fiefs and appendages of France, which could never be possessed by a woman. The precipitation and rapacity with which he made these acquisitions, and the wars he maintained for that purpose, gave such umbrage to the inhabitants of Ghent, that they resolved to break with him intirely, seized the person of their princess, beheaded two of her counsellors, and dismissed the rest, because they were in the French interest, and levied an army, the command of which they bestowed upon Adolphus duke of Guelderland, whom Charles of Burgundy had imprisoned in the castle of Namur, as an unnatural wretch, who had treated his own father with unheard-of barbarity. They even destined this wicked and debauched prince for the husband of the young duchess, who was delivered from the horrors of such a marriage by death; for he was slain in an action with the French, whom he undertook to drive from Tournay, which they had surprised. Upon his demise, the people of Ghent no more interested themselves in the fate of their princess, who at one time received the addresses of the dauphin of France, the son of the duke of Cleves, the earl of Rivers, and the archduke of Maximilian. The interest of the dauphin was supported by Lewis of Bourbon, bishop of Liege, and uncle to the duchess; but he was betrayed by La Marck, his own favourite, who caused an insurrection against the bishop, at Liege, where that prelate was hated, as author of all the mischief which Charles of Burgundy had done to that city and its territory. La Marck, having stipulated with the Liegeois, that one of his sons should be raised to the vacant bishopric, levied a powerful army, with which he besieged Lewis; who, hazarding a sally, was betrayed by his own people, and slain by the treacherous La Marck. This miscreant not only killed his benefactor with his own hand, but afterwards stripped his dead body, and threw it into the river Meuse<sup>x</sup>.

THE death of this prelate destroyed the interest of France at the court of Flanders; the young duchess herself declared against the son of the duke of Cleves, who was a youth of very unpromising parts; and the earl of Rivers was rejected on account of his birth, which was not deemed illustrious enough for the husband of the heiress of Burgundy; so that all these competitors gave place to the fortunate Maximilian, who had nothing to boast of but his birth and natural endowments; for his father was so fordidly avaritious, that he would not bestow the least expence upon his education.

FREDERIC, however, seemed to shake off his natural indolence, when the business was to acquire a rich inheritance for his posterity; he sent ambassadors to demand the young duchess in marriage for his son; and at the first audience they produced the letter and ring, which she had formerly sent to Maximilian, with the consent of her father. Lewis XI. of France endeavoured to traverse the success of this embassy, by the intrigues of Robert Gaguin, general of the Trinitarians, whom he sent to Flanders for that purpose: but the duchess dowager's efforts co-operated with the inclinations of her daughter-in-law, in favour of Maximilian, and the emperor managed his interest so successfully, that the marriage was effected between Mary of Burgundy and his son Maximilian, who was then about twenty years of age<sup>1</sup>. This young prince was no sooner married, than, in order to gain the esteem and good will of his people, he, with the assistance of the Flemings, put himself in a condition to oppose the enterprizes of the French, whom he compelled to restore Quesnoi and Bouchain; in consideration of which restitution, he granted them a truce, and Lewis took this opportunity to make new preparations for war.

A. D. 1479.
A treaty concluded between Casimir king of Poland and Matthias of Hungary.

DURING these transactions, Matthias king of Hungary, and Casimir of Poland, took the field against each other, in order to maintain their different pretensions to the crown of Bohemia; and an obstinate battle was fought near Breslaw, in which Casimir saw himself defeated. However, as the Turks had invaded Moldavia, taken Croia in Albania, and threatened Italy itself, the pope employed all his influence in mediating a peace between the Pole and the Hungarian, that they might turn their arms against the common enemy; and a treaty was concluded on the following conditions: that Matthias should possess Moravia and Silesia, with the titular dignity of king of Bohemia, during life; but the sovereignty of that kingdom should be vested in Ladislaus, son of Casimir; though, in case of the death of that prince without issue, Matthias should be acknowledged as his successor<sup>2</sup>.

Vienna.

AFTER this accommodation, Matthias continued very quiet, until Maximilian was engaged in the war with France, when, either instigated by some new provocation from the emperor, or allured by the prospect of advantage, he marched into Austria with a strong body of forces, and laid siege to Vienna. Frederic, terrified at this irruption, and being altogether unprovided, and naturally averse to war, proposed and purchased an accommodation, by renouncing all his pretensions to the crown of Hungary, and giving the investiture of Bohemia to Matthias, together with a present of one hundred and fifty thousand crowns; in consequence of which, the king of Hungary raised the siege and retired<sup>3</sup> (Z).

IN a few months after this event, the archduchess Mary was delivered of a son, baptized by the name of Philip, and Maximilian, seeing the succession of the Low Countries confirmed to his family by the birth of this prince, renewed hostilities against Lewis XI. in order to recover the dominions of which the French had dismembered the duchy. He was assisted in these endeavours by John de Châlons, prince of Orange; but as his father, and uncle Sigismund, refused to assist him with money or troops, and the Flemings were almost quite exhausted, he made but small progress in the war; while Lewis renewed his alliance with the Swiss, who furnished him with six thousand men, and gained several advantages over the Flemings and the prince of Orange.

IN this emergency, Maximilian addressed himself to the diet of the empire convoked at Nuremberg, representing that the king of France had made himself master of Cambray, Bouchain, and Quesnoi, three towns that were under protection of the empire; and at the same time Frederic exhorted the states to arm for the recovery of these imperial fiefs.

LEWIS, intimidated by these representations, in consequence of which he expected to see the forces of the empire in his dominions, evacuated the places in question, and proposed a truce for a year; which was accepted by Maximilian, who found himself unable to maintain a war. During this cessation, however, he found means to interest the people of Liege in his cause, by sending back their peron, or great standard, which duke Charles had transported to Bruges; and they reinforced him with a body of troops; so that, when the truce expired, he found himself in a condition to act with advantage.

(Z) In the course of this year, Christian king of Denmark arrived at Ratembourg, on a visit to the emperor, who, at his request, erected the country of the Dybmarsians, Stormaria, and Holstein, into a duchy, of which Christian received the investiture. Then he proceeded on a pilgrimage to Rome, and, on his return to his own dominions, solemnized the marriage of his son John with Christina, daughter of Ernest, elector of Saxony: on which occasion he is said to have instituted the order of the elephant (1).

(1) Barre, t. vii. p. 714.

He accordingly took the field against Des Cordes, the French general; and hazarding a battle at Guinegaste, near Terouane, obtained a victory, which, in some measure, re-established the affairs of the Low Countries <sup>b</sup>.

AFTER this action, a truce was agreed to for seven months, during which the pope A. D. 1480. offered his mediation to effect a solid peace: but Lewis in the mean time being seized with a dangerous distemper, Edward IV. king of England, who was in alliance with Maximilian, counselled that prince to evade a treaty; but, if possible, to prolong the truce for two years, before the expiration of which, the death of the French king would, in all probability, enable him to procure a more advantageous accommodation.

As for the pope, his efforts of intercession were suspended by the progress of the Turks; b who, having taken Otranto, filled all Europe, and Italy in particular, with such consternation, that his holiness made peace with the Florentines, against whom he and the king of Naples had been engaged in a war, and wrote to the emperor and the states of Germany, as well as to all other princes in Christendom, to compromise their differences, and march against the infidels. The German princes were likewise solicited to the same purpose by Matthias king of Hungary, to whom Mohammed had offered the kingdom of Bosnia, provided he would grant him an unmolested passage through his dominions. In compliance with the pope's request, several princes and states engaged in a league against the Turks; but the emperor's sloth and avarice would not allow him to contribute to the success of this expedition, and it was well for Europe that Mohammed II. died at Nicomedia, before he could c execute the schemes he projected.

MAXIMILIAN, far from inheriting the sluggish disposition of his father, exerted uncommon activity during the truce with France, in appeasing the troubles of the Low Countries. He suppressed a mutiny at the Hague, and exacted a considerable fine from the burghers of Leyden, who had afforded an asylum to some of the mutineers; then he repaired to Luxemburg, where he renewed the oath of allegiance from the magistracy of the town, and the noblemen of the country; and, on his return to Holland, created his son Philip knight of the golden fleece.

Maximilian appeases the troubles of the Low Countries.

AFTER having been proclaimed duke of Brabant, he defeated the people of Guelderland, who had made incursions into the province of Holland, and he and his wife were publicly d acknowledged at Nuremburg, as duke and dutchess of Guelderland. This expedition being happily terminated, he besieged and took Venloo, which had revolted; from thence he marched to Mons, which surrendered, after having been reduced to the utmost extremity; and there he received the accustomed oath from the nobility, clergy, and commons, in quality of count of Hainault.

LEWIS, terrified at the rapidity of his conquests, sent Philip de Commines to Flanders, to negotiate an accommodation; but the archduke kept aloof, in expectation of the king's death, when he hoped France would purchase a peace at the expence of all she had taken from the house of Burgundy; and, in all probability, Philip's endeavours would have been ineffectual, had not an unforeseen accident contributed to his success. Mary died while e she was big with child, leaving a son called Philip, and a daughter, whose name was Margaret; and great disputes arose about the guardianship of these children, which Maximilian claimed as the father, though he was opposed by the near-relations of the deceased princess, supported by the suffrages of the states general. Mean while both sides agreed, that it was necessary to negotiate a peace with France, which was accordingly concluded at Arras, and signified by Maximilian himself <sup>d</sup>; and, in pursuance of this accommodation, the young princess Margaret was sent to Amboise, in order to be educated for a wife to the young dauphin; whose father dying soon after the peace, he ascended the throne of France by the name of Charles VIII.

A. D. 1482. Mary dies.

MAXIMILIAN's hands were no sooner rid of this troublesome war, than he turned his f arms against the Liegeois, made himself master of Tongres, and defeated their general La Marck, who marched to the relief of the place. He met with the same success in several other petty quarrels, and perhaps his pride increased with his good fortune. Certain it is, the Flemings were very much disgusted with his administration, and loudly complained, that he bestowed the best offices and governments upon Germans and Burgundians: nor did he seem to regard their complaints; on the contrary, some of his council, for their own private ends, having persuaded him that he had a right, not only to the guardianship of his own children, but also to the government of his dominions, he resolved to take both into his own hands; and, with this view, possessed himself, by surprize, of Dendermond, Oudenarde, and some other places. The inhabitants of Ghent and Bruges, dreading the same g fate, secured the person of his son Philip, and sent to demand protection from the king of France; who, in order to take the advantage of this quarrel among his neighbours, detached some forces to their assistance, under the command of the Sieur Crevecœur; so that Flan- ders was involved in a civil war, which lasted three years, to the ruin and desolation of the country. At length, by the interposition of some of the principal noblemen, peace was concluded, on condition that Maximilian should continue tutor to his own son, under certain restrictions.

DURING the troubles of Flanders, there were several commotions in Germany, one of which was produced from a quarrel between Albert of Bavaria and his brother Christopher, about the domain of Landsberg, which the latter continued to possess, in opposition to a previous agreement. The inhabitants, being oppressed by Christopher, complained to Albert, who asserted his own right by force of arms, and hostilities commenced with various success; until, at length, Albert made advances to peace, which was concluded at Landshut, on condition that he should enjoy Landsberg and its dependencies, and yield Schongaw, with all its fiefs, in exchange to his brother.

IN the following year, he prevailed upon the inhabitants of Ratisbon, which had been enfranchised, and declared a free imperial town, by Frederic Barbarossa, to submit again to the sway of the Bavarian house; and afterwards espoused the emperor's daughter Cunegunda, with whom her uncle Sigismund gave him the county of Tyrol by way of portion. This match being made without the consent or privity of the emperor, he complained of the alliance as an incroachment upon his paternal authority, as well as upon the rights of the empire, and threatened to proscribe both Sigismund and Albert; but, as they knew his indolence and incapacity, they gave themselves no concern about his menaces.

MATTHIAS, piqued at a repulse he sustained from the emperor, when he demanded this princess in marriage, and incensed, moreover, at Frederic's still continuing to assume the title of king of Hungary, declared war against him, entered Lower Austria with an army of twenty thousand men, and invested Haimbourg, which surrendered after a siege of four months. From thence he advanced into the territory of Vienna, from which he carried off an immense load of booty.

NEXT year he divided his forces, which had acquired the appellation of Black Bands, into two armies, one of which he led in person to the frontiers of Lower Hungary, which was threatened by the Turks, and sent the other under the command of David Hazi, to besiege Pruck on the river Leit, one of the strongest places in Austria; which he took by assault, and made himself master of all the other towns, except Vienna and Cornembourg. The next enterprize he undertook was the siege of this last place, which was gallantly defended by the governor, in the hope of his being speedily succoured.

of the emperor.

FREDERIC had retired to Gratz, where he convoked the states of his provinces to demand subsidies; but, as he was not at all beloved by his subjects, they lent a deaf ear to his intreaties. His chancellor advised him to open his treasures, and enlist foreign troops; but he could not be prevailed upon to try that expedient, until his friends represented, that, should Matthias once make himself master of Cornembourg and Vienna, he would easily subdue Carintbia, Stiria, and Carniola; then the fear of losing all his dominions triumphed over his avarice; he set on foot levies in Bavaria and Suabia, and a considerable body of forces being enlisted, were ordered to march with all expedition to the relief of Cornembourg. Hazi, informed of their motions, quitted his lines, and gave them battle; when, after an obstinate dispute, they were totally routed; then he recommenced the operations of the siege, and tho' he himself lost his life in a fall made by the besieged, his place was filled with Stephen count Scepu, and the town at last obliged to surrender.

MATTHIAS, encouraged by this success, took the command of the army upon himself, and sat down before Vienna, which he reduced after a very desperate resistance, whilst count Stephen blocked up the fortress of Neustadt in such a manner, that no supplies could enter the place, and the governor having held out six months, during which one half of his garrison perished by famine, submitted to the king of Hungary; who, in this manner, became master of all the Lower Austria.

WHILE Matthias was thus employed, Frederic kept aloof, and looked upon the loss of his capital with indifference; answering to those who pressed him to take measures for its relief, that it had not yet suffered that extremity, to which he himself had been formerly reduced by its rebellious adherence to the interest of his brother Albert. Instead of exerting himself, therefore, in its behalf, he coolly abandoned it to the fate of war; and in order to divert his imagination from a misfortune, which he either would not or could not avoid, he resolved to visit his son Maximilian in the Low Countries, consoling himself with an observation, which he had long adopted as an infallible maxim, "that oblivion is the best remedy for irreparable ills." At length, however, he condescended to solicit the assistance of the states, and Albert duke of Saxony was appointed to march into Austria, at the head of some forces; where finding Matthias too powerful to be attacked, and bea ing unwilling to involve Germany in a war, he endeavoured to compromise the affair, and at length brought it to a tolerable conclusion. In a word, it was agreed, that there should be a truce for eight months; that Matthias should keep possession of Austria, until he should receive the sum of money which he had before stipulated for defraying the expence of the preceding war; and that, provided Matthias should die in the mean time, Austria should return to its old master, who should also retain the title of king of Hungary. These articles were ratified by the emperor, and peace for the present re-established <sup>h</sup>.

In the mean time, the emperor repaired to the Low Countries, where he resided three months; at the expiration of which, he set out on his return, by the way of Aix-la-Chapelle, where he bestowed upon William the Young the investiture of Juliers and Bergue; then he b visited Cologne, where he received the oath of allegiance from the prince of Cleves, for his duchy, together with the counties of La Marck and Genap; and from thence he took the road to Frankfort, accompanied by Maximilian, who was unanimously chosen king of the Romans, by six electors, notwithstanding the opposition of Matthias, who made sundry efforts to traverse his election. <sup>Maximilian is chosen king of the Romans, and</sup>

The princes of the empire had long ago solicited Frederic to assemble a diet for this purpose; but, knowing the activity of the archduke, he was afraid of losing the little authority he had left, and still evaded their request till this occasion, and even now consented with reluctance.

LADISLAUS, king of Bobemia, protested against this election, to which he had not c been summoned, and, on the supposition that the German princes designed to deprive him of his vote, he threatened to do himself justice by force of arms; but he was appeased in the sequel, by an authentic act of the diet, confirming the right of voting to him and his successors; and Maximilian was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, with the consent of the pope, who congratulated him upon his promotion <sup>1</sup> (A). <sup>crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle;</sup>

AFTER this ceremony, he repaired to Bruges, to put the finishing stroke to the treaty between him and the states of Flanders, which was confirmed in the presence of the emperor, who had gone thither at the head of a good body of troops; and perceiving that his son would have occasion for them, to support the war against France, left them under his command, when he himself returned to Germany. As these forces committed great ravages d in the country, which was already desolated; and the nearest relations of the deceased princess Mary were excluded from all share in the education of their young prince Philip, who was intirely under the management of Margaret dowager of England, and some other strangers; the subjects soon forgot the duty they owed to their prince, and now listened to nought but the suggestions of suspicion and disgust. To such a degree did this dissatisfaction prevail, that, upon Maximilian's arrival at Bruges, where the states-general of Flanders were assembled, in order to apply some remedy to the disorders which were daily committed by his troops, a report was spread, that he intended to use them for making himself master of the city. The citizens and tradesmen, alarmed at this intimation, ran immediately to arms, and secured his person under a guard in the castle <sup>k</sup>; at the same time e imprisoning some of his counsellors and favourites, four of whom were afterwards beheaded. The inhabitants of Ghent, following the example of Bruges, brought Payart, archdeacon of their church, to his trial, together with ten other persons, who lost their heads, for having allowed Maximilian to enter the city with five thousand men, in lieu of five hundred, to which number his train had been limited by agreement. On account of this imprisonment of Maximilian, the states of the country were convoked at Mechlin by the young prince Philip, in order to concert measures for obtaining his father's enlargement; and the assembly, at the unanimous desire of the members, was transferred to Ghent, which they considered as a more convenient place for their deliberations. The Flemings began the conferences with heavy complaints against Maximilian, whom they accused of having committed f divers misdemeanours and acts of arbitrary power: these articles were answered by his friends and partizans, who defended his conduct with great warmth and resolution; and strong debates ensued upon the reasons alleged on both sides. At length, pope Innocent and the emperor interposed in behalf of their imprisoned sovereign; the first threatening them with spiritual, and the other with temporal arms, in case they should persist in detaining him in custody; and the states, in consequence of these remonstrances, engaged in a treaty with Maximilian, which being concluded, signed, and ratified, he was set at liberty, after a detention of ten months, and conducted to his troops, who kept the field, and advanced to meet their delivered monarch <sup>1</sup>. Such was the precaution of the states in executing this treaty, that they obtained an obligation from Philip duke of Cleves, in consequence of which he accompanied Maximilian into the middle of his forces, and intreated him, now he was at full liberty, to confirm the accommodation by word of mouth. To this request that prince answered, "Nephew, I will keep my promise." Nevertheless, at his arrival in Brabant, where he was met by his father with a strong army of Germans, he changed his resolution, at the sollicitation of the emperor, the princes of Saxony, Bavaria, Brandenburg, Brunswick, Hesse, Baden, and others who accompanied Frederic, and could not approve of such an extorted peace, which was immediately declared void, and the war recommenced <sup>m</sup>.

(A) In this diet at Frankfort, a law was made for preserving the peace of the empire for ten years, during which, if any person should injure another in body or estate he should be prosecuted by all the rest as a violator of the public peace. This law was religiously observed by a great many, particularly by the Suabians, who entered into an association with each other, by which they were rendered so formidable to their neighbours, that several cities of the empire, and powerful princes, desired to be included in their confederacy, which was distinguished by the name of the Suevicum Fœdus, or the Suabian league (1).

THE emperor and Maximilian at first endeavoured to engage the duke of Cleves in their party, and threatened him, as a vassal, with the ban of the empire, and proscription, unless he would obey his sovereign: but the duke excused himself, on account of the oath, which, by the express order of Maximilian, he had sworn to the states of Flanders; and, protesting against the infringement of the treaty, he continued firmly to oppose them, resolved to live and die with honour, rather than incur the charge of perjury and equivocation. Frederic, finding him thus obstinately determined, resolved to inflict upon him exemplary chastisement: for this purpose, being at Antwerp, he ordered a throne to be raised in the court of St. Michael's cloister, upon which seating himself in his imperial robes, he solemnly put the duke to the ban of the empire, declaring him a traitor, and divesting him of his honours and dominions <sup>n</sup>. He at the same time undertook the siege of Ghent, in which, after he had spent six weeks, without being able to do any thing of consequence, he abandoned his enterprize, laid waste the country, and returned to Germany, leaving the command of his troops to Albert duke of Saxony (B).

Frederic enters into a negotiation with the king of Hungary;

who dies, and is succeeded by Ladislaus,

THIS abrupt return was owing to the information he had received, that the Hungarians had again invaded Austria, because he still delayed the payment of that sum with which he had formerly purchased their forbearance. He therefore, in his own name, and in that of his son Maximilian, sent an embassy to Matthias, who was at that time sick in Vienna, desiring that a negotiation might be set on foot; and when his ambassadors returned to Lintz, they were accompanied by the bishop of Waradin, who was invested with full powers to conclude a treaty of peace. The negotiation lasted a long time without success, because Frederic demanded the restitution of Austria, and refused to reimburse Matthias for the expence of the war; whereas the king of Hungary now raised his demand to a very considerable sum. Maximilian, equally displeased at the extortion of Matthias, and the interested proceedings of the emperor, proposed to observe a medium, and purchase a peace with part of the sum which the king of Hungary demanded: but whether this moderate advice was not agreeable to the emperor, or that he had taken umbrage at the good intelligence that subsisted between the enemy and his own son, he would not allow Maximilian to assist at the conferences. Whatever his motive might be, certain it is, he sought nothing less than the conclusion of a peace; for he could not bear the thoughts of parting with his money for the redemption of a province, which he saw himself on the eve of retrieving without expence, as the distemper of Matthias was said to be incurable: in effect, his malady every day increased, and Frederic found means to invent new delays, which retarded the treaty until the king of Hungary actually expired, when, instead of concluding a peace, he demanded the vacant throne, either for himself or his son Maximilian. Notwithstanding this request, the Hungarians elected Ladislaus king of Bohemia, though Maximilian had already recovered all Austria, made himself master of a good part of Hungary, and had the promise of powerful succours from the empire: in spite of these advantages, Frederic made peace with Ladislaus <sup>o</sup>, on condition that he should be reimbursed in one hundred thousand florins, to defray the expence of the war; that he should remain sole possessor of Austria; that Ladislaus should retain the crown of Hungary; and that Maximilian and his descendents should enjoy the title, with the right of succeeding to the crown in default of issue.

(B) About this time the emperor erected Austria into an archduchy, and conferred the title upon Philip, the son of Maximilian, who was the first of the family of Hapsburg distinguished by the name of archduke (1).

(1) Marian. lib. xxv. c. 12.

- a DURING these disputes, Frederic, by an authentic act, annulled the donations of the Tyrol, which his brother Sigismund had made in favour of Albert duke of Bavaria, on his marriage with Cunegunda; declaring that, like the other fiefs belonging to Sigismund, it ought to have reverted to the king of the Romans, who was his sole and lawful heir. Albert protested against this act, and engaged a number of princes and towns in his interest; while the emperor, tho' dissuaded by Maximilian from such violent measures, put the duke of Bavaria-Munich to the ban of the empire, together with the inhabitants of Ratisbon, who had acknowledged the sovereignty of that prince. In a diet convoked at Nuremberg he adjusted the proportion of money and troops to be furnished by each prince and town of the empire, in order to execute this sentence, and the command of the army was given to the elector of Brandenburg, who, tho' he took the field, could do nothing of consequence against the Bavarian, so well had this prince secured his dominions.

At length Frederic, being tired of the war, which was not at all adapted to his disposition, listened to the remonstrances of Maximilian, who mediated a peace, on condition that Ratisbon should be re-established in the privileges of an imperial town; and that Albert should restore Tyrol to the house of Austria, in consideration of being put in possession of the lordship of Akensperg, and receiving a proper dowry with the princess Cunegunda.

- b In Flanders the war still continued to the utter ruin of the country, till at length an accommodation was patched up between Maximilian and Charles king of France, who wanted to cultivate the friendship of the king of the Romans, that he might, in the course of their correspondence, find some favourable occasion for disengaging himself, without giving offence, from his match with Margaret, Maximilian's daughter, who had been educated at the court of France, and actually betrothed to Charles. Besides this motive, he longed for an opportunity of weaning Maximilian from the thought of consummating his marriage with Ann heiress of Britanny (C), which had been performed by proxy, and which the king of France intended, if possible, to dissolve in his own favour; for his design was to reunite Brittany to his kingdom. With this view Charles had recourse to arms, invaded the duchy of Brittany, made himself master of the greatest part of it by force, besieged Rhiden where the princess was with her court, and, by presents and promises, brought over to his interest the noblemen of that country, who delivered the city and the duchess into his hands. A few days after this achievement, he married Ann, by virtue of a double dispensation from the pope, setting aside his former contract with Margaret the daughter of Maximilian, as well as removing the impediment of consanguinity with his new bride. The king of the Romans, incensed at this double affront, by which his daughter was dishonoured and his marriage annulled, resolved to be revenged on the author of his wrongs; and solicited the assistance of the princes of the empire and the Swiss; but, at a time when every thing threatened war and confusion, a treaty of peace was concluded at Senlis, in which it was agreed that the king of France should send back Margaret to her brother the archduke, and restore with her the counties of Artois and Burgundy; but that he should retain the citadels in the four cities of Artois, until Philip should be of age to ratify the peace.

- c In the course of this year died Casimir IV. king of Poland, and father of Ladislav, who now reigned over Hungary and Bohemia; and the death of the Polish monarch was soon followed by that of pope Innocent VIII. succeeded in the papacy by Roderic Borghia, who assumed the name of Alexander VI.

NOR did the emperor long survive these alterations. After the last effort of his resentment against the duke of Bavaria, which roused him from the lethargy of his sloth, to the astonishment of the whole empire, he resolved to give himself no farther trouble with the affairs of government, but to spend the remainder of his life in a peaceful retreat.

- f WITH this view he retired to Lintz, and applied himself to the study of chemistry, astronomy, and astrology; but, in the midst of these amusements, he was seized with a violent disorder, which being increased by his eating melons to excess, put a period to his life, in the 54th year of his reign, and 79th of his age. His distemper is said to have arisen from a cancerated ulcer in his leg, which was amputated by the advice of his physicians, though he died of the fever that attended the operation. On this occasion, when he beheld the limb cut off, "I am now convinced, said he, that a healthy peasant is much better than a sick emperor; and yet I hope I shall enjoy the greatest good that can happen to man, “namely, a happy exit from this life.” It is observed of Frederic, that his reign was longer than that of any other emperor since the days of Augustus, and that he never swore but twice during the whole course of his life; one of these oaths he took at his coronation at Aix, and the other when he received the imperial crown at Rome. He was surnamed the Pacific, because he was averse to war; yet there was an inconstancy in his temper, which often prompted him to quarrels and disputes, though when they came to an open rupture he generally sued for peace. He held an infinite number of diets, in which nothing was ever determined, because he always postponed the business to another meeting. In a word, he seems to have been a prince of a contemptible character, absolutely void of generosity, courage, and resolution; yet, by the alliance made with the house of Burgundy, he greatly aggrandized the wealth and power of the Austrian family. He seldom or never had recourse to the advice of his friends, was endowed with a fund of low cunning, and a tenacious memory, and scrupulously exact in the offices of devotion, in which he was rather superstitious than sensible. His person was agreeable, and his countenance dignified with an air of majesty. He was plain in his apparel, moderate in his passions, and an enemy to all sorts of excess. He eat so little, that his life was one continual fast, and diluted his wine to such a degree, that it was no stronger than water. He chose for his device the five vowels (D), which were imprinted upon all his books, carved on his buildings, and engraved on his plate. His body was interred at Vienna, and his tomb distinguished by an epitaph, which contains an enumeration of his titles, an encomium upon his sagacity and moderation, and an account of the acquisition he made of the Low Countries, by the marriage of his son Maximilian (E).

MAXIMILIAN, who had been chosen and crowned king of the Romans during the life of his father, received the imperial crown with the unanimous consent of all the electors, immediately after the last offices were performed to Frederic; and he brought with him to the throne all the qualities requisite to signalize a great prince, being equally adapted for the administration during war and in the time of peace. His childhood had been so remarkably unpromising, that, even when he was ten years of age, it could not be determined whether he would be absolutely dumb, or altogether idiotical; but this infirmity was so perfectly removed when he attained to a riper age, that in the sequel he attracted the admiration of all those who conversed with him, by the eloquence and facility with which he spoke the Latin, French, and Italian languages. He was particularly addicted to letters, and not only perused the best books with great application, but also employed many hours in writing history with his own hand: yet he owed all this progress solely to his own genius; for he often complained of the preposterous method in which he had been instructed by his preceptor, whose name was Peter Engelbert, afterwards bishop of Neustadt in Austria, a person of great piety, but very ill qualified for forming the mind of a young prince. That very day on which Maximilian was elected king of the Romans, “Whatever, obligations, said he, we may have to our preceptors, if mine was now alive, “I believe I should make him repent of the manner in which I received his instructions;” and in one of the first diets he held, he engaged all the electors to establish academies in their respective dominions.

WHILE he was making preparations for his father’s funeral, he was informed that the Turks had invaded Croatia, upon which he began immediately to take measures for opposing their progress; and assembling a powerful army in Austria, advanced towards them, with all possible expedition; but the Moslems, affrighted at his army, and astonished at his dispatch, retreated with great precipitation; so that, finding no enemy to cope with, he disbanded his army, and applied himself to the domestic affairs of the empire.

(3) Heiss, liv. iii. c. 2.

- a . . . As he had now been a long time a widower, he was pressed to take another wife, and it was proposed that he should espouse Blanche Maria, sister to John Galeazzo duke of Milan, and niece to Lewis Sforza, surnamed the Moor, who being guardian to his nephew Galeazzo, took possession of the state of Milan, not without suspicion of having poisoned his ward. As this princess was reckoned one of the most beautiful women of her time, possessed of a thousand amiable qualities, and a fortune of four hundred and sixty thousand ducats, Maximilian received the proposal with all the demonstrations of the most perfect joy, and married her on the sixth day of March, of that same year; by which means Lewis Sforza, who had been the chief negotiator in this match, reaped all the advantage which he expected from it, in acquiring the favour of the emperor, so as to be able to maintain himself in possession of the duchy, the investiture of which Maximilian in private conferred upon him as a fief vacated by the failure of homage and acknowledgment<sup>u</sup>. By this alliance, the emperor being engaged in the interests of Italy, resolved to take the advice of the states of the empire, touching the pretension which Charles VIII. king of France had to Naples, and the expedition he had undertaken to make a conquest of that kingdom. For this purpose, after he had assembled the states of Flanders at Louvain, where he appointed his son Philip governor of the Low Countries, and saw the deputies take the oath of fidelity to that young prince, he convoked a diet at Worms, where he proposed they should determine whether it would be more for the advantage of the empire to oppose the designs of Charles, or to engage in a war against the Turks: but this alternate being deemed intirely foreign to the interests of the Germanic body, the proposal was left undiscussed, and the deliberations of the diet altogether restricted to the intestine affairs of Germany. An authentic constitution was enacted for the preservation of the public peace among the princes and states of the empire, that they might have recourse to it as to an oracle; in all cases of difficulty; and the emperor, reflecting upon the trouble to which people were subjected in following the imperial chamber, which always travelled about with the court, fixed that tribunal at Worms, from whence it was some time after transferred to another city, and at last settled at Spire<sup>x</sup>. In this diet also the county of Wirtemberg was erected into a duchy in favour of Frederic of Wirtemberg, with the unanimous consent of all present; the league of Suabia was renewed; the investiture of Sforza confirmed; the electors took the oath of fidelity, and René duke of Lorraine did homage for some of his fiefs which he held of the empire, though he declared his duchy free of all such dependence<sup>y</sup> (F).

NOR would he engage with the emperor in a war with the king of France, though Maximilian offered to support his pretensions to the kingdom of Naples, and even to create him vicar-general of the empire in Italy. The diet, however, in consequence of the emperor's representations, resolved to keep an army on foot, in order to stop the progress of the French king on the other side of the Alps, and decreed that the states of the empire should raise one hundred and fifty thousand florins for its maintenance<sup>z</sup>.

- e CHARLES VIII. king of France, had compelled the Florentines to put four of their strongest places into his hands, and lend him a sum of money; then he marched to Rome, to the great terror of the pope, who shut himself up in the castle of St. Angelo, made himself master of the best fortified towns in the ecclesiastical state, and, having received Alexander's bastard, Cæsar Borgia, as an hostage, marched to Naples, where he was acknowledged as sovereign, while king Alphonso, terrified at his approach, and knowing himself hated by his subjects, proclaimed his son Ferdinand king, and retired with that prince to the isle of Ischia, to wait for some favourable revolution<sup>a</sup>.

(F) The elector of Mentz alleged, that the duke ought to use the same form of taking the oath, which was practised by the other states of the empire; but René, positively refusing to comply with that proposal, it was agreed, that he should swear in these terms: "I René king of Jerusalem and Sicily, duke of Lorraine and Bar, marquis of Pons, count of Provence, Vaudemont, Harcourt, &c. swear and promise, as duke of Lorraine and Bar, to you Maximilian, king of the Romans, to the sacred Roman empire, and your successors in the

Having taken this oath, he was infeoffed by the emperor; who sat upon a throne, with the sceptre of Charlemagne in his hand; then he paid seven hundred francs for the ransom of his horse, cloaths, and privileges, exclusive of the sum due to the elector of Mentz, arch-chancellor of the empire (4).

which was afterwards effected, between his son Philip, who had now attained to the eighteenth year of his age, and the infanta Jane, one of the daughters of their catholic majesties; and though at that time this princess was, by the order of birth, posterior to her brother the infant John, who, some months after, was married to Margaret the sister of Philip, and also to her sister Isabella, wife of Emanuel king of Portugal, nevertheless, contrary to all appearance, she, by the death of her brother and sister, and the children of their respective marriages, became sole heiress of the kingdoms of Spain; so that this alliance was no less advantageous to the house of Austria, than that of Maximilian with the princess of Burgundy<sup>b</sup>.

marches from Naples, defeats the allies in the plain of Fornova, and returns to France.

THE league formed by the emperor, the pope, their catholic majesties, the duke of Milan, the marquis of Mantua, and the Venetians, being published at Rome, Charles VIII. thought it was high time for him to return to France, before the allies could oppose his passage. He therefore began his march with all expedition; but when he advanced into the plain of Fornova, about four leagues from Parma, he found them already drawn up in order of battle, and an engagement ensued, in which they were defeated, so that he pursued his route to the county of Asti without farther interruption, while the duke of Milan laid siege to Novarra, which had been surprized by the duke of Orleans. By this time Charles was reinforced by fifteen thousand Swiss, with which he intended to attack Sforza; but, understanding that these mercenaries, who were much more numerous than his native troops, designed to exact of him a large sum of money, on pretence of arrears, he clapped up a peace in a great hurry, restoring Novarra to the duke of Milan, on condition that he should not assist the king of Naples, and retired to his own dominions.

As for Ferdinand, he no sooner heard of the league against Charles than he quitted his retreat, and assembling an army, which was joined by a reinforcement of Spaniards, retook the places which had submitted to the French, compelled the count de Montpensier, whom Charles had appointed viceroy, to abandon Naples, and, in a little time, reduced the whole kingdom to his obedience.

expedition into Italy.
A. D. 1496.

CHARLES, on the other hand, as soon as he arrived in France, began to make preparations for retrieving his conquest; and the emperor, being pressed by the duke of Milan and the Venetians to march into Italy with a certain number of horse and foot, to oppose these designs, he accordingly, without staying for the supplies voted in the diet, crossed the Alps with a small body of troops: but, being too weak to attempt any thing of consequence, he, by the advice of Sforza, marched to Pisa, where he was received as sovereign by the inhabitants, who pulled down the arms of France which they had set up, and, in the room of them, erected those of the emperor. He afterwards invested the city of Leghorn, but was obliged to raise the siege with disgrace; then he retired into Lombardy, where having staid some time, fluctuating in his counsels, and altogether undetermined, he at last returned to Germany, leaving behind him a very contemptible opinion of his capacity and power<sup>c</sup>.

Proceedings of the diets at Lindaw and Worms.
A. D. 1497.

HE had convoked a diet at Lindaw, in order to forward the supplies, and it was determined to execute the resolutions of the former assembly, under certain regulations, which were, however, referred to the consideration of a subsequent diet, convened at Worms, where James marquis of Baden, Wolfgang count of Nassau, and the landwogt or governor of Guelderland, presided in the name of the emperor. The elector of Mentz opened the diet with a long harangue, expatiating upon the disorders that afflicted the empire, and the means for remedying those evils; and the grand master of the Teutonic order demanded immediate succour against the Prussians, who had desolated Livonia. But in this, as in the preceding diets, nothing was executed, though many schemes were projected.

The Frieslan-
ders revolt against Maximilian.

THIS irresolution served only to nourish the dissensions of Germany, and in particular to encourage the Frieslanders and Gueldrians in their revolt against the emperor. The inhabitants of Friesland had refused to pay the ordinary tax imposed by the diet for the occasions of the empire; alleging that, as their country was not a fief thereof, they were not obliged to obey the decrees of the Germanic body: and indeed their dependency had never been clearly ascertained; for, although the emperors had appointed governors or podestats of that province, these were always well or ill received, according as they favoured or opposed the liberties of the people: they had even threatened to hang the commissary of the late emperor, and, in all probability, would have executed the threat, had not he left the country without hesitation. Maximilian, resolving to assert his right of sovereignty over this stubborn people, nominated the duke of Saxony as podestat of Friesland, and ordered them to receive and obey him as such, on pain of being declared rebels to the empire.

INSTEAD of submitting to this command, they revolted against the duke, expelled him

- a from their country, renounced all dependence upon the empire, and put themselves under the protection of Charles duke of Guelderland, who was then engaged in a war with Maximilian, in order to recover the investiture of his father <sup>a</sup>.

THE emperor being still in great want of money and troops, assembled another diet at Fribourg, in the Brisgau, where the princes whom he appointed to represent his person complained, that the states had given him no assistance in his war against the French in Italy, and demonstrated the necessity of taking vigorous measures against the Frieſlanders and the Swiſs, who were declared enemies to the confederacy of Suabia. The states having deliberated upon these topics, agreed to raise a powerful army against the Swiſs, though in the sequel they acquitted themselves very ill of this engagement. Mean while

- b they gave audience to the ambassadors of his Polish majesty, who demanded succours against the Turk, and sent a deputation to engage the pope to accommodate that monarch with the money raised in Germany by the nuncio, against whose exactions they bitterly complained (G). This embassy had likewise orders to represent to his holiness, that the German noblemen would exact as their undoubted right one-third of the money arising from indulgences, if the holy see should refuse to restrain the excesses of her minister; and to complain, that the Concordata were not observed in the article of benefices, which the pope either bestowed on strangers, when vacant, or disposed of by way of reversion, to the prejudice of the patrons <sup>c</sup>.

- c A LAW was enacted in this assembly to regulate the succession of grandsons in the room of their deceased fathers; and Albert duke of Saxony was confirmed in the prefecture of West Frieſland, which was rendered hereditary in his family.

ALBERT being invested with this new dignity, endeavoured to attach to his interest one of the factions that divided Frieſland, but, notwithstanding his utmost endeavours, they united against his authority, and looked upon the hereditary settlement of his office as an invasion of their rights and privileges, granted to them by Charlemagne and his successors (H): so that the duke of Saxony was on the point of resigning his government, when he was dissuaded from that renunciation by Edſard count of Emſden, who undertook to form a party in his favour by means of the friends he had among the Frieſlanders <sup>d</sup>.

- d IN the midst of these transactions, Charles king of France, having died suddenly at Amboise, was succeeded by the duke of Orleans, under the name of Lewis XII. This prince pretending to have an incontestible right to the duchy of Milan, resolved to put himself in a condition to pass the Alps, and take possession of that duchy; which Lewis Sforza, that he might be able to withstand the tempest, took all the necessary precautions to put himself in a posture of defence, and had recourse to the assistance of Maximilian.

HE spared neither pains nor money to involve Lewis in quarrels with his neighbours. René II. duke of Lorraine was well paid for laying claim to Provence, in right of his mother Yoland, a daughter of René of Anjou, titular king of the Two Sicilies, and real count of Provence; but this dispute was referred to the examination of commissaries, and the duke acquiesced in their decision in favour of Lewis.

- e BUT a more formidable neighbour was Philip archduke of Austria, who reclaimed a great many towns of the succession of Burgundy, which had been seized by Lewis XI. As Philip was very powerful, and well beloved by his subjects, and Lewis bent upon his Italian expedition, he restored part of those places to the archduke, who did homage to him at Arras for Flanders, Artois, and Charolois, while his right to Burgundy was referred to the decision of the parliament of Paris <sup>e</sup>.

WHATEVER inclination the emperor had to succour his ally the duke of Milan, he was obliged to suspend his favourable intention, in order to attend to the war of Guelderland, in which he was now engaged. That the reader may have a distinct idea of this affair, it will be necessary to trace it back to its origin, and observe that Arnold of Egmont, duke of Guelderland, after having been detained prisoner for several months, and extremely ill used by his son Adolphus, had found means to obtain his liberty, and retort his imprisonment on his ungrateful son. As he had been very much obliged to Charles the late duke of Burgundy, who, upon this occasion, had interposed his good offices and assistance in his favour, he, in order to manifest his gratitude; and punish his rebellious son at the same time, alienated his duchy for the benefit of that prince, who paid to him ninety-two thousand crowns for the reversion of it, and agreed that Arnold should enjoy the revenues during his natural life. In consequence of this purchase, Arnold was no sooner dead than the duke of Burgundy took possession of his dominions; but Charles being slain soon after at Nancy, the people of Guelderland set Adolphus at liberty from the castle of Vilverden, in which he had hitherto been detained; and he being afterwards entrusted with the command of the troops belonging to the city of Ghent, miserably perished, as we have hinted above, in an expedition against the inhabitants of Tournay<sup>a</sup>. Mary of Burgundy, and, after her death, Maximilian, as guardian of her son Philip, had endeavoured to maintain, by force of arms, the right which they pretended to have to that duchy, as part of the succession of the house of Burgundy. Nevertheless, the possession of it was a long time contested by Charles of Egmont, the son of Adolphus, who, to his dying day, enjoyed a part of that duchy, notwithstanding the power of the house of Austria, and the decision of the princes of the empire, who had adjudged it to Philip<sup>b</sup>.

Swiss.
A. D. 1499.

WHEN Maximilian was engaged in the very hottest of this war, he was obliged, all of a sudden, to desist, and even to make advances towards an accommodation with Charles of Egmont, that he might be able to turn his arms against the Swiss, who had begun to make incursions upon the Austrian territories; for the good intelligence between the emperor and that people no longer subsisted. Maximilian, when he first succeeded to the dominions of Sigismund of Austria, by virtue of his being adopted by that prince, had often desired that the Swiss would renew with him the friendship and alliance which they had formerly maintained with Sigismund; but this renewal they always declined; besides, the greatest part of the princes, and all the nobility, looked upon these people with an evil eye, since they had erected themselves into republics, and renounced the alliance of Suabia: on the other hand, the city of Constance, which had hitherto refused to enter into this league, or into the confederacy of the Swiss, notwithstanding repeated invitations from both, had at length united with the circle of Suabia. Finally, the revival of the antient quarrel between the inhabitants of Etschland and the city of Coire, which had been frequently referred to arbitration to no purpose, contributed to bring matters to an open rupture.<sup>c</sup>

WHEN the bishop of Coire died, the regency of Tyrol seized upon some fiefs of the bishopric, in hope of obliging the chapter to own the archdukes of Austria as their avoyers; but these refusing to comply with this demand, several boroughs and castles were pillaged and burnt. The Grisons, informed of these outrages, hastened to the assistance of their allies, and were defeated by the Austrians, who pursued them to the valley of Engadina, which they laid waste with fire and sword.<sup>d</sup>

IN this emergency they solicited succours of the Swiss, who forthwith marched to their assistance, and crossing the Rhine, came in sight of the enemy, in the neighbourhood of Bregentz, where a battle ensued, in which the Austrians were routed with great slaughter.

DURING this expedition, the inhabitants of the Brisgaw and Suntgaw fell upon the lands of Nuremburg and Rosemburg; but their career was soon stopped by the Swiss of the neighbouring canton, who assembled to the number of two thousand, and attacked them with such fury, that they were forced to betake themselves to flight, after having left a great part of their number killed upon the spot.<sup>e</sup>

new their alliance with
king.

LEWIS the French king, taking advantage of this favourable conjuncture, renewed with the Swiss the ancient alliance which they had formed with his predecessors, and the treaty was concluded at Lucerne, with this reserve, that France should not molest the allies of the Swiss: an article which secured the cities of Strasburg, Basil, Kayserberg, Colmar, Scelestadt, and other towns of Alsace.

Rout the imperial army in the canton of Schaffhau-sen, and at Tungen.

THE emperor, enraged to find such resistance from a people he affected to despise, ordered a numerous army to rendezvous near Constance, which, being divided into small bodies, pillaged the villages and castles in the canton of Schaffhausen; but, while they were employed in acquiring booty, without dreaming of the enemy's approach, the Swiss, who had assembled privately, and reconnoitred their motions, took the opportunity of falling upon them when they were thus divided and incumbered, and cut them all in pieces. The same fate overtook a body of the Suabians, who had surprized Tungen, and plundered the cantons of Appenzel and St. Gall: they fell into an ambuscade, and were destroyed by the Swiss, who retook Tungen, and demolished its fortifications.<sup>f</sup>

THE news of these successes having reached the emperor, while he was engaged in the war against Charles duke of Guelderland, over whom he had gained sundry advantages, he left the command of his army to the duke of Saxony, and, with four thousand chosen men,<sup>g</sup>

a took the route of Cologne and Mentz, entered Suabia, crossed the Black Forest, arrived at Constance, and from thence repaired to the Suntgaw, where he collected a body of fifteen thousand men, and gave the command of them to Henry count of Wurtemberg.

THEN he demanded succours from the towns and princes of the Suabian league; and though some of them supplied him with troops, the greater number evaded his request, and pressed him to convoke a diet at Worms, which was summoned accordingly; but, before the meeting of this assembly, the forces furnished by the towns of Franconia and the states of Suabia were, in their march to Titenang, on the lake of Bregentz, met in the valley of Engadina, by the inhabitants of Coire and the Grisons, who put them to the sword, and then ravaged the Tyrol without mercy.

Maximilian receives supplies of men from the cities of Franconia and Suabia, who are cut in pieces by the Grisons.

b MAXIMILIAN hoped that the troops he expected from Austria would repair this loss; but he was disappointed in his expectation: for when they had advanced as far as Oberdorf, the Swiss army appeared, and a very obstinate battle ensued, in which the Austrians were totally defeated.

THE victors having secured the ammunition and stores of the vanquished, marched towards Dormeck upon the Rhine, which was invested by the count of Furstenberg; and taking the advantage of this general's want of precaution, charged him unawares, while his troops were dispersed; and, though the fight was maintained for some time with equal fury on both sides, the imperialists received a total overthrow; the counts of Furstenburg and Bitsch, together with four thousand soldiers, fell upon the spot, and all the cannon and baggage were seized by the enemy, who gave no quarter during this engagement, which was the seventh battle lost by the Austrians in less than six months.

MAXIMILIAN was at Lindaw when he received the melancholy news of this misfortune, which effectually humbled his pride, and induced him to make the first advances to a peace, which, after some negotiations at Zurich Schaffhausen, was at length established by the mediation of the duke of Milan, and some other princes, and the articles were not very disadvantageous to his interest, considering the ill fortune of his arms during the war.

d By this peace it was agreed, that the country of Prettigaw should belong to the emperor, that the quarrel between the city of Coire and the inhabitants of Tyrol should be referred to the arbitration of Frederic bishop of Augsburg, and that all other differences should, in like manner, be decided by impartial umpires. At the desire of Maximilian, the house of Austria, the duke of Milan, the electors and other members of the empire, the cities of Strasburg and Basil, with their bishops, and the other imperial towns of Suabia and the Rhine, were comprehended in the treaty; while the Swiss on their side included the king of France and his allies, the abbot and city of St. Gall, together with the canton of Appenzel <sup>k</sup>.

The war is terminated by a treaty and arbitration. A. D. 1500.

e THIS peace was succeeded by an accommodation between Maximilian and Charles d'Emont, to whom the emperor restored the towns he had taken in Guelderland, permitting him at the same time to assume the title of duke, on condition that he should acknowledge the duchy as a fief of the empire. As for the Swiss, they acquired such reputation by this war, which they maintained against Maximilian, that Basil and Schaffhausen, and afterwards Appenzel, engaged in their league, and completed the number of thirteen cantons which now compose their alliance<sup>1</sup>.

The emperor makes peace with Charles duke of Guelderland.

MAXIMILIAN being freed from these broils, assembled a diet at Augsburg, in order to re-establish the public peace, and reform the abuses which had crept into the administration of justice; and the session was opened with complaints touching the annates, benefices, and taxes, which the court of Rome exacted of the provinces, to defray the expences of a war against the Turks. The sums thus levied had been remitted to Cæsar Eorgio, who had squandered them away in debauchery; and the princes inveighing loudly against this abuse, embassadors were sent to complain of it to pope Alexander, who promised that such profusion should be prevented for the future. This step being taken, they prolonged the league of Suabia for twelve years, re-established the imperial chamber, which was grown into disuse; and, as this could be of little advantage, unless proper measures should be taken to execute its decrees and support its authority, the empire was divided into the six circles of Bavaria, Franconia, Suabia, Saxony, the Rhine, and Westphalia: but as the provinces possessed by the house of Austria in Germany, and those of the electors, were not comprehended in these six circles, Maximilian formed his own German dominions into a circle, as an example to the other electors, and four new divisions were added to the former six, namely, the circles of Austria and Burgundy for the provinces belonging to the house of Austria, that of Upper Saxony for the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, and that of the Upper Rhine for the ecclesiastical electors and the Palatinate (I).

THE kingdom of Bohemia was not comprehended in this division, because it was not then connected with the Germanic body, and a misunderstanding subsisted between Ladislaus and the emperor<sup>m</sup>.

ALTHOUGH the interior parts of the empire enjoyed the happy fruits of Maximilian's paternal care, the war continued to rage between John king of Denmark and the Dythmarfians, who had revolted against him as duke of Holstein, and put themselves under the protection of the archbishop of Bremen. Before the commencement of hostilities he offered them a general amnesty, and a confirmation of all their privileges, provided they would own their dependence upon the duchy of Holstein; and they, rejecting his advances, he took the field against them. Their towns and villages soon fell into his hands, and their country was abandoned to pillage; yet they seemed to draw fresh courage from despair; they destroyed several detachments which he sent to reconnoitre their situation; for when they received the first account of his approach they abandoned Mildorp their capital, and retired into the centre of their country, where their dykes and canals served them for intrenchments.

THESE they fortified with great skill and precaution, and when the king advanced to attack them, they waited until they saw his army hampered among defiles and morasses, and then falling upon them with incredible fury, made a terrible slaughter, and obtained a compleat victory. Adolphus and Otho counts of Oldembourg, together with one hundred and sixty officers, were killed upon the spot, and the king obliged to fly for shelter to Holstein, where he set on foot new levies, in order to retrieve his reputation; but he was diverted from his purpose by the neighbouring princes, who negotiated an accommodation<sup>n</sup>.

MEAN while Lewis XII. of France, having made his preparations for wresting the Milaneze from Ludovic Sforza, sent a strong body of troops into Italy, took, plundered, and burnt, the town of Novi, made himself master of Valentia, Tortona, and Alexandria, while Ludovic, betrayed by his officers, fled for refuge to the emperor: Milan submitted without resistance, and Genoa received a garrison of French troops. Lewis, being informed of these conquests, set out from Lyons, and repaired to Milan, where he made a public entry, and was acknowledged as sovereign; where all the powers of Italy, except the king of Naples, sent ambassadors to congratulate him upon his good fortune.

HAVING appointed governors to all the conquered places, and made a truce with the emperor, he returned to France; but, in his absence, Trivulci, who commanded in Milan, rendered himself so odious to the people by his arrogance and cruelty, and oppressed the Gibelines in such a manner, that they began to cabal against his administration, and, in less than three months, disposed almost all the towns of the Milaneze to receive the banished Ludovic. That prince, finding the emperor neither very able nor willing to give him effectual assistance, had began to levy a body of horse in the provinces of the empire, and having contracted with the Swiss for eight thousand infantry, begun his march with that army, and entered the Milaneze, where the people opened their gates to him, and renewed their oath of allegiance; while Trivulci, perceiving the citizens of Milan ripe for a revolt, quitted the city, and shut himself up in Novarra, which was immediately invested by Ludovic, and, in a few days, capitulated: but the chevalier Bayard, who commanded in the citadel, refused to be comprehended in this capitulation, and held out with incredible fortitude and perseverance. Mean while Maximilian, having received the subsidies that were voted in the great diet at Worms, for the preservation of public peace, began to levy troops in all the provinces, in order to oppose the progress of Lewis: but, all of a sudden, these levies were suspended, and the French king sent a strong body of forces into Italy, under the command of the cardinal d'Amboise, and the Sieur de la Tremouille, who, without hazarding a battle, carried on a secret negotiation with the Swiss in Ludovic's army; and these, in court to nominate any prince it should judge a proper person to convoke the diet and direct the affairs of the circle; but as this office was naturally bestowed upon him who maintained the chief rank in every circle, it became hereditary in the sequel: and it is now exercised in the circle of Austria by the archduke of that name; in the circle of Bavaria by the elector and the archbishop of Salzburg; in Franconia alternately by the bishop of Bamberg, and the margraves of Brandenburg, Barent, and Anspach: in Suabia by the duke of Wurtemberg, and the bishop of Constance: in the Upper Rhine by the bishop of Worms and the count Palatine de Simmeren; in the Lower Rhine, by the elector of Mentz alone; in Westphalia, by the bishop of Munster, conjointly with the elector of Brandenburg and the Palatine, who inherited the office of director from the last duke of Juliers and Bergue, as part of his succession, which was divided among them.

The directors of Lower Saxony are the duke of Magdeburg and Bremen (formerly archbishops) and the dukes of Brunswic-Lunenbourg. The electors of Saxony is sole director of Upper Saxony; and the circle of Burgundy, which heretofore comprehended Franche-Comté, and all the provinces of the Low Countries, was directed by the kings of Spain, while these countries were under their dominion (1).

LEWIS having secured himself in the possession of the Milanese, concluded with Ferdinand king of Arragon a treaty, in consequence of which they joined their forces in order to conquer and divide the dominions of the king of Naples; and this poor prince was obliged to renounce his kingdom, and depend upon the generosity of the French king, who bestowed upon him and his heirs the county of Maine and all its dependencies, together with a pension of thirty thousand livres, and all rights and privileges granted to the princes of the blood.

b In order to preserve this conquest, and confirm the Milanese to his family, Lewis resolved to cultivate the friendship of the emperor, and actually demanded the investiture of that duchy from Maximilian, who was at first very averse to the proposal, because a report prevailed, that Lewis, by the help of the pope, aspired to the imperial crown. However, the French monarch soon undeceived him and the princes of Germany in this particular, by the most solemn protestation, and, knowing the avaritious and interested disposition of the emperor, he conquered his reluctance with a sum of money, and the proposal of a match between Charles son of the archduke Philip and his own daughter Claudia. This alliance was accordingly negotiated at Trent, by the cardinal d'Amboise; though the parties were in their infancy: a treaty of peace was concluded between the emperor and France, importing, that Lewis should assist the king of the Romans against the Turks; maintain the rights of Maximilian and his successors to the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia, after the death of Ladislaus, and facilitate his coronation at Rome; and, in consideration of these articles, the emperor should grant to Lewis the investiture of the Milanese <sup>p</sup> (K).

OTHER additional articles of this treaty were signed and ratified at Blois in France by the archduke Philip, on his way with the archduchess, through this kingdom to Spain, where they were declared the presumptive heirs of Ferdinand and Isabella.

d THE city of Basil having joined in the league of the Swiss, in diametrical opposition to the authority of the Germanic body, which had forbid the imperial towns to engage in that confederacy, a diet was convoked at Nuremberg, in order to concert measures for detaching it from that connection, as well as for preventing other cities from following its example; and it was proposed to summon the citizens to abandon the Helvetic league, and unite with that of Suabia, on pain of being put to the ban of the empire; but, after much altercation and debate, they agreed to consider Basil as an imperial town, and compel it occasionally to pay those taxes that should be imposed by the diet on the other cities of the empire.

Proceedings of the diet at Nuremberg. A. D. 1502.

e MEASURES were likewise taken to reform the current coin, and raise the Teutonic order to that importance they had lost since their last treaty with Poland, by which they forfeited Pomerania, Marienbourg, Elbing, Culm, and Oberm, with their territories. The states of the empire interposed their good offices in behalf of the knights, and sent ambassadors to the diet which the king of Poland assembled at Posnan, to terminate the dispute; but that prince would neither restore the places, nor remit the homage they paid for the towns they still held in Prussia; and the order, being very much reduced, was fain to wait for a more favourable opportunity °.

f MEAN while the pope sent cardinal Raymond as his legate, to let the emperor know he had resolved to publish a crusade against the infidels, and for that purpose had agreed with the ambassadors of several potentates, that the Hungarians, Bohemians, Poles, and Germans, should carry on the war against the Turks in Thrace, while the French and Spaniards should make their efforts in Greece, and his holiness with the king of England, the Venetians, and princes of Italy, would attack Constantinople by sea. In consequence of this resolution, he had sent nuncios to all the courts, to exhort the sovereigns to compromise their quarrels, that they might unite their forces against the common enemy of Christendom.

same time declared for himself, that his finances were by no means equal to his zeal, and therefore counselled the legate to address himself to the Germanic body. a

RAYMOND, in all probability, followed his advice, and was amused with some promises by the princes and towns; for the electors engaged in an association at Gelnhausen, obliging themselves to furnish a certain proportion of troops to march against the infidels; and they wrote to the kings of France, Spain, and Denmark, inviting them to join in the alliance. At the same time they represented to the emperor, that the erection of the aulic council lately established at Ratisbon, was contrary to the laws of the Germanic body, as the princes of the empire had never consented to the establishment of that tribunal, which greatly interfered with the authority of the imperial chamber. Maximilian however, paid little regard to these remonstrances, which were next year repeated in an assembly at Frank- b
fort; and the princes, on the other hand, lent a deaf ear to his intreaties, when he solicited them to admit his son Philip into the electoral college. His design was to erect Austria into an electorate; but failing in that enterprize, he resolved to invest the sovereign of that province with prerogatives that would as conspicuously distinguish him from the other princes. He began by confirming the title of archduke, which had been conferred upon him by Frederic III. Then he decreed, that the archduke, after having three times demanded his fief of the emperor, should be deemed to have obtained it, even though it had been refused; that he should receive it with the sword only, and that gratis, on the frontiers of Austria; and that he should not be obliged to answer any challenge to single combat. The electors, in order to counterbalance these privileges, which they did not approve, re- c newed their association of Gelnhausen, engaging to assist each other reciprocally against all violence, to maintain their rights in the election of an emperor, or king of the Romans; to oppose every attempt to diminish the authority of the Germanic body; and to appear every two years, personally, at an appointed time and place, to deliberate upon the affairs of the empire.

AFTER this diet Maximilian concluded a league of friendship and commerce with Henry VII. king of England, who, tho' he refused to lend the emperor the sum he wanted to borrow, presented him with ten thousand pounds, as a contribution against the Turks; and about this period he was informed that Joachim, margrave of Brandenburg, had married Elizabeth princess of Denmark, and engaged to assist John king of that country against d
Lubec and the other hans-towns of the north, which had declared for the administrator of Sweden against the sovereign of Denmark. But before he denounced war, he endeavoured to detach the regency of Lubec from the Swedes, by representing, that this people had shaken off the dominion of Denmark, in diametrical opposition to the treaty of Colmar, by which the three kingdoms were united under one sovereign; and that Suante-Sture, the administrator, had not only made an attempt upon the life of the king, but also detained the queen prisoner, contrary to his own promise, and all the laws of hospitality.

THE inhabitants of Lubec paying no regard to these remonstrances, John threatened to deprive them of their privileges, and, in the mean time, made prize of their ships and vessels, a circumstance which incensed them to such a degree, that they declared war against Den- e
mark, and fitted out a powerful squadron to annoy the Danes by sea. The administrator of Sweden made preparations for co-operating with these allies, and the whole north was on the eve of being involved in war; when Raymond, the pope's legate, at that time employed in preaching the crusade through the provinces of Germany, used his best endeavours for disposing the parties to an accommodation: the queen of Denmark was released, and conferences were opened; but before they could agree about the articles, Suante-Sture died, and was succeeded by his son Steno. The senate of Lubec having, about this time, intailed upon themselves a war with the duke of Mecklenburg, and terrified at the prospect of falling a sacrifice to two such powerful enemies, sent ambassadors to his Danish majesty, to sue for peace, which was granted on pretty equitable conditions. f

JOHN being now at liberty to prosecute the war against Sweden with his whole force, the administrator, by the intercession of the envoys of Scotland and Brandenburg, obtained his consent to the opening of conferences at Colmar, where the Swedes refusing to appear, were convicted of rebellion, the administrator declared a traitor, deprived of his nobility, and his estate confiscated; and this sentence, being confirmed by Maximilian, was published through the whole empire.

THIS confirmation being obtained, the king of Denmark confiscated all the estates belonging to the Swedish noblemen in Denmark and Norway, and gave the hans-towns to understand, that, should they continue to trade with Sweden, or assist that kingdom in any shape whatsoever, he would revoke all the privileges granted by his predecessors to their ships in the ports of Denmark.

<sup>a</sup> THE Swedes, alarmed at the emperor's decree, as well as at his Danish majesty's resolution, sent ambassadors to Copenhagen to sue for peace; but, as they had already deceived the king, all they could obtain was a short suspension of arms<sup>s</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> DURING these commotions, there was such a formidable insurrection among the peasants in Germany, that it was found necessary to raise a strong army, in order to bring them to reason; for they had resolved, like the Swiss, to shake off the yoke of their masters, and live independent, in the form of a republic<sup>t</sup>. Scarce was this disturbance quelled, when a new war broke out in the empire. George de Rich, duke of Bavaria, of the branch of Landshut, had made his will in favour of his son-in-law Rupert, count Palatine, son of Philip the elector; and tho' he could not prevail upon the emperor to confirm this disposition, he had, some time before his death, not only bestowed the vicariate of the Lower Bavaria upon Rupert, but also laid injunctions upon the states of these provinces to obey that prince. At his death, Albert and Wolfgang, dukes of High Bavaria, his nearest relations of the branch of Munich, had obtained the investiture of his dominions. Rupert pretended to the succession in consequence of the will, as husband of Elizabeth, daughter of duke George, and because the greatest part of the fiefs were allodial. Albert and Wolfgang, on their side, affirmed, that the will of George was contrary to the antient treaties of the family, by which it was stipulated, that if any prince of the house of Bavaria should die without male issue, the nearest relation of the collateral line should succeed to his dominions. This affair was brought before the emperor, who adjudged the succession to collateral heirs, and Rupert, refusing to abide by that sentence, was put to the ban of the empire. His father Philip, who was threatened with the same penalty, provided he should espouse the cause of Rupert, hesitated some time between his fear and paternal affection; at length, however, being encouraged with promises of succour from France, he armed for the support of his son, and underwent the same punishment from Maximilian. Armies on both sides immediately took the field: the emperor, who commanded the first, was accompanied by Albert and Wolfgang, dukes of Bavaria, Frederic margrave of Brandenburg, and the bishop of Strasburg; and invading the territories of duke George, committed great ravages, took possession of divers cities, and meeting with a body of troops which Rupert had levied in Bohemia, cut them in pieces near Ratisbon. After this action, Maximilian divided his forces, one half of which had orders to attack the territories of Rupert, while the other, headed by the emperor himself, marched towards Alsace against the elector Philip, took possession of several places in the Palatinate, among others Kuffstein, and Geroldsecke, and compelled the elector to sue for peace. Udalrich duke of Wurtemberg, who was at the head of a second army, composed of twenty thousand foot and eight hundred horse, entered the dominions of the count Palatine, burned the monastery of Maulbrunnen, and took possession of several places. A third body, which had been raised by Alexander count Palatine, duke of Bavaria, and count of Weldentz, was no other than a number of peasants assembled in a hurry, and much better adapted for plundering and ravaging the country, than for carrying on a regular war. These, however, he sent into the Palatinate, some towns of which fell into their hands: but the greatest excesses were committed by the fourth corps, which destroyed with fire and sword<sup>u</sup>, under the conduct of William landgrave of Hesse, accompanied by Henry duke of Brunswick, Henry duke of Mecklenburg, Emien count of Leinengen, the counts of Lippe and Koningstein, and several other noblemen, some of whom had voluntarily taken arms, out of hatred to the elector of Palatine, while others engaged with a view to support some particular pretensions, and a third fort embraced the service for payment and promotion.

<sup>f</sup> DURING these operations, the elector Philip retired to his fortress of Heidelberg, a place strong by its situation, defended by good walls and towers, difficult of access, and provided with a noble train of artillery. The town was likewise well fortified, supplied with provisions for three years, and the garrison composed of people determined to sacrifice themselves for the defence of their prince.

<sup>g</sup> THIS invasion of the Palatinate lasted five months, at the end of which Rupert dying, the emperor ordered both parties to lay down their arms; and that no person might have cause to complain that his rights were invaded, issued orders for convoking a diet at Cologne, where the pretensions on both sides should be heard and considered, and a definitive sentence pronounced by the princes of the empire. The elector Palatine repaired to this diet, and was by Frederic elector of Saxony presented to the emperor, of whom he asked pardon, and intreated peace. Maximilian received him into favour, and, with the advice of the princes of the empire, regulated the conditions of the treaty between Philip and the dukes of Bavaria. In this accommodation regard was had to the children of Rupert, who, besides the treasures of duke George, were left in possession of the territories lying between the Danube, the Nab, and the antient limits of the Palatinate. His other dominions were given to Albert and Wolfgang; the old quarrel between the elector Palatine and the duke of Wirtemberg was compromised, and as it was stipulated in the treaty, that each should remain in possession of the lands and places which he had acquired during the war, the emperor remained master of the fortresses of Rottenberg, Kuffstein, and several other towns. Yet the articles of this peace were not fully executed till two years after this period, in the diet which was held at Constance <sup>x</sup>.

Confirmation of the treaty of Blois.

It was now that the treaty of Blois was concluded, and confirmed the alliance before projected between France and Austria; an alliance by which, indeed, Lewis XII. acquired the investiture of Milan, but importing, at the same time, that in case Lewis should prevent the stipulated marriage between the princess Claudia and the archduke Charles of Luxemburg, this prince should, by way of indemnification, possess the duchy of Burgundy, the Milanese, and the county of Asti; whereas, should the match miscarry through the fault of Maximilian, or of Philip prince of Spain, the young archduke's father, the house of Austria should cede her pretensions to the duchy of Burgundy, the Artois, Charolois, and other domains; so that this, at any rate, was a very impolitic agreement in Lewis; for by giving his daughter in marriage to Charles, he gave away Brittany as her dowry; and, by refusing the match, he lost the duchy of Burgundy, and his Italian fiefs. But this treaty was opposed by the states of France, with the private consent and approbation of Lewis, and the princess given in marriage to Charles count of Angoulesme, presumptive heir to the crown.

DURING these transactions Isabella queen of Castile dying, after having left her dominions to her husband Ferdinand, Philip of Austria repaired to Spain with his wife Jane, in order to reign in conjunction with his father-in-law. Pope Julius II. who succeeded Alexander, made himself master of Bologna, with the assistance of Lewis and cardinal d'Amboise, and projected schemes for raising a new sovereignty by force of arms.

MEAN while Philip, titular king of Spain, was overtaken by death at Burgos, and, to the astonishment of all mankind, appointed Lewis XII. tutor to his son Charles, notwithstanding the reason he had to doubt the friendship and integrity of that monarch; but this step was the consequence of the hatred he bore to Ferdinand, whom he looked upon as a perfidious hypocrite; and he knew that the Flemings would never own the emperor as regent during his son's minority.

NEVERTHELESS the seventeen provinces, though they chose their own governors for the space of eighteen months, finding themselves involved in a war with Charles duke of Guelderland, who made great efforts to recover the whole extent of his dominions, were at length obliged to yield the regency to Maximilian, who declared his daughter Margaret of Austria their governante <sup>y</sup>.

THOUGH the emperor had made a very good accommodation with the king of France, with regard to Milan, he could not forget the outrage which he thought he had received from the Venetians, by the part they acted in that affair; besides, they possessed lands in Istria, to which he had pretensions. He therefore convoked a diet, where, though under another pretext, it was resolved to declare war against the republic and her adherents <sup>z</sup>; and in order to execute this design the more effectually, he engaged in a league with pope Julius II. and the kings of France and Spain, who could not without regret behold the Venetians in peaceable possession of several cities in the duchy of Milan, and in other parts of Lombardy, to which they had no other right than that of conquest. But, before this alliance was made, Maximilian undertook an expedition into Italy, in order to oppose the progress of Lewis, who was suspected of a design to enslave that country; he accordingly began his march with a contemptible number of troops, and was by the Venetians refused a passage through the valley of Trent; so that he was obliged to desist from his enterprize, after having sustained considerable loss in an engagement with Bartolomeo d'Alviano, the general of the republic. Thus baffled, he was fain to conclude a truce; and, as he was disappointed in the other part of his design, which was his coronation at Rome, he, by a circular letter, laid injunctions upon all the states of the empire, to give him the appellation of Roman emperor elected, a title which hath since been assumed by all his successors, at their election, in consequence, however, of the pope's permission.

As the French troops, which had joined the Venetians, refused to act offensively against the dominions of the emperor, the state of Venice were fain to listen to the proposals of Maximilian, and open a congress at their city, where, after abundance of altercation and political craft exercised on both sides, a separate treaty of truce was concluded between Maximilian and the Venetians, to which Lewis XII. had liberty of accession for the space of three months. The French king was so incensed at this exclusive accommodation, that, with the help of cardinal d'Amboise, he formed the project of a league against the Venetians, in order a to divest the republic of all the dominions she had usurped in Italy from the empire in Lombardy, from the kings of France and Spain in the Milanese and Apuglia, and from the pope in Romagna. This scheme was particularly relished by the emperor, as it not only flattered his interest, but also his revenge; for the Venetians, immediately after the truce they had concluded with him, decreed a triumph to their general who had defeated his troops; an impolitic compliment, which he looked upon as an indelible affront offered to his reputation. He therefore entered into the association, which was effected by the treaty of Cambray, concerted between Margaret duchess-dowager of Savoy, sister of the deceased archduke, and cardinal d'Amboise, who met at that place, on pretence of terminating the difference between Charles the emperor's grandson and the duke of Guelderland <sup>a</sup> (I.).

b THIS league was attended with all the success that could be expected; for the emperor and the king of France wrested from the Venetians almost all the cities which they possessed in Lombardy; nor was the pope backward in taking all that lay convenient for his purpose. In a word, the Venetians thought themselves so little able to withstand this alliance, that they abandoned all their territories upon the continent, after having lost the famous battle of Ghiera d'Adda, in which their whole infantry was cut in pieces <sup>b</sup>. While the French troops, under the marshal de Chaumont, reduced one town after another, Maximilian advanced at the head of his army towards Innsbruck, in order to attack the Venetians; and Christopher count Frangipani, with the duke of Brunswic, who commanded the light troops, entering Istria and Friuli, retook all the places which had been lost the preceding year. The

c Venetians were now reduced to such extremity, that they sent a charte blanche to the emperor, and implored his clemency in the most submissive and pathetic terms. But the effects of his compassion in favour of the republic were prevented by the remonstrances of cardinal d'Amboise, who exhorted him to seize this opportunity of reducing this insolent state; and, in all probability, it would now have been enslaved, had not the measures of the French and Germans been traversed by the king of Arragon and the pope, who would by no means concur in the ruin of the only power which had hitherto hindered these nations from subduing all Italy <sup>c</sup>.

They send a charte-blanche to the emperor.

d MEAN while Maximilian repaired to Trent, accompanied by the cardinal, who there received the investiture of Milan in the name of Lewis XII. The league of Cambray was likewise renewed; and an interview proposed between the emperor and the French king on the frontiers of the Milanese. Lewis kept the appointment; but Maximilian sent an excuse: then the king of France repassed the Alps with part of his army, leaving the rest under the command of Chaumont.

e HE was no sooner gone than the Venetians felt their courage revive. They surprised Padua, and retook several other places garrisoned by the troops of the emperor, who, being informed of these transactions, solicited succours of his allies, and they reinforced him so effectually, that he found himself at the head of fourscore thousand men, with whom he entered Lombardy by the mountains of Vicenza, in spite of an obstinate opposition he sustained from the peasants, who were devoted to the Venetians, and besieged Padua, which was defended so gallantly, that he was fain to abandon the enterprize and retreat to Innsbruck.

(L) The treaty or league of Cambray consisted of these articles. The pope, emperor, kings of France and Arragon, shall mutually assist one another in recovering the places and dominions which the Venetians had usurped or wrested from them. Ravenna, Cervia, Faenza, Rimini, Imola, and Cesena, shall be restored to the pope. Roveroda, Verona, Padua, Vicenza, Trevisa, and the Frioul, shall return to the emperor. The king of France shall retrieve Brescia, Crema, Bergamo, Cremona, Gieradadda, and all the antient dependencies of the duchy of Milan. The king of Arragon shall be put in possession of Trani, Brindisi, Otranto, Gallipoli, and all the ports which the Venetians occupy in the kingdom of Naples. Because the emperor is bound by a truce for three years with the Venetians, the pope, in order to furnish him with a pretence for breaking that treaty, shall summon him as avoyer of the Roman church, to come and assist him in recovering the dominions of the holy see. While the three princes shall attack the republic with temporal arms, his holiness shall press them to restore what they have usurped, on pain of excommunication. The kings of Hungary and England, the dukes of Savoy and Ferrara, and the marquis of Mantua, shall be exhorted to engage in this league. During this war, neither the emperor, nor his grandson the prince of Spain, shall in any shape molest the king of Arragon, with respect to their pretensions to Castile. Maximilian shall again bestow upon Lewis XII. the investiture of the duchy of Milan, in which Brescia, Bergamo, and all the other dependencies of the Milanese shall be included. If the republic shall have recourse to the Turks for succours, the confederates shall redouble their efforts, and the association shall thenceforward be regarded as a league against the infidels. None of the confederates shall make peace or truce with the enemy, without the concurrence of the rest: and, in order to prevent the differences subsisting between the emperor and the king of Arragon, touching the possession of Castile, from obstructing the enterprizes of the league, commissaries shall be appointed on both sides to terminate these disputes in an amicable manner, as soon as the war against the Venetians shall be finished (9).

The republic of Venice soon retrieved its loss, and became more powerful than ever; for, when their arms failed, they had recourse to their policy, reconciled themselves to the court of Rome, and effected a breach between the king of France and the pope, who now openly espoused their cause.

The pope makes unsuccessful efforts as mediator between the emperor and the Venetians.

JULIUS, in order to weaken Lewis, counselled the Venetians to accommodate matters with the emperor, and he himself undertook the office of mediator. The conferences were opened in a commanderie, near Scala; and the republic, conscious of Maximilian's avarice and poverty, offered not only to reimburse him for the expence of the war which he had incurred, but also to pay him a sum of money equivalent to what France had expended on <sup>b</sup> the same occasion. But, as they refused to part with Padua, Treviso, and Vicenza, he rejected their proposals, and made a merit of having manifested this disinterested conduct with the diet assembled at Augsburg, which approved of his intention to re-establish the authority of the empire in Italy (M), and promised to support him in the execution of that design, towards which he borrowed one hundred and fifty thousand crowns of the king of France, upon a mortgage of the town of Wallegio.

A. D. 1510. The armies of the emperor and of France take the field.

Then he regulated with Lewis the operations of the ensuing campaign, and having, without effect, demanded succours of the king of Arragon and the pope, as his confederates, he appointed the count de Hanau his general in Italy, and ordered a body of troops to assemble in the neighbourhood of Verona. There being joined by the French under the marshal de Chaumont, they passed the Po and the Adige, and took Vicenza, which the inhabitants redeemed from pillage. In a word, they reduced a great number of places, and filled the whole country with carnage and consternation; but Chaumont refused to assist the Germans in the siege of Padua, and a misunderstanding happening between Maximilian and Lewis, it was thought necessary to confirm their league by a new treaty, in consequence of which the armies acted with more vigour and unanimity. <sup>c</sup>

MAXIMILIAN was now so well convinced of the French king's sincerity and affection, that he submitted his disputes with Ferdinand to his arbitration. This prince had, by the intrigues of cardinal Ximenes, secured himself in the possession of the whole kingdom, and the emperor had no friends in Spain but a few noblemen who were dissatisfied at the administration. Nevertheless, Ferdinand agreed that the king of France should be umpire of the contest, which he terminated in an amicable manner; pronouncing that the king of Arragon should govern Castile until the archduke Charles should have attained his twentieth year; that this young prince should not assume the title of king till the death of his mother; and that the male children which Ferdinand might have by his second marriage should have no pretensions to the kingdom of Castile. <sup>d</sup>

The pope declares war against Lewis and the duke of Ferrara.

By this arbitration Lewis thought to have attached Ferdinand to his interest, or at least to have hindered him from joining the pope against the French nation. But he was deceived: the king of Arragon had already concluded a secret treaty with Julius, who bestowed upon him the investiture of the kingdom of Naples, and afterwards declared war against Lewis, on pretence of his having refused to cede some towns, to which the holy see had some pretensions; and the duke of Ferrara, as the French king's ally, was included in this declaration. <sup>e</sup>

LEWIS, incensed at his presumption, as well as alarmed at his preparations, and attempts to turn upon him those arms that were intended to check the progress of the Turks, allied himself still more strongly to Maximilian by a new treaty, concluded at Blois, and convoked an assembly of the clergy, to inquire how far he ought to respect the spiritual power of the church, which the pope exercised so unjustly. The assembly declared, that if the pope should unjustly attack any Christian prince in his temporalities, he might in consequence defend them by force of arms; that Lewis might, on this occasion, re-establish the pragmatic sanction, and insist upon the common rights of mankind, according to the decrees of the council of Basil. <sup>f</sup>

Maximilian forms a design of succeeding Julius in the papacy.

This declaration was equally agreeable to the French king and Maximilian, who had projected a scheme for calling a general council to try and depose Julius, whom he himself meant to succeed in the papacy. In order to accomplish this aim, he resolved to borrow a large sum of money from the Fuggers, who were the richest merchants in all Germany, to

(M) It was in this assembly that Hamburg was anew declared a free imperial town, independent of the house of Oldenburg, the pretensions of which were referred to the decision of the imperial chamber. This event was the more remarkable, as the city of Hamburg had, for three hundred years, disputed the sovereignty of its territory with the kings of Denmark and the counts of Schaumbourg (10).

a buy the votes of the cardinals; and he proposed to pawn his imperial ornaments, and to make over to these traders one third of the revenues of the holy see, until the whole debt should be liquidated.

THIS scheme, however, he kept very secret from every body but a few particular friends; though that he intended to put it in execution appears from some of his own letters (N).

MEAN while the pope proceeded to hostilities against the duke of Ferrara, and, being joined by troops from Naples, made a very considerable progress, though he ran the risk of having his person seized, first by Chaumont, and afterwards by the chevalier Bayard.

b THE emperor and the king of France sent ambassadors to Burgos, to complain of Ferdinand's having infringed the league of Cambray, and to exhort him to join for the convocation of a council: but that prince, jealous of their power, and dreading their influence in Italy, answered very coldly on both these subjects; though he privately employed all his endeavours to detach Maximilian from the interests of Lewis, which he demonstrated to be incompatible with those of the emperor. These suggestions had great weight with Maximilian, who was persuaded to leave his cause to the determination of a general assembly to be held at Mantua, and he intreated the king of France to send a minister to that congress. Though Lewis was very much chagrined to find his ally amused by such an expedient, in the midst of their conquests in Italy, he did not think proper to signify his disgust, by which means he might entail the whole burden of the war upon himself, but sent the bishop of Paris to Mantua, where he found Matthew Langh, bishop of Gurck, the emperor's plenipotentiary, accompanied by the ambassadors of Ferdinand.

c JULIUS, who was then at Ravenna, being desirous of founding the bishop of Gurck; and, if possible, of winning him over to his interest, found means, by his emissaries, to induce that prelate to visit him at Bologna, where he employed all his artifice to engage him in his interest, and even cajoled him with the promise of a cardinal's hat; but he found Langh unshaken and incorruptible: and while he amused him with conferences touching a general pacification, attempted to surprise Genoa, whither he sent the bishop of Ventimiglia in disguise. This prelate, however, was discovered in driving a troop of oxen, and all his accomplices put to death. The bishop of Gurck, incensed at this perfidy, broke up the congress at Mantua, while Lewis pursued his advantages in Italy.

d THIS fruitless effort, however, was succeeded by a council at Pisa, convoked at the desire of the French king, under the protection of the emperor, though Maximilian did not send thither any ambassador, nor did any German bishop assist at the assembly. Indeed by this time the emperor was greatly cooled in his friendship for Lewis, who, tho' he perceived his indifference, still dreaded the thought of seeing him among the number of his enemies; and therefore not only overlooked his neglect, but cultivated his good graces with the utmost assiduity; for, while Ferdinand pulled off the mask, by sending troops to Naples, in order to hinder an exclusive accommodation between France and the pope, Lewis engaged in a new treaty with the emperor, and sent his general la Palice, with a body of forces, to join the imperial troops, and implicitly obey the commands of Maximilian, who would not head the army in person, but reinforced the French general with nine thousand men, and desired him to dislodge the Venetians from the strong posts which they occupied. In obedience to these orders, he attacked and routed the enemy, compelled the towns of the Friuli to submit, made himself master of the Graditz, and reduced Castel Novo for the benefit of the emperor, who, notwithstanding these conquests, seemed to be still dissatisfied, because he would not undertake to besiege Trevisa with such a small army, but retired into the duchy of Milan.

A council at Pisa. A. D. 1511.

A. D. 1512. Lewis sends a body of troops under la Palice to obey the emperor.

f THE kings of England and Arragon, taking advantage of his discontent, strongly solicited him to join in the league which they had concluded against France; and in the mean time negotiated a truce for ten months between him and the republic of Venice, and promised to furnish him with troops and money to conquer the Milanese, and subdue the duke of Guelderland.

STAGGERED by these insinuations, he industriously sought occasion to break with France: he loudly complained that he had reaped no advantage from the league of Cambray; that of the three towns to which he had an incontestable right, Trevisa and Padua were still in the hands of the Venetians. while Verona was mortgaged to the king of France. He demanded that these places should be conquered for him at the expence of Lewis; that Renea, the second daughter of France, should marry the infant Ferdinand, younger brother to the archduke Charles; and that Burgundy should be dismembered from France, as her dowry. The meaning of these and other extravagant proposals was plainly discerned by Lewis, who thought fit to temporize, and endeavour to amuse Maximilian with a subsidy of fifty thousand crowns; notwithstanding which, this prince engaged in the league against France<sup>f</sup>; so that Lewis was left alone to sustain the burden of the war. Even then he made a strong effort, and set on foot a powerful army, the command of which was given to Gaston de Foix, who, upon Easter-day, obtained a signal victory over the confederates near Ravenna; but it cost him so dear, that the affairs of France were in as bad a situation as if he had lost the battle, and, to crown the misfortune, the English at that time declared against Lewis, who, being obliged to quit all his advantages on this side, in order to defend his own dominions, Milan, and all that he had conquered in Italy, fell a prey to his enemies.

FERDINAND, taking the advantage of this conjuncture, wrested the kingdom of Navarre from John of the house of Albret, its lawful possessor, and afterwards endeavoured to find out a title to defend his usurpation. All his right, however, consisted in a pretended bull, which the pope had unjustly fulminated against John, on account of his adherence to the king of France, whom Julius had also excommunicated; and even this slender pretence was an authority ex post facto; for the invasion happened in June, and the bull was not published till July.

THE condition of Lewis XII. was now really deplorable: for though he found means to make peace with the Venetians, he was invaded on one side by the Swiss, and on the other by the English, who had denounced war against him, at the instigation of Ferdinand, and who were joined in Picardy by the forces of Maximilian, where they obtained a victory over the French, well known by the name of the battle of the spurs<sup>h</sup>.

THE success of the confederates was in a great measure owing to a reinforcement of Swiss that joined the Venetians, and were for this service complimented by the pope with the title of Defenders of the Holy See: but the emperor gained very little by their good fortune; for the allies became jealous of his power, and resolved, at all events, to exclude him from the possession of the Milanese, which he destined as an establishment for his grandson Ferdinand.

IN vain did the bishop of Gurck, at an assembly held in Mantua, display his master's pretensions to that duchy; the pope's deputies and the Swiss insisted upon its being restored to the family of the Sforzas; and, after much altercation and debate, it was agreed that Maximilian Sforza should receive the investiture. But other disputes still remaining between the emperor and the Venetians, as well as between the pope and the emperor, touching the possession of those towns which they had severally conquered during the war, a congress was opened at Rome, to terminate these conquests. The towns subdued by the pope in the exarchate of Ravenna remained in possession of the holy see, qualified by a clause in these words, without prejudice to the rights of the empire. But the Venetians refusing to do homage to the emperor for Padua, Trevisa, Brescia, Bergamo, and Crema, and insisting upon his restoring the places he had conquered in their dominions, the pope declared against them, and entered into an association with Maximilian, whom he undertook to assist with spiritual as well as temporal arms. This affair being settled, the bishop of Gurck imparted to Julius his master's design with respect to the papacy, and intreated his holiness to take that prince as his coadjutor; but this proposal the pope absolutely rejected, although the king of Arragon had promised to support Maximilian's pretensions: nor could a sufficient party be made among the cardinals to ensure his succession<sup>i</sup> (O).

a JULIUS did not long survive this refusal, and was succeeded by the cardinal de Medicis, A. D. 1513: who assumed the name of Leo X. the great patron of the liberal arts and sciences.

b MEAN while the war continued in the north of Germany, between John king of Denmark and the hans towns, which supported the Swedes in their revolt: he solicited the assistance of the kings of England and Scotland, while the regency of Lubec implored the protection of the emperor, who had laid injunctions upon the princes of Lower Saxony to defend the hans towns against the king of Denmark; and at the same time forbade John to interrupt their commerce. His Danish majesty, however, without paying the least regard to the prohibition, equipped a powerful fleet, with which he made prize of their vessels, and they fitted out another, with which they alarmed and ravaged the coasts of his dominions. This piratical war continued near three years, until the regency of Lubec, finding themselves impoverished by the interruption of their trade, sued for peace, and the treaty was concluded at Flensbourg, in consequence of which the hans towns undertook to assist John in asserting his right to the crown of Sweden. But that monarch died soon after this pacification, and was succeeded by his son Christian III <sup>k</sup>.

War between the king of Denmark and the hans towns.

DURING these commotions in the north, the pope, the emperor, and the kings of England and Aragon, formed a league against Lewis, who makes peace with the Venetians, and reinforces their army; and the operations of war recommenced in Italy, while Henry VIII. of England made a descent in Picardy, and gained the battle of Guinegate, at which Maximilian served in his army as a volunteer, for one hundred crowns a day.

c THIS war continued till the death of Lewis, when Francis I. who succeeded him on the throne, found it his interest to make an accommodation with the emperor; and this he the more easily obtained, as the disturbances which at that time happened among several princes of the empire hindered Maximilian from bestowing his attention upon foreign affairs; and he was moreover solicitous about the settlement of his family, being then actually employed in a negotiation for matching the infant Mary his grand-daughter, with Lewis, eldest son of Ladislaus king of Hungary <sup>l</sup>. This marriage was accordingly solemnized at Vienna, and, as the parties were very young, the consummation was deferred until they should attain a riper age.

d FRANCIS having established a good understanding with the emperor, he also concluded a treaty of peace with the English and the Venetians, and, thus secure from these quarters, he made preparations for re-conquering the Milanese, of which Maximilian Sforza, son of the late duke, had possessed himself, by the assistance of the Swiss. Having entered Italy with a powerful army, he gained some considerable advantages over the enemy; and meeting the Swiss army, which had come to the succour of the duke of Milan, gave them battle near Marignan. The engagement was very bloody, and so obstinate, that night alone could part the combatants. Next morning both sides returned to the charge, and fought with great fury, until the Swiss, hearing that the Venetian army was come to the assistance of the king, were so alarmed, that they began to give ground, and, in the confusion which necessarily ensued, were all cut in pieces. Next day after this victory, Francis attacked e and carried the city of Milan, but he would not make his entrance, until the duke, who had retired into the castle, should have surrendered and submitted to the laws of the conqueror. Sforza was accordingly obliged to renounce his duchy and title, in consideration of a sum of money and a pension for life, to be spent in France, or wheresoever the king should think fit to fix his residence. This treaty being signed, he evacuated the castle, and all opposition being now removed, Francis easily made himself master of that whole state <sup>m</sup>.

He defeats the Swiss at Marignan.

By this rapidity of conquest, Maximilian was so much alarmed, that he resolved to stop his progress, and, for that purpose, to march into Italy with an army of thirty thousand men.

Francis

Francis, that he might be the more able to sustain this storm, had recourse to the alliance of pope Leo X. with whom he had an interview at Bologna, where a treaty of peace was signed, and no sooner ratified, than the king gave the necessary orders for the defence of his Milanese conquest, and returned into France. The pope engaged in this league partly through fear of Francis, who, being victorious and formidable, was not to be refused, and partly because Ferdinand king of Spain being infirm, and Charles his grandson and heir apparent very young and unexperienced, he could not much depend upon them or their allies.

Maximilian

of Milan.

ALL that the emperor could do when he arrived in Lombardy, was to besiege in the city of Milan the constable duke of Bourbon, whom Francis I. had left for the defence of his conquest, and who had abandoned the open fields to the emperor, and retired into the city. Maximilian, after having blocked the place for some weeks, began to be in want of provision. He also understood that Ladislaus king of Hungary was taken very ill, and that the French were reinforced by twelve thousand Swiss; for which reasons he interrupted his operations, raised the siege, and returned to Germany <sup>a</sup> (P). Ferdinand king of Spain dying about the same time, he found it necessary to send prince Charles, who was then in Flanders, to take possession of that kingdom, of which he was heir; and that he might have a free passage through France, Maximilian was advised to make peace with Francis, who, by the articles of the treaty, remained in the peaceable possession of his Italian conquest. In this treaty, which was concluded at Noyon between the king of France and prince Charles, it was stipulated, that this last should marry Louisa, the eldest daughter of Francis, or, she failing, the second, provided a second should be born; if this should not happen, he should espouse Renee, the queen's sister, whose dowry should be that part of the kingdom of Naples to which the king had pretensions, with a reversion in his favour in default of issue; that Charles should pay annually 100,000 crowns for the maintenance of the princess, and restore in six months Navarre to Henry d'Albret, otherwise the king should be at liberty to assist him <sup>c</sup>.

trine.

In this place it will be necessary to mention the circumstance which gave rise to the reformation of Luther, which was attended with such considerable events through the whole empire of Germany. Pope Leo X. intending to finish the church of St. Peter at Rome, which was begun by his predecessor, and being in want of money for this purpose, as well as for defraying the expence of a war which he had projected against the Turk, he imagined that the readiest and surest expedient for raising contributions among the nations of Christianity, would be to grant plenary indulgences. He therefore sent his bulls to Albert, elector of Mentz, with orders to publish them in Germany; and that prelate appointed people to distribute the indulgences, and receive the money, while he laid injunctions on John Chatel, a Dominican, and inquisitor of the faith in Germany, and the brothers of his order, to preach up the merits of this contribution. The directors of this collection committed such abuses in distributing those remissions, and the Dominicans behaved with such excessive indiscretion in magnifying their power, that the whole empire was scandalized at their proceedings (Q). The Augustines, jealous of the honour conferred upon the order of Dominicans, who had been preferred to them on this occasion, and desirous of sharing in the profit of the contributions, openly declared themselves against their proceedings, and pretended to refute what they advanced, as the effect of extravagant and misguided zeal. John Stulpitz, vicar-general of the Augustines, being supported by the elector of Saxony, who had a particular regard for him, was the first who openly attacked the sermons of the Dominicans, and the abuses which were committed in the distribution of the indulgences. (P) It was at this period that Maximilian, being in great want of money, began to cajole Henry VIII. of England with a promise of ceding the imperial throne in his favour, and actually desired the English ambassador to let his sovereign know, that Maximilian would assemble a diet at Triers to regulate this important affair, and that he would afterwards accompany Henry to Rome, where he should be crowned, and assist him in conquering the Milanese. Henry guessed the meaning of these advances, and remitted him a sum of money, in hope of one day profiting by his offers: but, when he afterwards proposed an interview with the emperor in the Low Countries, where this affair might be transacted, Maximilian declined the conference, and, after some evasive excuses, plainly told the English ambassadors, that he had resolved to raise his grandson Charles to the imperial throne (12).

(Q) This commission ought to have been granted to the Augustines of Germany, according to the convention which had been made among the four orders of mendicants. Notwithstanding which agreement, Albert, archbishop of Mentz, whether by his own authority, or by order of the pope, bestowed it upon the Dominicans. It was no longer a simple collection. Offices were every where set up, even in the houses of publicans, where the collectors consumed in debauchery a great part of the money produced from this traffick of the sacred treasures of the church. It was, moreover, well known, that the pope applied considerable sums of this money to his own particular occasions, his own finances being almost exhausted by the presents he had made to his relations and courtiers, and the pensions he bestowed on learned men (1).

a der to fortify himself against such a strong party, he chose for his colleague Martin Luther, whom he looked upon to be the most capable of all the monks and doctors of the new university of Wittenberg, to which he belonged. Accordingly this new associate proposed abundance of theses, which he supported with great spirit and strength of argument against indulgences and the pope's authority; so that his doctrines were embraced by great numbers, and the other order immediately took the alarm. Nothing more was required to form two powerful factions. John Thetzel, in opposition to Luther, advanced other theses at Frankfort upon the Order, in defence of the pope and his proceedings, and carried things to such extremity, as to condemn, in quality of inquisitor, the writings of Luther to the flames. Martin, who was of a warm and enterprising temper, far from being intimidated by the conduct of the inquisitor, maintained a literary war against him, while his disciples b burned, in their turn, the writings of the Dominican at Wittenberg. Thus both parties were heated into the most virulent altercation, though neither, as yet, withdrew themselves from their obedience to the church of Rome. True it is, the Dominicans reinforced their side of the dispute with underhand negotiation, and strongly solicited the pope to condemn their antagonists. Leo, who could not refuse his protection to an order which had laboured so effectually, and with such fervour, in his interests, summoned Luther to appear at Rome in sixty days, to be tried by judges whom he appointed for the purpose. At the same time the Dominicans pressed the emperor to declare against their adversaries; but that prince was too busy in finishing his accommodation with France, to intermeddle in a business, which he considered as a petty quarrel among monks. The troubles of Hungary seemed c to him a matter of much more consequence, and indeed demanded his whole attention in settling those affairs that concerned the guardianship of king Lewis, who was at that time no more than ten years of age. Nevertheless, as soon as the emperor had terminated these two negotiations, he resolved not only to re-establish the tranquillity of the empire, which those religious disputes had begun to shake, but also to regulate the domestic concerns of his own family, as he perceived his strength beginning to decay.

WITH this double view he convoked a diet at Augsburg, where the first step he took, was to recommend his grandson Charles in the strongest manner to the electors, whom he cultivated with all sorts of good offices and marks of liberality, in order to engage them to choose that young prince for his successor in the empire. As the Dominicans gave him no d respite in the affair of Luther, he was obliged; in order to satisfy them, to summon Martin to appear at that diet; he even furnished him with a safe-conduct, without waiting for the answer of a letter, which at the beginning of that meeting, he had, with the advice of the states, writ to the pope, beseeching him to pronounce a definitive sentence, which was like to involve the empire in trouble and confusion. The elector of Saxony, and the university of Wittenberg, had also intreated his holiness to retract the citation which he had formerly sent to Luther, and to consent that the business should be transacted by cardinal Cajetan, who was at that time his legate in Germany, and actually present at the diet. Luther being thus excused from going to Rome, repaired to Augsburg, and presented himself before the cardinal, under favour of the emperor's safe-conduct. Then, instead of retracting, he undertook to defend the doctrines which he had advanced in his writings; but that his intentions might not be mistaken, he, in presence of witnesses, made a voluntary protestation before a notary, importing, that he would submit to the judgment of the church, refer himself to other universities, and retract his errors as soon as they should appear to his own conviction. The legate, however, still continuing to press him to a recantation, and even mixing threats with his remonstrances, Luther began to be afraid of being apprehended, and retired in the night, after having, by a writing fixed up in a public place, appealed from the legate to the pope. He at the same time wrote to Leo, complaining of the harsh usage he had received from the cardinal, who was justly accused of partiality in favour of the Dominican order, f to which he himself belonged.

IN the mean time Maximilian canvassed for the election of his grandson Charles; but as there was no precedent for creating a king of the Romans before the emperor's coronation at Rome, the pope was solicited to send a legate into Germany with the crown, and other imperial ornaments, to perform that ceremony in the name of his holiness. Notwithstanding the intrigues of the king of France among the princes of the empire, as well as his efforts with the pope, whom he endeavoured to engage in an opposition to this election, by representing how formidable Charles must be, should he succeed to the imperial throne; I say, notwithstanding these endeavours, the emperor's proposal was not rejected, but, by a decree, postponed to the next diet of the empire. Some authors allege, that Maximilian at g first intended the crown for Ferdinand his other grandson; but that he was persuaded to prefer Charles, as a prince who, by the vast extent of his dominions, would be more able to maintain the splendor of the house of Austria, and support the dignity of the empire<sup>c</sup>. a

THE emperor did not long survive the end of this diet: for having repaired to Innsbruck, in order to take further measures for the election of Charles, he was attacked by a slow fever, which, in order to dissipate by change of air, he embarked upon the Inn for Austria. On his arrival at the town of Wells, the fever augmenting, he endeavoured to expel it by violent exercise; but one day returning from the chace, he eat a great quantity of melons, in order to assuage his thirst, and having afterwards taken a medicine unseasonably, his disorder, which was before intermittent, changed into a continual fever, and a violent dysentery ensuing, he died in the 60th year of his age<sup>d</sup>. He was, in consequence of his own desire, interred at Newstadt in Austria. He gave directions on his death-bed touching his body, which was neither embalmed nor embowelled, but the cavities were filled up with quick lime. b

HE was a prince of a very agreeable appearance, sober, quiet, and so modest, that he was never seen naked by any of his attendants. He had a passion for letters, a sprightly imagination, and was particularly addicted to poetry. His memory was so tenacious, that he never forgot the name of any man, whom he had once seen or heard mentioned, during the whole course of his life. In his youth he had applied himself to the warlike exercises; he handled his arms with great dexterity, and no person excelled him in horsemanship. He was patient in suffering hunger and fatigue, personally brave, liberal (R), magnificent, affable, and obliging. He reformed the military discipline among his soldiers with large muskets and long pikes, and made several new military laws and regulations. c

But his passion for the chace he indulged even to the prejudice of his affairs, which he often neglected for the enjoyment of that favourite exercise: in the course of which, he used to pursue on horseback the wild goats and other game among the rocks of the Tyrol, with such temerity, that the inhabitants of those countries were often obliged to lower him down with cords, half dead with hunger, from frightful precipices, among which he had engaged himself. Yet, with all these good qualities, he was inconstant, irresolute, and so profuse, that, by squandering away the money which ought to have been otherwise employed, a great many of his most important affairs miscarried, and his reign makes but an indifferent figure in the annals of the empire<sup>e</sup> (S). d

(R) His liberality, or rather his profusion, involved him in numberless difficulties and disgraces, because he was often, by want of money, obliged to abandon enterprises of very promising aspect. Yet, notwithstanding all these necessities, he would never encroach upon the gold, silver, and jewels, which had been left by his own father, his father-in-law, and his grandsire. These he preserved as a sacred treasure, very little to the credit of his sagacity (1).

(S) Maximilian's first wife was Mary of Burgundy, who died of a fall from her horse, when she was big with her third child. He afterwards married by proxy the daughter and heiress of Francis, duke of Brittany; but this marriage was never consummated, for the reasons mentioned above. His third match was with Blanche Maria Sforza, daughter of Galeazzo Maria, duke of Milan, who was a shoe-maker's son. She had no children, and broke her heart because she was despised by the emperor, and was buried in the monastery of Stams in Austria. Towards the latter part of his life, Maximilian was on the point of marrying Ann daughter of Uladislaus, king of Bohemia; but he was dissuaded from this scheme, and the princess was given in marriage to his grandson Ferdinand. Of his children by Mary of Burgundy, Margaret alone now survived. She had been first of all betrothed to Charles VIII. of France; but being refused, and sent back to her father, she was married to the infant John, son of Ferdinand and Isabella: he dying a few months after the marriage, she was again contracted to Philibert, duke of Savoy, who died before the nuptials could be consummated. As for her brother Philip, the emperor's eldest son, he died twelve years before his father, leaving by Jane, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, six children, namely, Charles, who succeeded his grandfather Maximilian in the empire; Ferdinand and four daughters, the eldest of whom, Eleonora, married Emanuel king of Portugal, by whom she had one daughter, and afterwards Francis I. of France, to whom she bore no children. Her sister Isabella was wife to Christiern, king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, who was expelled from his dominions for his tyranny. Philip's third daughter was Mary, matched with Lewis, king of Hungary, by whom she had no children, and after his death she obtained the government of the Low Countries. The fourth was a posthumous child called Catherine, who was married to John III. king of Portugal. Maximilian had besides a son called Francis, born at Brussels, who died within a year after his birth. He moreover left eight natural children of both sexes; the sons he promoted to honourable employments, the daughters he matched to persons of the first quality.

- <sup>a</sup> CHARLES the fifth, son of Philip, king of Castile, and Jane, daughter and heiress of Charles V. Ferdinand the Catholic, was born at Ghent in Flanders; and passed the greatest part of his infancy at Mecklin, under the care of his aunt Margaret, widow of Philbert duke of Savoy, and governess of the Low Countries, and with Margaret of York, widow of Charles duke of Burgundy. Anthony Vacca, a Spaniard, who was entrusted with the care of his education, being dead, when he was but seven years of age, Margaret employed as his preceptor Adrian Florissen of Utrecht, professor in the university of Louvain, who was afterwards elected pope. He began to employ the young prince in the study of the belles lettres; but his governor, William de Croy, lord of Arbot, turned his whole attention to military exercises. At the age of six, Charles lost his father Philip, at fifteen his grandfather Maximilian declared him of age, and put into his hands the government of the Low Countries. <sup>his birth and education.</sup>
- <sup>b</sup> That same year, he recovered from George and Henry, dukes of Saxony, the territory of West-Friezeland, which the emperor Maximilian had mortgaged to Albert the Courageous for two hundred thousand ducats of the Rhine. At the death of his maternal grandfather, Ferdinand the Catholic, he succeeded to his kingdoms; and next year repaired to Spain, where he was solemnly crowned. Though he was a German by extraction, born and bred in the Low Countries, he chose to make his chief residence in Spain; where he was desirous of ending his days, after he renounced the empire, and abdicated all his dominions, as will appear in the sequel. At length, after the death of the emperor Maximilian, Charles presented himself as a candidate for the imperial throne. <sup>Succeeds to the throne of Spain.</sup>
- <sup>c</sup> of France, who had a long time cherished the scheme of adding the empire of Germany to his other dominions, and carried on sundry intrigues for that purpose during the life of the late emperor; immediately after whose decease, he had sent a solemn embassy, with four hundred thousand crowns, to confirm the attachment of some of the electors who had espoused his interest. Nor did Charles neglect the means of supporting his pretensions on this occasion. He was archduke of Austria, and lord of the Low Countries, as heir to his father; king of Spain, Sicily, and Naples, in right of his mother; and, as we have already observed, had been proposed to the diet of Augsburg by his grandfather Maximilian, as his successor in the empire. The electoral college, foreseeing that many inconveniencies would attend the election of either of these competitors, and being, in all probability, influenced by the pope, who, though he seemed to favour Francis, was jealous of both on account of their great power, resolved to offer the crown to Frederic the Wise, elector of Saxony. <sup>Presents himself as a candidate for the empire.</sup>
- <sup>d</sup> The proposal was accordingly made to him, after an interregnum of near six months; but he declining the honour, and declaring for Charles, the elector of Mentz gave his suffrage for the same prince; and their example was followed by all their colleagues, except the elector of Triers, who held out to the last for Francis. What chiefly contributed to the miscarriage of the king of France upon this occasion, was his being a foreigner by birth and extraction; for the Germans, who are naturally jealous and mistrustful, were afraid, that he, having been bred up in an absolute monarchy, would change the constitution of the empire, and humble the electors and princes to a degree beneath the dukes and peers of France. <sup>Is opposed by the king of France.</sup>
- <sup>e</sup> Charles was therefore elected emperor at Frankfort; and as he at that time resided in Spain, the elector palatine was sent thither to notify his election; which he no sooner understood, than he began to prepare for his journey to the empire; and, having equipped a fleet, he embarked for Flanders, from whence he repaired to Aix-la-Chapelle, in order to be crowned; though not before he had crossed the sea, on a visit to Henry the eighth, king of England, who received him at Canterbury, and accompanied him in his return to Flanders. <sup>The crown offered to Frederick, elector of Saxony, who declines it in favour of Charles.</sup>
- <sup>f</sup> During this interview, he is said to have detached Henry from the interest of Francis the first, contrary to the treaty which had been lately concluded between these two monarchs at Ar-dres. The ceremony was no sooner performed, than he quitted that city, which was infested by the plague, and went to Cologne, where he ordered writs to be expedited, and issued through the empire, for convoking the states at Worms, on the sixth of January the following year. <sup>Who is elected at Frankfort, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle.</sup>

MEAN while the Spaniards, chagrined at the departure of their king, whose promotion to the empire they could not relish, as they foresaw it would interfere with the administration of his own kingdom, and being, moreover, incensed at the avarice of the Flemings, to whom he had committed the management of affairs since the death of cardinal Ximenes, several grandees of Spain, in order to shake off this oppression, in the absence of Charles, entered into an association, which they called the Santa Junta, which was embraced by Toledo and many large cities, and raised forces under the auspices of John do Padellia, and Antonio d'Acugno, bishop of Zamora. Their design was to restore the kingdom of Arragon to Ferdinand, the son of that Frederic king of Naples, who died in France, on condition that he should marry Jane the mother of Charles the fifth, whose person they had actually secured; but he rejected their proposal; and the viceroys of Castile and Arragon, taking arms against the rebels, weakened the faction by degrees, and at length almost entirely extinguished it by a total defeat, in which Padellia and the bishop were slain (A).

THE king of France, taking the advantage of these intestine broils, sent an army under the command of Andrew de Foix into Navarre, which he conquered in a very little time; but, not contented with this success, he invaded Castile, where he was defeated by the viceroys, who in a few days retook the whole of Navarre, and dismantled almost all its towns and castles, by order of the emperor. This invasion did not interfere with the treaty of Noyon; because the six months being expired, Francis was at liberty to act in favour of the house of Albret: but several other circumstances concurred to bring to an open rupture that grudge which the jealousy of two competitors for a throne seldom fails to produce. Francis complained that Charles did not pay the money which he had promised to furnish yearly for the maintenance of the princess, and consequently had no intention to accomplish the match; that the emperor's agent had spoke disrespectfully of him in the diet, and at the courts of the German princes; that he had seduced from his allegiance Philbert de Chaalons, prince of Orange, and intrigued in Italy, with a view to incommode him in the possession of Milan. Charles, on the contrary, taxed the king of France with having taken under his protection William duke of Guelderland, sworn enemy of the Austrian family and the Low Countries, pretending that he was lawful heir of the duchy of Burgundy. Henry king of England preserved a neutrality on this occasion, affecting to act as umpire in the dispute; while the pope entered into a treaty with the emperor, for the mutual defence of their territories, for re-establishing Francis Sforza in the duchy of Milan, and recovering Ferrara to the holy see. Things being thus ripe for a quarrel on both sides, Robert de la Mark, lord of Sedan and duke of Bouillon, being disgraced at the court of France on account of the ravages committed by his company of gens-d'armes, had retired to that of the emperor; where, while he resided, the council of Charles received the appeal of a cause which had been tried and decided by the peers of his duchy of Bouillon, between the lords of Simay and Emery. Robert considered the determination of this appeal as an affront upon his honour, reconciled himself to the king of France, whither he retired; sent a defiance to the emperor, and his eldest son with three thousand men to besiege Vireton in Luxemburg. This insult provoked Charles to raise a powerful army, the command of which he gave to Henry count of Nassau, who chastised Robert, to whom a truce for forty days was afterwards granted: and hostilities commenced in the Low-Countries between the troops of Charles and Francis, though neither as yet openly avowed these enterprizes. Henry of England, seeing matters brought almost to extremity, proposed that they should refer their difference to his decision, giving each to understand, at the same time, that he would actually declare against him who should decline the proposal. Alarmed at this intimation, they sent ambassadors to him at Calais, with full powers to regulate every thing in a conference, during which, however, the count of Nassau passed the Meuse and besieged Mouzon, which he took upon capitulation, and afterwards committed horrid cruelties wheresoever he marched. Charles then assembled his forces, retook Mouzon, burned and dismantled Baupaume, reduced Landrecy, and Bouchain, and passed the Scheld in quest of the emperor, who had come to Valenciennes, from which he now retired by the favour of a thick fog. In the mean time, the arms of Charles made great progress in Italy; the Milanese, Parma, and Placentia, were reduced, in spite of all the efforts of the marshal L'Autrec, whose army was defeated before Bicoque, in attempting to force the rea trenchment of the imperialists : and this battle was so decisive, that the remains of his troops, which he left to the command of his brother Lescun, were obliged to keep aloof, and be eye-witnesses of the entire conquest of that state by the forces of Charles <sup>e</sup>.

But, before we proceed to give a farther detail of this war, it will be necessary to mention the transactions of the diet at Worms, concerning Luther, who, in consequence of a safe-conduct granted by Charles, appeared at that assembly, and being asked, by order of the emperor, whether or not he would retract the doctrines he had broached, or defend the writings he had published, he insisted upon the truth of what he had advanced, and resisted, with great resolution, all the admonitions and remonstrances of the bishop of Triers, who tampered with him in private, in expectation of prevailing upon him to recant and submit to the power and authority of the pope. Some of the members of the diet, provoked at his perseverance, advised the emperor to follow the example of the council of Constance, in violating the safe-conduct which he had given to this arch-heretic ; but this advice he rejected with disdain, saying, ‘ That if good faith were banished from among the rest of mankind, it ought to find a sure retreat in the palaces of princes <sup>h</sup>.’ Accordingly Luther was dismissed in safety ; though at the same time he was condemned and proscribed, by public edict, as a wicked heretic, who had broached the most damnable doctrines, not only destructive of true religion and good order, but also of the peace and government of his country, so that he seemed to be a real devil in human shape : for which reasons all persons were prohibited, under severe penalties, from affording him countenance or shelter, after the expiration of the time prescribed in his safe-conduct, and commanded to do their utmost endeavours to apprehend and bring him to justice, while his books underwent the same public condemnation. Notwithstanding this severe sentence, his patron Frederic, elector of Saxony, conveyed him to a safe retreat, where he lived in security, and composed divers performances, which were occasionally published, and greatly augmented the number of his followers <sup>i</sup>. About this time, his writings were formally condemned by the theologists of the university of Paris (B) ; and among other adversaries Henry the eighth, king of England, took up the pen and entered the lists against him, producing a performance for which he was honoured by the pope with the title of Defender of the faith <sup>k</sup>. To this production Luther replied in such contemptuous and virulent terms, as even gave offence to many of his own friends : and, indeed, it must be owned, that moderation was no part of his character, though in all probability the warmth of his temper gave a rapidity to his success ; because reformations are generally effected by a spirit of enthusiasm, which is much easier kindled by the violence of the reformer’s disposition, than by the force of his arguments, or the rectitude of his cause.

THE other affairs of the diet were referred to the next meeting, which was held the following year at Nuremberg ; where, in presence of all the members of the empire, the constitution was enacted, by which Germany was divided into ten circles. These and several other regulations being made, his presence became absolutely necessary in Spain, chiefly on account of the promotion of Adrian Florissen to the papacy upon the death of Leo the tenth, who was supposed to be poisoned by Barnabas Malaspina, gentleman of his bed-chamber. Adrian, who was a native of Holland, had been preceptor to the emperor, who entrusted him with the administration of his Spanish dominion, which office he was now obliged to resign, in order to go and take possession of St. Peter’s chair ; so that Charles was under the indispensable necessity of repairing to that kingdom, in order to supply the loss of such a minister, and quiet, by his presence, the troubles of Spain, which were not yet quite appeased <sup>l</sup>. He therefore set out for England, on a visit to his aunt, who was queen of that kingdom, where he entered into an offensive and defensive alliance (C) with Henry the eighth against the king of France ; and having past the whole month of June in festivals and rejoicing, he embarked for Spain, and arrived in safety at port St. Andero, after an agreeable voyage of ten days <sup>m</sup>. Mean while the archduke Ferdinand, the emperor’s brother, who was lately married to the sister of Lewis king of Hungary, being created

(B) In consequence of this sentence, Philippus Melancthon a German, whose real name was Schuarizerd, a youth of uncommon learning and assurance, took up the pen in defence of Luther, for whom he wrote an apology, intituled, Adversus furiosum Parisiensem theologastorum decretum ; and managed the dispute with some humour, and abundance of scurrility (1).

(C) By this treaty the emperor obliged himself to espouse his cousin the princess Mary, who was then but seven years old, and to pay the yearly sum of 130,000 ducats to the king of England, while Henry should continue to make war upon the king of France, until Charles should consummate his marriage with the princess Mary, or Henry should have acquired lands in France sufficient to yield that revenue. On these conditions, the king of England immediately declared war against the king of France, and measures were concerted for taking the field (2).

lieutenant-general of the whole empire during the emperor's absence, made pressing instances with the diet to take measures for the execution of the decree made in the assembly at Worms, and of the bull which Leo the tenth had fulminated against Luther; as also to employ their utmost care in healing up the schism which religion had suffered: but he was baffled in all his designs by the efforts of Luther and his followers. Nevertheless, in another diet held at Nuremberg on the subject of religion, the same proposals were made by the legate of Clement the seventh, who had succeeded Adrian the sixth; but as the Lutheran party, which gathered new strength every day, eluded this blow with equal industry and art, the legate prevailed upon the Catholic princes to form another assembly at Ratis-bon, where they entered into a league, by which they obliged themselves to execute the decree of Worms; to alter nothing in religion; to punish all ecclesiastical apostates; to expel the Lutherans from their territories; to deprive them of all their benefices; and, finally, to assist each other in case they should be attacked. This association, however, could not retard the rapid progress of the reformation, which was extended as far as the other side of the Baltic, by means of the revolution which happened in the North. Christiern the second, surnamed the Tyrant, king of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, was deposed by his uncle Frederic, duke of Holstein, who seized upon Denmark and Norway; while Gustavus Vasa raised himself to the throne of Sweden; and both these princes embraced and introduced the foreign religion into their dominions<sup>a</sup>. At the same time it spread itself into Lower Germany, Livonia, and Prussia, where it made a convert of Albert marquis of Brandenburg, grand master of the Teutonic order (D). During this progress of Lutheranism, the constable Charles of Bourbon revolted from the king of France, and joined the emperor, in hope of being revenged upon his own sovereign<sup>b</sup>; while Henry the eighth of England landed an army in France, under the command of the duke of Norfolk, which, in the beginning of winter, returned again, without having struck any stroke of importance. Although the enemies of France had thus carried the war into the very bowels of that kingdom, Francis the first sent a body of troops over the Alps, under the command of Bonniwet; who, at first reconquered all the Milaneze as far as Tecino, in the very face of Prosper Colonna, who was general for the emperor, pope, and Venetians; and, in all probability, would have taken the city of Milan, had not he spent his time unnecessarily in the siege of Pavia; during which his army was greatly diminished by the cold weather and the plague, while that of the confederates every day increased; so that he was fain to quit his enterprize, and take post at Biagras; from whence being driven by Charles of Bourbon, he was obliged to retire towards Turin, and return into France with the wreck of his army. Notwithstanding this disgrace, Bonniwet found means to excuse himself so effectually to his king, that he still continued in favour, and even persuaded Francis to levy a great army, and to march in person against the confederates. He accordingly took the field, and crossing the Alps, found the city of Milan abandoned by the enemy. There he left La Tremouille, with six thousand men; while he himself marched to Pavia, the siege of which he undertook about the latter end of October. In order to secure this place, Charles of Bourbon having joined the viceroys of Naples, and Pescaro, general of the imperial army, marched forward to attack the besiegers, when that memorable battle ensued, in which Francis the first was taken by the viceroy, who afterwards conducted him prisoner into Spain<sup>c</sup>.

WHATEVER joy the emperor must have felt at this event, he received the news of it with great moderation, nor would he suffer any public rejoicings to be made on account of his success, observing that all victories gained over fellow Christians, were rather objects of mourning than of mirth. When his council was called to deliberate in what manner he should treat the captive king, his confessor actually exhorted him to release his prisoner without conditions, an act of generosity which would transmit the honour of his name to all posterity, and attach to him the heart of Francis by the ties of gratitude, which would be more binding than any treaty which they could possibly make. The rest of the council however, and in particular Frederic duke Alva, were of different opinion, and proposed certain articles of peace, which were immediately sent into Italy, and presented to Francis, who still remained at the castle of Pisqueton, and who rejected the conditions with dis-

(D) In the course of this year, one Jean le Clerc, a native of Meaux, and two Augustine monks, were punished for having embraced the protestant religion. The first was scourged and branded at Meaux, for having said that the pope was Anti-Christ, and afterwards burnt at

Metz for demolishing images. The two monks underwent the same death at Brussels (1).

(E) The council of Charles proposed that Francis should renounce the kingdom of Naples and the duchy of Milan; that he should restore to the emperor the

(1) Metz. Abr. Chron. t. 3. p. 862.

- a By this overthrow of Francis, his kingdom was left open to the insults of his enemies, and in all probability would have fallen a prey to their superior power, had they continued to act with the same unanimity which they had hitherto preserved; but by this time Henry the eighth of England began to be detached from the interest of the emperor, by the insinuations of cardinal Wolsey, who thought himself neglected by Charles, after having courted his friendship and good offices in promoting the last treaty. The king of England, therefore, disbanded an army which he had raised, and a fleet which he had equipped for a descent upon France, and entered into a treaty with the queen-regent, in order to preserve that kingdom from being dismembered. On the other hand, the pope and the states of Italy became jealous of the emperor's power, which had been greatly aggrandized by this victory, and entered into a secret association, in order to expel the Spaniards, who at that time besieged Sforza in the castle of Milan.

His allies growing jealous, form an association to expel the Spaniards from Italy.

- ABOUT this time, great part of the empire was harrassed and desolated by the war of the peasants, which was the effect of oppression and enthusiasm: the murmurs of the labouring people, who groaned under severe burthens, were blown up into sedition by certain fanatics, who, by preaching, inflamed their minds against their magistrates, as well as the clergy; so that they broke out in open insurrection, and Germany was filled with tumult. Those of Suabia published twelve articles, containing their grievances spiritual and temporal, threatening to redress themselves, in case their proposals should be rejected; and this writing was spread and espoused in different parts of Germany. At length, the peasants took the field, appearing in arms, in numerous bodies in Suabia, upon the Danube, at the lake of Constance, in Lorrain, Thuringia, and other provinces, laying waste the country with fire and sword; and daily exhibiting spectacles of the most horrible barbarity, sparing nothing human or divine. Luther, having at first attempted to quiet them by gentle admonitions and intreaties, and perceiving his endeavours ineffectual, now wrote against these seditions with great force and severity, exhorting the princes to take arms in defence of their country. Accordingly, measures were concerted for that purpose; and, in a few months, upwards of one hundred thousand of these peasants were slain in different rencounters. In Thuringia, Thomas Munster, a fanatic preacher, who was the prime source and ringleader of this disturbance, was taken, together with his associate Pfeifferus, who had been a monk; and both were put to death at Mulhausen.

- MEAN while Francis the first was removed from Italy to the castle of Madrid, and, notwithstanding the eagerness with which the queen-mother and his subjects endeavoured to effect his deliverance, the negotiation was protracted almost a whole year; at the end of which a treaty was signed at Madrid, importing, among other things, that the king should be set at liberty, on condition that his two sons, the dauphin of France and the duke of Orleans, should remain as hostages until the articles should be fulfilled; and that if the king, in six weeks after his release, should not have given full satisfaction in these particulars, he should return and surrender himself prisoner as before. The princes of the blood were accordingly brought into Spain, while the king, being set at liberty, returned into his dominions, where he left no means untried for the deliverance of his children; but he was very much embarrassed in his endeavours, because the fundamental laws of the state would not allow him to alienate Burgundy and the other territories, which he had yielded by the treaty; and the emperor insisted upon his performing every article. In this perplexity, he, by the advice of his council and chief noblemen, resolved to protest against the treaty as a compact signed by compulsion, and actually gave the emperor to understand that he disclaimed all he had done, and was ready to renew the operations of war.

A. D. 1526: Francis set at liberty on conditions which he refuses to perform.

- DURING these disputes, the doctrine of Luther gained ground in the most considerable cities of Germany, and was now openly espoused by Philip landgrave of Hesse, who introduced it into his dominions, at the solicitation of John elector of Saxony, who had succeeded his brother Frederic, who died without issue. The progress of these new opi-

duchy of Burgundy, which had been the patrimony of his ancestors; that he should bestow Provence, Dauphiny, and the Lionnois upon the duke of Bourbon, who, by this condition, might possess an independent kingdom; and lastly, that he should satisfy the demands of the English. Tho' Francis affirmed, he would rather suffer perpetual imprisonment than consent to such conditions, which, he said, were repugnant to the fundamental laws of France; yet he offered, in consideration of obtaining his liberty, to espouse the emperor's sister Eleanora; to hold Burgundy, by way of dower, and as the inheritance of the children of that marriage; to restore the duke of Bourbon to the possession of all his territories, and bestow upon him in marriage his sister Margaret, widow of the duke of Alençon; to satisfy the English with a sum of money; to pay the same ransom that was exacted of king John; and to furnish an armament by sea and land for the use of the emperor, as often as he should repair to Italy, in order to receive the imperial crown (1).

nions in religion, and the extremity to which the Turk had reduced Lewis king of Hungary, prompted the archduke Ferdinand to convoke a diet at Spire, in order to concert measures to appease the troubles of the church, and to stop the career of the infidels (A). With regard to the first point, the landgrave of Hesse, and the elector of Saxony, demanded the free exercise of the new religion within their own territories, with such obstinacy and zeal, that by an express clause they were indulged with liberty of conscience, until the decision of a general council, which the emperor should be petitioned to convene with all convenient dispatch<sup>c</sup>; but the attention of the diet was so much engrossed, and the term so long protracted by the debates which this article of religion produced, that no resolution was taken for the support of Lewis king of Hungary, who was left to perish by the hands of his enemies<sup>d</sup>.

PERHAPS nothing was of greater service to the reformation than the misunderstanding that happened between the pope and the emperor, on account of the alliance in which his holiness had engaged with the king of France, the republics of Venice and Florence, and the cantons of Switzerland, for the expulsion of the Spaniards from Italy. Charles, with a view of being revenged upon the pope, importuned him incessantly to convoke a council, protesting, that otherwise he should be obliged to make use of his imperial authority for that purpose; at the same time, in order to oppose the league, he sent the duke of Bourbon into Italy, after having bestowed upon him the investiture of the duchy of Milan, that he might be the more cordially attached to his service. For the purposes of this expedition the archduke sent thither a powerful reinforcement; and the emperor, by secret intrigues, endeavoured to detach the pope from the interest of his allies. The duke of Bourbon, finding himself at the head of forty thousand men, in a very little time traversed all Italy, in order to attack the confederates; a rapidity which alarmed the pope to such a degree, that he began to listen to the proposals of the emperor's ministers, and consented to a truce of eight months with the viceroy of Naples; in consequence of which he restored the places which he had taken in that kingdom, and disbanded his troops in order to save expence. However, he had soon reason to repent of his parsimony, when he understood that the duke of Bourbon continued his march towards Rome, without having any regard to the truce, or the approaching treaty. Finding himself thus deceived, he would hear no more of either, reunited himself with his allies, and prepared for the defence of the city, which was attacked by the constable, who lost his life in the assault. His troops, however, without being discouraged by his death, were enraged to such a degree of fury, that they scaled the walls, and took the city by storm, while the pope was obliged to retire with his cardinals into the castle of St. Angelo, where they were besieged, until the confederates were in full march to their assistance, when the emperor sent order to his generals to enlarge his holiness without delay. He was accordingly set at liberty on certain conditions, and the remains of the imperial army, which had been greatly reduced by the plague, were fain to retreat towards Naples (B).

THE sack of Rome alarmed almost all the princes of Christendom, those of Italy entered into an alliance with the kings of France and England, and all together, animated by their common interest, resolved to humble the pride and bridle the power of the emperor. Charles, on the other hand, who was still in Spain, endeavoured to break the association, by reconciling himself with the king of France and the pope, that he might be at liberty to return into Italy, and from thence pass into his German dominions, where his presence was very much wanted to settle the affairs of religion and the state, particularly to provide some defence for the frontiers of Austria, the Turk having made such advantage of the wars in Christendom, that he was now in possession of almost all the kingdom of Hungary. Mean while the archduke Ferdinand, who had succeeded to the crown of Hungary by the death of Lewis his brother-in-law, though not without a strong opposition from John de Zapollo, vaivode of Transylvania, who was his competitor; Ferdinand, I say, with a view to engage the princes of the empire to support his pretensions, convoked a diet, on pretence of regulating the affairs of religion, which had disunited the whole empire; and in this assembly, which was held at Spire, it was decreed, that in those places where the decree of Worms was published, no person should be allowed to profess the doctrine of Luther; and that in those places, where Lutheranism had been already received, it should

But the Lutheran princes (D), together with fourteen imperial cities, protested against this decree, and appealed to the council and the emperor, whence they acquired the name of Protestants s. With regard to the succour against the Turk, nothing was determined; because the Protestants declared, they would not contribute to that service, unless liberty of conscience and of worship should be allowed throughout the whole empire.

b MEAN while Solyman, who was well apprized of the Christian affairs, and of the dissensions that prevailed among them, resolved to profit by the conjuncture; and having nothing to fear from Hungary, marched into Austria, the capital of which he actually invested: but the place was so gallantly defended by Philip count palatine of the Rhine, Nicholas count of Salines, and William of Rogendorf, that he was obliged to raise the siege, and return to Constantinople with the loss of sixty thousand men h.

c THE empire now was in such a deplorable situation, that the emperor resolved in earnest to make peace with all the princes of the league, that he might have leisure and means to provide for the quiet and security of his German dominions. He, therefore, entered into a treaty with the pope, which was concluded at Barcelona, towards the end of June; and then came to an accommodation with the king of France, which was settled at Cambray in the month of August. The emperor, by means of this double peace, being enabled to execute his design of taking Italy in his way to the empire, he set sail for Barcelona, with a powerful fleet; and landing at Genoa, repaired to Bologna, where he conferred with the pope about the measures to be taken for reducing the Protestants; for he deeply resented the contempt with which they had treated his decree of Worms, which was the first he had published after his advancement to the imperial throne; and he was incensed against the elector of Saxony, for having sheltered Luther, whom he had banished and proscribed. The pope taking advantage of this disposition, endeavoured to inflame the emperor to a war against the Protestants, in order to prevent the convocation of a council, where he well knew the Lutherans would never allow him to preside as master and sole director. But

d the emperor being apprehensive of the Turk, declined this proposal; and the result of the conferences, was a resolution to convoke a diet, in which the emperor should exert himself to the utmost of his power for the reunion of the two religions; and if these means should fail, take care that no fresh innovation should be made upon the catholic religion till the decision of a council, which the pope, in that case, determined to assemble i.

A. D. 1530.

e THESE affairs being thus settled, the emperor was crowned by the pope at Bologna on the twenty-fourth of February, which was his birth-day k: he re-established Francis Sforza in the duchy of Milan, erected the marquisate of Mantua into a duchy, in favour of Frederic de Gonzaga, and assisted the pope in reducing the Florentines under the dominion of Alexander, bastard of Laurence de Medicis, who was created duke of Florence l. Then he issued orders for the convocation of the diet, to be held at Augsburg on the eighth of April, and set out from Italy on the twenty-second of March; but as he did not arrive at the place till the fifteenth of June, the Protestants had leisure to form that confession of faith, which has ever since retained the name of the Augsburg Confession. The diet was opened on the twentieth; and as religion was the chief object of their deliberation, cardinal Campesio, the pope's legate, took an opportunity, in a Latin discourse, to exhort the Lutherans to return to the communion of the Roman church. His harangue being concluded, the elector of Saxony, George marquis of Brandenburg, the dukes of Lunenbourg, Philip landgrave of Hesse, and Wolfgang prince of Anhalt, arose from their seats, and advancing to a place opposite to the emperor's throne, addressed themselves to him by the mouth of George Pontamis, chancellor of Saxony, beseeching his imperial majesty that their confession of faith might be publicly read, that the world might be undeceived with regard to false reports which had been circulated of them and their opinions. Charles complied with their request; and next day the confession, with the authorities upon which every article depended, was read in his palace in the Latin and German languages, and afterwards deposited in his majesty's own hands <sup>m</sup>. Some time after, a refutation of this confession by the Catholics was produced in the diet, where it was publicly read before the emperor, who gave it the sanction of his own approbation, and pressed the Lutherans to subscribe to it: but they withstood all his remonstrances with such resolution, that it was not thought proper to come to an absolute decision upon the affair, lest the minds of both parties should be inflamed to an open rupture. The diet was, therefore, adjourned for six months; during which the Protestants were exhorted to reunite themselves with the church of Rome, against which they were expressly forbid to publish any writing, to convert any Catholic, or to disturb any person of that communion in the exercise of his religion: but this toleration did not extend to the Anabaptists or Sacramentarians. It was also resolved, that the pope should be intreated to convoke a council in six months, to be opened in one year after the convocation. The Protestants, dissatisfied with this prorogation, withdrew themselves from the assembly, and, by their retreat, gave great offence to the emperor, who being apprehensive of their intentions, and willing to prevent matters from coming to extremity, put an end the diet by another decree, in which he prohibited the exercise of any other religion than that of popery, and forbid all innovation in the doctrine or ceremonies of the church, on pain of corporal punishment and confiscation of goods; ordaining, at the same time, that all things should remain on their ancient footing, until otherwise disposed by the authority of a council. This decree was very afflicting to the Lutherans, and induced the landgrave of Hesse, who was the first that absented himself from the diet without the knowledge of the emperor, to enter into an association with the cantons of Zurich and Basil, and the city of Strasburg, in case they should be attacked on the score of religion <sup>n</sup>.

In the midst of these troubles, Charles would let slip no opportunity of strengthening his own interest, by procuring more authority in the empire to his brother Ferdinand: for this purpose he resolved to secure the imperial dignity to that prince, and persuaded the elector of Mentz to convene a college for electing him king of the Romans. The elector immediately sent intimation to his colleagues, and a particular ambassy to the elector of Saxony, whom, in his own name and that of the emperor, he invited to the college at Cologne, in order to proceed to the election. The elector of Saxony, instead of obeying this summons, privately wrote to the landgrave of Hesse, and all the other Protestant princes, cities, and states, soliciting them in the most pressing terms to form an assembly at Smalcalde on the very day appointed for the election of the king of the Romans, in order to concert measures for their mutual safety. Mean while, he pretended in public to conform to the designs of the emperor, and ordered John Frederic his son to set out for Cologne with some of his most staunch adherents, not with a view to promote the election, but rather to protest against it, in case any step should be taken to the prejudice of the most essential clauses of the bull of Charles the fourth, and the rights and liberties of the empire. While the electors, then, were deliberating upon this election at Cologne, the princes and deputies of the towns, which had embraced the Protestant religion, arrived at Smalcalde, where they entered into a defensive alliance against all those who should attack them either in general or particular. This league was signed and sealed by all the Protestant princes, as well as by Anhalt and Gebhart, counts of Mansfeld; together with the deputies of Magdeburg, Bremen, Strasburg, Ulm, Constance, Landau, Memmingen, Kempten, Hailbron, Rotlingen, Bibrach, and Isna. Letters were writ to obtain the assent of George marquis of Brandenburg, and the city of Nuremberg, because their deputies had power only to hear, without coming to any conclusion upon the subject. A resolution was made to solicit the king of Denmark, the dukes of Pomerania and Mecklenburg, the cities of Hamburg, Embsen, Northheim, Frankfort, Brunswic, Gottingen, Minden, Hanover, Hildesheim, Lubec, Stetin, and the other maritime towns, to engage in their association. They afterwards expedited letters to the emperor, in which they declared the reasons that obliged them to provide for their mutual defence, and protested against that precipitate form of that pretended election of a king of the Romans, which, as they alleged, would not lawfully take place while the emperor himself continued in good health; and was, therefore contrary to the Caroline bull, and the rights and privileges of the empire <sup>o</sup>.

- a vancement was immediately sent to the Catholic princes and states of the empire, to whom the emperor wrote with his own hand, as well as to the Protestants of Smalcalde, who were commanded to acknowledge his brother Ferdinand as king of the Romans. But the elector of Saxony and his confederates paid no regard either to the emperor's order, or the intreaties of the other electors and princes, who endeavoured to reconcile them to his imperial majesty. On the contrary, they persevered in their plan; and, in order to provide against troublesome consequences, solicited the kings of France and England for succour and protection. Henry the eighth refused to espouse their cause, that he might not disoblige the court of Rome, from which he still expected the dissolution of his marriage with Catharine of Arragon, the emperor's aunt: while the king of France, without mentioning the article of religion, promised to favour them with his assistance, on pretence of maintaining the rights and privileges of the empire (E).

The Protestants apply for succour to the kings of France and England.

- In the beginning of January, the emperor set out for Ratisbon, and taking Meniz in his way, the archbishop earnestly intreated him to keep peace with the Protestants, until a council should be convoked. Charles having assured him of his inclination to prevent a rupture, he and the elector palatine sent deputies to the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse, inviting them to repair in the month of April to Schwinfort, where his majesty permitted them to assemble in order to effect an accommodation. At the same time, these mediators gave them to understand that the emperor expected and desired they would make no innovation, or publish any other writing about religion, except that which they had presented at the last diet of Augsburg; that things should remain upon the same footing until the meeting of a council; that, in the mean time, they should abstain from all communication with Zuinglians and Anabaptists, and avoid all sorts of disputes in matters of religion; that they should neither harbour nor protect the subjects of any prince or state, or give the least disturbance to the clergy in their ceremonies or jurisdictions, but peaceably submit to those decrees, which should be made by the emperor or the king of the Romans, for the advantage of the empire and the public good; and lastly, that they should renounce the confederacy of Smalcalde. The mediators added, that if the confederates would in these points conform to the intentions of the emperor, they had reason to believe he would forgive and forget all their past offences. Though these conditions could not be very agreeable to the elector of Saxony, who was at that time confined by sickness, he, nevertheless, sent his son John Frederic to Schwinfort, whither the duke of Lunenbourg and the prince of Anhalt also repaired, together with the deputies of other princes and cities; who, after much altercation, terminated the deliberations by a remonstrance, containing their demands; the principal of which were, that the emperor should command Ferdinand to lay aside the title and function of king of the Romans, and that rules should be established for regulating that election for the future. The mediating electors, though not a little surprised at this remonstrance, sent it immediately to the emperor at Ratisbon; but, in the mean time, perceiving the necessity of terminating these affairs in some shape, considering the progress of the Turk, who had made an irruption into Austria, they formed a plan of accommodation, importing, that the emperor should order a general peace to be proclaimed through all Germany; and that, without any regard to the decrees of Worms or Augsburg, both parties should be forbid, under severe penalties, to disturb or molest each other on the score of religion, until the states of the empire should have found means to determine that difference; that, for this purpose, a council should be convoked in six months, and orders given to the imperial chamber to suspend all sentences pronounced in religious causes, and to admit no new action against the protestants; while they, on their part, should yield all due obedience to the emperor, and assist him in his enterprizes against the Turk. This treaty was approved by seven protestant princes, and four and twenty cities; and the emperor afterwards ratified it in the diet of Ratisbon by an authentic act, orders being given to the tribunals of justice to see it executed according to the tenour.

TWO reasons induced the emperor to consent to this accommodation, namely, that the Protestants should, by these condescensions, be gradually engaged to approve of the election of his brother Ferdinand; and that their estates should contribute towards the expence of the war against the Turk; for by this time he had received advice, that the Othomans were in full march towards Stiria in vast numbers; that fifteen thousand horse were already advanced as far as Lintz, ravaging and laying waste the country; and that Solyman, in person, had crossed the Danube at Belgrade. But this treaty of accommodation, which was concluded with the Protestants, had produced such unanimity and vigour in the empire, that both sides armed as if through emulation; and Charles soon found himself at the head of an army consisting of a hundred and twenty thousand men. With these he advanced against the Turks; and the fate of two great empires would, in all probability, have been decided, had either he or Solyman dared to risque such an important stake on the issue of a battle. But at the approach of winter, the Turks retreated; and the emperor returned with such precipitation, that he did not even stay to expel John the pretended king of Hungary, who was far from being able to withstand his power. In a word, Charles seems to have had a diffused imagination, capable of conceiving vast designs, but he wanted fortitude to put them in execution (F).

AFTER the retreat of the Turks, the emperor disbanded a great part of his army, and in the month of October set out for Italy, from whence he wrote to the states of the empire, informing them of the important reasons which had obliged him to undertake that journey, his chief aim being to concert with the pope the necessary dispositions for convoking the council according to the determination at Ratisbon. He likewise observed, that, as he had left the administration of public affairs in the hands of his brother Ferdinand, king of the Romans, they might assure themselves that no mischief or disorder would happen, provided they would live in peace, and yield that obedience which was due to his brother's rank and station. This letter was dated at Mantua, from whence he repaired to Bologna, where he had a conference with pope Clement the seventh, touching religion and the council. There he likewise renewed for eighteen months the league with his holiness and the other princes of Italy, on pretence of consulting the general good, but in reality with a view of hindering the French from returning into Italy. This treaty was concluded, notwithstanding the intreaties and remonstrances of the ambassadors of France, whom the pope appeased by giving them privately to understand, that his sole view in renewing the league was to deliver Italy from the Spanish troops, which the emperor had sent thither in great numbers; but if they would exert their patience a little longer, they should have no cause to complain of his conduct. The emperor, being secure from this quarter, repaired in the spring to Genoa, where he embarked for Spain, whither he was called by the pressing affairs of that kingdom.

Soon after his departure, the pope dispatched into Germany Hugh Rangon, bishop of Regis, in quality of nuncio, with orders to join Lambert Briart, the emperor's ambassador, and accompany him to Weimar, on a visit to John Frederic, elector of Saxony, who had succeeded his father Frederic lately dead. Their errand was to signify to that young prince, the intention of their masters, and their eager desire to reconcile and re-unite, by gentle methods, two parties which were divided in point of religion. These ambassadors having represented to the elector, that the holding of a council would be the surest and the readiest method for effecting the re-union; the nuncio afterwards observed, that he was ordered by his holiness to deliberate with him about the manner, time, and place, in which it should be convoked; that he was directed to communicate to his highness some principal points of his instructions concerning the form and order of that council, and the means of rendering it free, independent, and such, in short, as the holy fathers, who were, doubtless, conducted by the spirit of God, had always judged it ought to be, in order to enforce the probability, ascribes it to the intrigues of the Venetians; who, being afraid of falling a sacrifice to the conqueror, found means by their emissaries at both courts, to inspire the two emperors with mutual fears of each other's power (1).

(F) Jovius and Istibucius, in his history of Hungary, assure us, that Solyman made this precipitate retreat by the persuasion of his general Ibrahim, bashaw, who had for some time carried on a secret correspondence with the emperor of Germany; while Belcarius, with more

- a observation of its decisions, without which authority all their trouble would be to no purpose. He added, that his holiness, after having long deliberated upon a proper place for holding this assembly, had concluded that none could be more convenient than Placentia, Bologna, or Mantua; that choice might be made of one of these cities, and order taken, that, in case any prince or princes should refuse to go or send thither, his holiness should, nevertheless, continue the conferences; and if any scruple should be made in obeying the decrees of that council, or in acknowledging his holiness for the sovereign pontiff, the church and the holy see should be protected against them by the emperor, and the other kings and princes of Christendom. He concluded with an assurance, that the pope would in six months convoke a council on these conditions; and the emperor's ambassador having confirmed all that the other said, intreated the elector to acquiesce in these proposals, in order to promote the peace and union of the empire<sup>y</sup>. The elector, having taken time to consider these proposals, answered, that he was well pleased to hear the emperor and pope had agreed to convoke a council: and that the emperor having promised that it should be such an one as was required for a free discussion of affairs, he did not doubt that he should be able to prevail upon his subjects to submit to its decrees; but as a good many other princes professed the same religion which his father had embraced, he could make no positive answer without their participation. He would, however, take the benefit of their advice in an assembly which would soon be held at Smalcalde, in order to deliberate maturely on this affair, and should think himself happy in contributing to the re-establishment of peace and union, not only in Germany but also through all Christendom: mean while, he hoped his imperial majesty would not be offended at the delay which he demanded. The ambassador assured him that the emperor would willingly grant his request; and, upon this assurance, the elector repaired to Smalcalde on the appointed day, where, having deliberated with his associates, the answer was conceived in these terms: they humbly thanked the emperor for his goodness in causing a council to be assembled, and hoped God would favour and conduct his laudable design, that truth might be maintained, false doctrine, abuse, and vicious ceremonies abolished, and the true worship of God, together with the practice of other Christian virtues, happily restored. They said, their sole view in demanding a council was to see the controversies equitably and formally decided, that those unhappy divisions might cease, which had been introduced under the pontificate of pope Leo; for that purpose, and that only, they desired a free council, where the authority of the pope should not prevail over that of the emperor, where truth should be distinguished from falsehood by the test of the holy scripture, and not according to tradition, or the induction and disputes of the schools; and where the question should be decided by learned, pious, and unsuspected men, conformable to the decrees of the empire. For the rest, they referred themselves to the emperor, to whom alone they owed respect and obedience, as to the supreme power, whom God had set over them, and begged the ambassador to present this answer to his imperial majesty, a task which he readily undertook<sup>z</sup> (G).

- e WHILE the affairs of religion remained in this situation, the landgrave of Hesse repaired to the court of France, to negotiate in behalf of Ulric duke of Wirtemberg, his near relation, who ten years before had been expelled from his dominions by the allied states of Suabia, on pretence of his having exercised diverse acts of oppression, and taken from them the imperial city of Rutlingen. The emperor, at their solicitation, had stripped the duke of all his territories, the investiture of which he bestowed upon his brother Ferdinand, king of the Romans, without having any regard to the solicitations that were made by several princes at the diet of Augsburg, in favour of the duke of Wirtemberg, whose punishment they thought far exceeded his crime. The landgrave, indeed, at that time, purposed to re-establish him by force; but, being disappointed of the assistance he had expected, was obliged to defer the design till another opportunity. He looked upon this juncture as the happy occasion, because the emperor was absent from his German dominions, and the term fixed for the duration of the Suabian confederacy well nigh expired. For the accomplishment of his design, he, in the name of duke Ulric, mortgaged the principality of Montbelliard to the king of France for a sum of money, on condition that it should be for ever united to the crown of France, provided the money should not be refunded in three years<sup>a</sup>. On these terms, Francis agreed to advance the supply, and even flattered him with the hope of an addition, the restitution of which he would never demand. In consequence of this agreement, the king of Frante and the landgrave levied considerable bodies of troops, which were in condition to march in the spring, and having joined their forces on the other side of the Rhine, they advanced into the country of Wirtemberg; and, in the neighbourhood of Lauffen, attacked twelve hundred imperialists, the greatest part of whom they took prisoners, together with the palatine Philip their general; so that all the cities and fortresses of the country of Wirtemberg immediately returned to the dominion of their former lord. Duke Ulric being thus restored, the elector of Mentz, and George duke of Saxony, who was the landgrave's father-in-law, renewed their endeavours to negotiate an accommodation between Ferdinand and the elector of Saxony; and a treaty was actually concluded, importing, that no violence should be committed, nor any proceedings at law carried on against any person whatever on account of religion; that the peace, which the emperor had published, should be carefully observed; that Ferdinand, in the emperor's name, should supersede all the suits that were instituted against the Protestants, among whom, however, the Anabaptists, Sacramentarians, and other sects, should not be reckoned; that the elector of Saxony and his allies should acknowledge Ferdinand as king of the Romans; that before all future elections, which should be made during the life of the emperor, the electors should assemble in order to examine the justice and expediency of the election; that if they found the motives fair and reasonable, they should proceed according to the law and forms prescribed in the golden bull; but if the motives should appear otherwise, all the steps taken towards the election should be declared null and void; that Ferdinand should prevail upon the emperor and other electors to agree to this treaty, which should be ratified in ten months by a decree or imperial constitution, otherwise the elector of Saxony and his allies should not be obliged to adhere to this accommodation; that, moreover, the emperor should confirm the elector of Saxony in all his ancient rights and patrimony, and approve of his contract of marriage with the daughter of the prince of Cleves. This pacification was followed by another, which determined the difference between Ferdinand on one side, and the landgrave of Hesse, with Ulric duke of Wirtemberg, on the other. In this affair, the elector of Saxony acted as mediator and plenipotentiary for his two friends; and after a long series of debates it was agreed, that Ulric should be confirmed in the possession of all his territories, on condition that he and his successor should hold the country of Wirtemberg in fief of the princes of Austria, to whom, failing heirs male, it should return, and then be held of the empire; that the duke should acknowledge Ferdinand as king of the Romans, against whom he should never enter into any compact or confederacy; that he and the landgrave should restore to the right owners all the effects they had seized during the war; that they should compel no person to change his religion, but leave the clergy to the free enjoyment of their possessions; that those, who had abandoned their habitations through fear or shame, should have leave to return or retire elsewhere, without let or molestation of their persons or effects; that Ferdinand should retain the cannon which belonged to the fortress of Asberg, and pay the debts which he had contracted in his own name; that Philip prince palatine, and the other prisoners of war, should be released without ransom; that the landgrave and duke Ulric should either go in person or send their ambassadors to ask pardon of Ferdinand, who, as prince of Austria, should put the duke in full possession of his duchy, and intercede with the emperor for his and the landgrave's pardon; that neither side should make any demand for the expences of the war; but that Ulric should supply Ferdinand with five hundred horse and three thousand fantassins, for the siege of Munster; that Ulric's duchess should enjoy the estate allotted for her jointure; and that this treaty should be ratified by the states, nobility, and people of the country <sup>b</sup> (H).

PETER PAUL VERGER, the pope's nuncio, had orders to signify to Ferdinand, the displeasure of his holiness at the accommodation he had made with the Lutheran princes, which he looked upon as very disadvantageous to the church: but the king of the Romans replied, that the conjuncture was such as obliged him to make that agreement, in order to avoid more dangerous commotions. At the same time, the landgrave sent an express into Spain, with a letter to the emperor, in which he asked pardon in his own and duke Ulric's name; and promised, that, for the future, they should always be obedient and faithful to him and the king of the Romans. To this message Charles replied, that he had already writ on that subject to his brother Ferdinand, and would again signify his sentiments, by the mouth of his ambassador, of whom they would learn his great clemency and passionate

- a desire for peace. Mean while, he exhorted them to justify their professions, by their conduct, and abstain, for the future, from all violent councils<sup>c</sup>.

IMMEDIATELY after this reconciliation, pope Clement the eighth dying, was succeeded in the papacy by Paul the third, of the house of Farnese, who adopting the politics of his predecessor, resolved with all his power to elude the convocation of a council. Nevertheless, he affected to be very zealous in this affair; and, in order to save appearances, sent Peter Paul Verger, his nuncio, to visit the princes, and flatter them with hopes of seeing their desire accomplished. He had likewise orders to propose to them the city of Mantua as a proper place for that assembly, and to found their sentiments on the subject, that by knowing their intention, he might afterwards prescribe such rules as he was sure they would not

- b embrace. His nuncio was, moreover, directed to animate all the princes of Germany against the king of England, who had renounced the supremacy of the pope; and to try if there was any hope of converting Luther and Melancthon. The nuncio, in order to acquit himself in this expedition, made a tour round almost all the princes, and in the way had a personal conference with Luther, upon whom he employed all his art and influence in vain (I). Finding all his endeavours ineffectual, he advised his master to assail that arch-heretic by writing; and the pope, in conformity with his advice, pitched upon certain cardinals and bishops, to the number of nine, to compose a formulary, or project for reforming the church<sup>d</sup>.

- c THE Protestants being, by this measure, made acquainted with the intentions of the pope, made use of that pretext for assembling at Smalcalde, though in reality their view was to renew their association, the term of which was well nigh expired. Accordingly a new alliance was made for ten years, comprehending not only those of the former association, but also all those who espoused the confession of Augsburg, and were willing to engage in the league (K).

- d To this assembly the kings of France and England sent ambassadors. William de Langey, lord of Bellay, the French envoy, went thither to acquit his master of the imputation thrown upon him by the Protestants, who charged him with having burnt some Lutherans at Paris. The ambassador, in his king's justification, represented that the sect of Sacramentarians, having spread itself even into France, his majesty had taken all imaginable precautions to check the progress of that heresy; which six of his subjects having, in contempt of his prohibition, publicly professed, and in order to gain converts, publicly affixed placades that were equally injurious to religion and government, so as to endanger an insurrection in the kingdom, they had been convicted of heresy and sedition, and legally condemned to the flames, which they had publicly suffered at Paris, during a general procession, and public prayers for the extirpation of such a damnable sect: but far from having inflicted that chastisement with a view to drive the Germans from his dominions, he assured them that his kingdom should always be an asylum, in which they would be as perfectly secure as the French themselves. He likewise gave them to understand, that the Grand Seignior had sent an ambassador to the king his master, in order to conclude a treaty of alliance, in which his most Christian majesty would not engage, until he should know the sentiments of the electors and other German princes on that subject; that the sultan had proposed very advantageous conditions, provided he would not intermeddle in the war of Hungary; but he had hitherto declined them, that the other kings and princes might have time and opportunity to be comprehended in the same peace, for he did not at all doubt that the Turk would turn his arms against more remote nations, provided he had proper assurances of remaining unmolested on the side of Christendom. The assembly was far from being satisfied with this apology for having burnt the Lutherans, and paid very little regard to his proposal touching an alliance with the Turk<sup>e</sup>.

- f THE English ambassador spoke another language, which they better understood. A year had now elapsed since Henry the eighth had, at the same time, divorced himself from his wife and the church of Rome: he, therefore, proposed that the princes should firmly unite against the authority of the pope, and promised to correspond with them in all the measures they should take for that purpose. They embraced this proposal with joy; but, in order to preserve appearances, they agreed upon the form of an answer to the pope's nuncio, touching the convocation of a council, though it contained nothing but what they had often repeated before. This union of the confederates, and the sanction which their success gave to all innovations in religion, produced abundance of disorder in the principal towns of Germany. Among others, Munster suffered almost to desolation, from the madness and fanaticism of the Anabaptists, who, under the conduct of one Bernard Rotman, excited a civil war among the citizens, expelled the magistrates and clergy, formed a new plan of government, in which polygamy was held lawful, and at length proceeded to such a degree of phrenzy and extravagance, as to choose for their king a Dutch taylor, whose name was John of Leyden; but this impostor, who pretended to have personal communication with God, did not long enjoy his dignity, which was supported by actions equally barbarous and absurd; for the city, after having been some time besieged by the bishop, who was authorised and reinforced by the states of the empire, was betrayed by one of the companions of this pretender, who facilitated the entrance of the besiegers; so that the place was taken by assault, after a very obstinate defence, during which the Anabaptists had suffered infinite fatigue and famine. Their mock king, together with his principal ministers, were carried about the country for some time, as spectacles to the rest of the people, and afterwards tortured to death at Munster, and hung in chains <sup>f</sup>.

(I) In this conference Luther assured Verger, that he was so well convinced of the truth of his own doctrine, that the nuncio and the pope himself would embrace his faith before he would abandon it; and indeed the nuncio afterwards separated himself from the Roman church (3).

(K) At this assembly were present, the elector of Saxony, the elector count palatine, Robert duke of Deux-ponts, Ulric duke of Wirtemberg, the princes of Pomerania, William count Nassau, together with the deputies from Frankfort, Augsburg, Kempten, Hanover, and some other cities (4).

SOME time before this event, Solyman had made some overtures of peace to pope Clement the eighth, the emperor, and his brother Ferdinand; but finding his advances treated with more coolness than he expected, he resolved to render himself more respectable by force of arms. With this view he deposed Himeral, who had commanded his fleet, and created Barbarossa his admiral in chief. This was a native of Mitylene, in the island of Lesbos, and the most formidable pirate who had ever appeared in those seas. His first expeditions against the Morea were successful; he spread the terror of his name over all the coast of Italy, and sailing towards Afric, took upon him the office of mediator between Muley Hassen and his brother Araxid, who contended for the kingdom of Tunis. But under this pretext he made himself master of the city, and all its dependencies, which he subjected to the dominion of the grand Turk <sup>g</sup>.

THE emperor Charles, dreading the storm that seemed ready to burst upon him from France, England, and the Protestant princes of the empire, who were far from being satisfied with his concessions, saw the necessity of arming for his defence; and that he might have a specious pretext for making a powerful armament, he undertook an expedition into Barbary, with a view to restore Muley Hassen, who had implored his protection, as well as to chastise the insolence of Barbarossa, who continually infested the coasts of his Sicilian dominions. He accordingly set sail from Spain in the month of April, with a powerful fleet, and his design was so well conducted, that in a little time he gained possession of the city and port of Tunis, together with the fortress of Goleta, set at liberty a great number of Christian slaves, defeated Barbarossa by sea and land, and restored Muley Hassen to his dominions, leaving, however, a strong garrison in the fortress, in order to keep that prince his dependant and tributary. Pope Paul had assisted him with several gallies, well equipped for this expedition, and had granted him a tenth of the effects of the clergy, in order to defray the expence of the war <sup>h</sup>.

FROM the prosecution of this war he was soon diverted by the conduct of the king of France, who, with an army of sixty thousand men, had entered Piedmont, to revenge himself upon the duke of Savoy, who had disobliged him, and afterwards to attempt the recovery of the duchy of Milan. Charles no sooner received this intimation, than he dispatched orders into Germany, and all his other dominions, for sending troops to oppose the French in Italy; while he himself repaired to Rome, where, in presence of the pope, the cardinals, and ambassadors from foreign princes, he made a very passionate harangue against the king of France, complaining, that notwithstanding the treaty of alliance, he had, from envy and inveterate rancour, interrupted the progress of his success against the common enemy, taking the advantage of his absence to invade his dominions; and concluded with saying, that, in order to avoid the effusion of Christian blood, he was content to decide the difference by single combat with the king of France, whom he accordingly defied, and who was wise enough to decline the proposal <sup>i</sup>.

HE likewise renewed his solicitations with his holiness for the convocation of a council; and the pope, who was perfectly well informed by his nuncio, that the Protestants would insist on its being held in some city of the empire, pretended he was extremely well disposed to gratify his desire; but pitched upon Mantua as the most convenient place for all parties concerned, and fixed the month of June of the ensuing year for the time of its meeting. These resolutions were perfectly agreeable to the views of Charles, who had two aims to accomplish in this council: one was to detain the pope in Italy, in case he should be dis-

- a posed to favour France; and the other, to make himself absolute through all Germany. Having thus, as he imagined, put the affair of religion on a right footing, he employed his whole attention on the war against France; and, contrary to the advice of his best officers, resolved to invade Provence in person. He accordingly traversed all Italy, and passed the Var with an army of fifty thousand men, commanded by Antonio de Leyva, his lieutenant-general; being followed by a fleet, commanded by Andrew Doria, which furnished him with provision and ammunition. These preparations, however, did not avail: for, instead of being received with open arms by the disaffected subjects of France, as he had expected, he found all the advantageous posts already occupied by the enemy, who did not think proper to risk a battle; so that the progress of his army being retarded, his design proved abortive, his forces were daily diminished by death, and he was obliged to send the remains of them into quarters; while he himself retired to Genoa, after having pillaged Aix, and made an unsuccessful attempt upon the city of Marseilles<sup>k</sup> (L).

- b WHILE he sojourned in that place, he was visited by Joachim de Pappenheim, Lewis de Bambach, and Claude Peuthinger, who, in quality of ambassadors from the Protestant princes, contradicted the false reports which had been raised, touching their alliance with the kings of France and England; and entreated him to leave in quiet those princes and states who had entered into their league since the last pacification at Nuremberg; as also to forbid the imperial chamber to proceed in any cause, or pass sentence against them. The ambassadors were favourably received by Charles; who assured them, that before his departure for Spain, which he was called by pressing affairs, he would send his answer to their principals by Hilde, his vice-chancellor, who should follow them with all convenient dispatch. In effect, that minister, having taken in his way Vienna, where he joined the pope's nuncio, who was then with king Ferdinand, executed his orders with such diligence, that both arrived at Smalcalde, while the Protestant princes were assembled together with Luther and the rest of the principal preachers. There they presented the pope's bull concerning the convocation of a council; which, being canvassed by the Lutheran divines, produced abundance of dispute both in public and private. At length they declared, that they would assent to no other than a free Christian council, at which every person should enjoy liberty of sentiment and speech; for which reason the pope should neither convoke nor preside at it, these being the prerogatives of the emperor and kings: nor should it assemble at Mantua, while there were towns in Germany altogether as commodious for that purpose. The nuncio and the vice-chancellor exerted all their endeavours in persuading the Protestants to comply with the directions contained in the bull; but finding all their eloquence ineffectual, had recourse to another expedient, addressing themselves to the Catholic princes, who, as a counter-balance to the confederacy of Smalcalde, entered into an association for eleven years, in order to defend themselves and their religion from all enemies, declaring the emperor and his brother Ferdinand chiefs of the league (M).

- c MEAN while, the pope considering the opposition at Smalcalde, deferred the opening of the council for some months, on pretence that the duke of Mantua wanted time to levy troops, and fortify his town for the public security. While the eyes of all Christendom were turned upon this council, the jealousy that prevailed between the emperor and the king of France, induced this last to mortify the other in a very sensible manner. Francis could never forgive the emperor for having compelled him, in the treaties of Madrid and Cambray, to renounce the sovereignty of Flanders and Artois: he now, therefore, ordered his parliament to carry on a process against Charles as his vassal, who, for his conduct on that occasion, was accused of felony, and summoned by heralds on the frontiers, to appear at a certain time and take his trial. The emperor, who was at that time in Spain, no sooner heard of this insult, and the march of the French towards those provinces, than he sent orders to his generals to assemble troops with all imaginable expedition, and repel force by force. Both armies had already taken the field, and the Imperialists began to have some advantage over the enemy; when Eleonora queen of France, and Mary queen of Hungary, interposed in order to mediate an accommodation, and procured a suspension of arms for six months, for the Low Countries only, the war still continuing in Piedmont, where the Imperialists took by assault the town of Cherasco, and put the garrison and citizens to the sword. But some time after, the inhabitants of Turin, being well nigh reduced to famine,

(M) The chief of those who entered into this association were the archbishops of Mentz and Salzburg, William and Lewis duke of Bavaria, George duke of Saxony, and Eric and Henry dukes of Brunswick (2).

and all the avenues of the city blocked up by the troops of the emperor, the king of France sent thither a powerful army with his son Henry, now become dauphin by the death of his elder brother (N) Francis, accompanied by Anne de Montmorency, marechal and afterwards constable of France, who opened the communication and relieved the place. Nevertheless, by the intercession of the pope and the Venetians, he agreed to a truce of three months for the countries on the other side the Alps, and that for the Low Countries was lengthened out to the same period<sup>1</sup>.

THE hands of Charles being tied up by this suspension of arms, he resolved to disturb France by all sorts of secret intrigues. Charles Egmont had put himself under the protection of his most Christian majesty, that he might be maintained in the possession of the duchy of Guelderland, which the emperor pretended was part of the succession of his father Philip. While the duke thought himself secure in the friendship of France, Charles, by his secret emissaries, spread such reports among his people, as made them believe their duke intended to subject them to the jurisdiction of France; and this notion produced a revolt, in consequence of which duke Charles was expelled from his dominions, and could scarce find a place of retreat, because the insurrection was powerfully patronized by the emperor<sup>m</sup>.

IN the mean time, the pope finding himself entangled in such affairs as did not at all favour the meeting of the council at the time prescribed in his bulls, he again deferred the convocation of that assembly; so that the Protestants had leisure to continue their negotiations, and to concert proper measures for preventing the ill effects of that council. With this view, the chiefs of their party assembled the following year at Brunswic, where they received into their alliance Christian king of Denmark, son of Frederic the second, and John marquis of Brandenburg; and, in order to give more weight to that assembly, these new allies personally appeared at their meeting. The pope, being very sensible that it would be impossible to procure a solid peace to the church of Rome, while the two greatest powers of Christendom were at variance, employed all his art and influence in laying the foundation of an agreement between the emperor and the king of France. He solicited each of these princes with all his might to consent to a personal interview in his presence; and having obtained his request by dint of unwearied importunity, Nice, which is a sea-port town on the Mediterranean, was the place fixed for the meeting of those two princes. Thither the pope repaired, being followed by the emperor, who came by sea with a powerful fleet, and the king of France, who came by land with a numerous army; but in spite of all the efforts of the pope, repeated in the course of a long negociation, he could not effect a peace, tho' they consented to a truce for ten years<sup>n</sup> (O).

and the king of France, together with the pope, arrive at Nice, and

AMONG other subjects of deliberation that occurred at this meeting, the progress of the Turks in Hungary was not forgotten. Ferdinand, king of the Romans, had been very unsuccessful against the infidels, who had forced his lines at Belgrade, and defeated one army, while another, destined to oppose their efforts in Dalmatia, met with the same fate<sup>o</sup>. How to stop their progress was now the question; and, after mature consideration, they saw nothing practicable until they should have first healed up the divisions in religion, so as that all the princes in Christendom might unite their forces against the common enemy. Charles promised to write to the princes of the empire on this subject, and actually sent circular letters, exhorting them to enter into the same sentiments, and unanimously concur for the general good; adding, that in order to accomplish this grand aim with the greater ease, he had invested the archbishop of Lunden, and Matthias Hilde, with full power to negotiate and accommodate with them all matters in dispute, according to the advice of his brother and council. Though Germany was now divided into two parties of Catholics and Protestants, this difference had not mutually inspired them with hatred and aversion to each other: on the contrary, both sides expressed the utmost eagerness and zeal for a re-union. With this view a general assembly was held at Franckfort, where after long debates it decreed, that the emperor should grant a truce for fifteen months to all the Protestants with-

(N) Francis, dauphin of France, died in the nineteenth year of his age, not without suspicion of poison; which he is said to have received from the hands of count Sebastian Montecuculi, a native of Ferrara, who, being put to the torture, confessed the crime, which, he said, he had been engaged to commit by the ministers of the emperor. But the Germans pretend, that it was administered at the instigation of Katharine of Medicis, who could have no chance of seeing herself queen of

(O) These two princes never once saw one another while they tarried at Nice; a piece of policy or precaution which was owing to the management of the pope, who had private designs of his own to execute upon both, which might have miscarried, had they ever come to personal communication (4).

- a out exception, that they might have time to inform themselves, by means of conferences, touching the contested points of religion; that the pacification of Nuremberg, and the emperor's edict at Ratisbon should be ratified; that although the differences in religion were not settled during this truce, the peace should not be violated until the next diet; that, in the mean time, the emperor should suspend all processses and proscriptions issued against the Protestants on account of religion, by the imperial chamber, and all actions whatever on that score should be annulled; that justice should be impartially administered without respect of persons, or distinction of religion; that during the truce the Protestants should admit no other power into their confederacy, but allow the clergy to receive the rents of the lands which were absolutely in their possession; that, under the permission and auspices of
- b the emperor, a day should be fixed for a conference at Nuremberg, between Catholics and Protestants, and learned persons chosen, of a mild and pacific disposition, for managing the dispute; that the emperor and king Ferdinand should be at liberty to send ambassadors to these conferences; that every decision should be reported to the absent states, which, if they approved, the emperor's ambassador should be obliged to subscribe, and the emperor to ratify it at the ensuing diet; that both parties should abstain from preparations of war, or at least declare the subject of such preparations, as this truce was not supposed to interdict any person from defending himself, according to his privilege in the empire; that this treaty should not comprehend the Anabaptists and other sectaries, who professed a doctrine contrary to the confession of Augsburg; finally, that the Protestants should hold in readiness their succours against the Turk, and send their ambassadors and deputies to Worms, at a certain day appointed by the emperor, to concert with the electors, and other princes and states, proper measures for supporting the war against the common enemy <sup>p</sup>.
- c

ABOUT this time, the emperor, who, since the conference at Nice, had still resided in Spain, was informed by the king of France, that the inhabitants of Ghent had revolted, on pretence of defending their liberties, and proposed to put themselves under his protection: an instance of integrity never enough to be commended in Francis, who chose to forfeit the extraordinary advantages which he might have gained on this occasion, rather than fully his honour by a breach of the truce which he had concluded with Charles. The emperor, alarmed at this intimation, resolved to set out immediately for Flanders; and, that he might take the shortest and easiest way, ventured to pass through France, relying on the assurance of Francis, who engaged his word for his security <sup>q</sup>. He accordingly took the road, accompanied by a slender retinue, and was met on the frontiers by the constable Montmorency, Henry the dauphin, and Charles duke of Orleans, the king's sons, who offered to go and remain in Spain as hostages for his safety. This generous proffer he refused with due acknowledgement; and they attended him through all the fairest cities of the kingdom, where he was treated with equal cordiality and splendor. At Loches in Berry, he was received by the king in person, who accompanied him through Orleans to Paris, which he entered on the first day of the new year, walking between the two sons of France, and preceded by the constable with the naked sword in his hand. Cardinal Farnese, the pope's legate, and the archbishop of Paris waited for him in the great church; and nothing was omitted which could contribute to honour, divert, and entertain him, during the seven days which he spent in that capital. At his departure from Paris, he was again convoyed by the king to St. Quintin; but the two princes his sons proceeded with him as far as Valenciennes, the first town of the Low-Countries. Charmed with the polite treatment he had received, and the honours which had been paid to him in France, Charles, by way of gratitude, promised to bestow upon the king or the dauphin, the investiture of the duchy of Milan, and Francis actually expected this mark of his friendship, though he would not execute his promise until his arrival in his own dominions, and at last eluded it in such a manner as did very little credit to his generosity <sup>r</sup>. The people murmured loudly at this evasion of the emperor, and did not scruple to say, the king had been a dupe to his dissimulation, observing that Francis ought to have retorted the usage he had received from Charles at Madrid, and made his own terms while he had his rival in his power (P).

burghers were executed as chiefs of the sedition, a much greater number banished, all the public edifices confiscated, the town deprived of its artillery, arms, and privileges, and sentenced to pay a fine of one million two hundred thousand crowns; and, as a check upon the mutinous disposition of the people, he ordered a citadel to be built, and manned with a very strong garrison. While he tarried in Flanders, he was visited by the envoys of the Protestant princes, who, together with king Ferdinand his brother, went thither to solicit him on the subject of the assembly at Frankfort, which the Protestants complained had been in sundry ways infringed or unperformed, to their detriment and disadvantage: they, therefore, besought him to shut his ears against the calumnies of their foes, who had represented them as restless and disaffected; to interpose his authority for putting a stop to the processes which had been instituted against them, contrary to the articles of the truce; and to give directions for a conference, in which the difference in point of religion might be amicably discussed. The emperor was not a little embarrassed on this occasion; because the pope had not approved of the proceedings at Frankfort, and now opposed the ratification which they demanded. Nevertheless, preferring his own interest and the public repose to every other consideration, he, after some delay, complied with their request, in confirming the result; being resolved, as far as in him lay, to maintain union among the members of the empire, and to facilitate the means of bringing all religious disputes to some happy determination. For this purpose, he appointed an assembly at Haguenau; but finding it impracticable to determine the contest touching the restitution of the effects of the clergy which were possessed by Protestants, and reclaimed by the Catholics, it was referred to a diet, which was to be held at Worms in the month of October ensuing. Here, likewise, the affair was argued, without being brought to any conclusion; so that the emperor was fain to convoke another, which was opened at Ratisbon in the month of April; and in which were present the emperor, and cardinal Gaspar Contarini in behalf of the pope. Charles, after having made a proposal tending to a general pacification, and in particular to quiet that discord which had sprung from a religious source, agreed with the Protestants to refer the whole affair to a conference, which should be managed by three doctors on each side, under the authority of two presidents, namely, Frederic count palatine of the Rhine, and Nicholas Granvel, the emperor's prime minister (Q).

ACCORDINGLY, this conference began towards the end of April; but in five or six articles only could they agree, the rest the emperor thought proper to remit to the decision of a general or national council, or rather to the judgment of another diet. The legate Contarini opposed this resolution; and demanded with great warmth, that the whole affair should be submitted to the pope or general council, alleging, that neither a national council, nor a diet, could judge decisively on articles of faith. No respect, however, was had to this remonstrance, though the people were prohibited, under severe penalties, to ruin or seize the effects of the church, to make any innovation, or seduce any person from the antient religion; while, at the same time, the clergy were strictly enjoined to reform their manners, and live, for the future, with more regularity and discipline. But these decrees were no other than an outward pretext; for at bottom the emperor's design was to conciliate the affections of the Protestants, lest they should throw themselves under the protection of Francis, which, he knew, they had already solicited. He therefore, in private, granted them letters patent, by which they were indulged with liberty of conscience: the decree of the diet was softened in their favour; he permitted them to receive those who desired to be of their communion; he suspended the last edict of Augsburg, and all the preceding decrees which had been issued against them; and lastly, ordered the imperial chamber at Spire to administer justice to them, without making any difference on the score of religion; so that by these means the Protestants were entirely detached from the interest of France.

CHARLES took the same opportunity to put the duke of Cleves to the ban of the empire, because he had retired to the king of France, whose protection he craved, that he might be maintained in the possession of the duchy of Guelderland, devolved to him by the death of William of Cleves, to whom it had been ceded by Charles Egmont the last duke, without the concurrence of the emperor, and to the prejudice of his claim derived from his grand-mother Mary of Burgundy. He likewise gave orders for re-establishing the duke of Savoy in his dominions, prohibited all Germans from engaging in the service of France, and dismissed the assembly, after having exhorted all the states to contribute to the necessary measures for opposing the Turk. Affairs were dispatched in this manner, because a he would not lose the season for passing into Italy, where he proposed to embark on board the fleet he had prepared, for the execution of his design against Algiers. He accordingly set sail for the coast of Barbary, where he landed and began the siege of that place; but he was obliged to abandon the enterprize, on account of the tempestuous weather, by which he lost one hundred ships and fifteen galleys, so that he was fain to raise the siege, and return to Spain with the wreck of his army, which from four and twenty was reduced to ten thousand men <sup>y</sup> (R).

The emperor undertakes another expedition to Barbary, which proves unfortunate.

NOR was king Ferdinand more fortunate in his attempts upon Hungary. After the death of John, he had marched to besiege the city of Buda, hoping to profit by the minority of the young king Stephen, who was there shut up under the tuition of his mother. But Sultan Solyman, whose assistance was implored by that princess and the other tutors of her son, ordered a considerable body of troops to march to their relief, and following in person at the head of another formidable army, a battle ensued, in which Ferdinand was totally defeated, and in consequence of which the city of Buda, together with the young king, and his mother the queen dowager, fell into the hands of Solyman, who had come thither under pretence of protecting them <sup>z</sup>.

FROM this misfortune, the emperor took occasion to convoke a diet at Spire, where king Ferdinand, who presided, obtained of the states a supply of men and money, proportioned to that which the hereditary provinces had granted, on condition that it should be employed against the common enemy, of Christendom. The pope's nuncio being present at the diet, offered a reinforcement of the same kind in the name of his holiness; and as all the princes who composed that assembly generously expressed an unanimous resolution to embark in the general cause, notwithstanding the intrigues of the French ambassador, who endeavoured to disunite them, the nuncio, in order to confirm the good intentions of the Protestants, gave them to understand that the pope, in consideration of that spirit which they expressed against the infidels, would comply with the request which they had so often made to have a council in some city of the empire; and that he had chosen Trent as the most commodious place for them and all the other nations concerned in the convocation. In conformity with this promise, he actually summoned a council to meet in the city of Trent, on the first of November, and sent an intimation of his design to the emperor and king d of France, whom he invited to assist in person at the assembly, or at least to send thither their ambassadors, archbishops, bishops, abbots, and other ecclesiastics <sup>a</sup>.

DURING these transactions, Francis the first, who could not digest the affront which he pretended to have received from the emperor, whose Spanish subjects had assassinated Anthony de Rinçon, and Cesar Fregosa, his ambassadors to Venice and Constantinople, resolved to be revenged on Charles, who had refused satisfaction on that head; and, taking the advantage of his operations in concert with the pope and the princes of the empire against the Turk, attacked his dominions in five different parts, namely, Brabant, Luxemburg, Artois, Piedmont, and Roussillon; but the emperor had taken such precautions for the defence of these places, that the king of France acquired no advantage from the war <sup>b</sup>, which, on the contrary, prejudiced him in the opinions of the German princes, who now firmly believed that his enterprize was solely undertaken with a view to make a diversion in favour of the infidels; and they were more exasperated against him, by the certain accounts they received, importing, that the Turks were employed in making extraordinary preparations for extending their conquests in Hungary and Moravia.

A. D. 1542. The king of France declares war against the emperor, and attacks his dominions in five different places.

IN consequence of this information, Ferdinand, in the beginning of the year, assembled the princes at Nuremberg, where he found no difficulty in prevailing upon them to comply with his measures; when among other things it was determined, that they should fortify themselves as well as they could on the side of the Turks, and that the emperor should be intreated to return to Germany, in order to oppose the French and the duke of Cleves, who had brought them thither (S). The emperor was no sooner apprised of this resolution, than he began to prepare for his departure from Spain; and foreseeing the length of his voyage, and his absence, he nominated his son Philip king of Spain, and put the administration of affairs into his hands, after he had seen him married to the infanta Mary, a daughter of John king of Portugal. In a few days after these nuptials, he embarked on board a powerful fleet, in which he arrived at Genoa, from whence he wrote letters to the elector of Saxony, the landgrave of Hesse, and the other confederates, exhorting them to contribute their assistance towards the war against the Turk, and at the same time issued orders for assembling a diet at Spire. Then he had an interview with the pope, whom he pressed to declare war against the king of France; but his holiness eluded these intreaties, and in his turn solicited him to restore Parma and Placentia to the holy see, and to invest his grandson Ottavio Farnese with the duchy of Milan, seeing the Italian powers would never consent that he should retain it for himself<sup>d</sup>. To this proposal, however, Charles lent a deaf ear; and setting out for Germany arrived at Spire, from whence he repaired to Bonn, in order b to oppose the progress of the duke of Cleves. There, having assembled his army, he marched directly to Duren, in the county of Juliers, and on the twenty-third day of August, summoned the town to surrender, threatening to declare war against them should they refuse to comply with his demand. The garrison having returned a contemptuous answer and defiance, he invested the town with the Spanish troops, and he carried on the attacks with such vigour, that the place was taken by assault, a great number of men being killed on both sides. This success spread such a terror in the neighbourhood, that the towns of Juliers, Ruremonde, and Venlo surrendered without resistance. The duke of Cleves, finding himself so hotly pursued, repaired to this last place, accompanied by Henry duke of Brunswick, and the ambassadors of the elector of Cologne, by whose intercession his affairs were c so happily negotiated, that the emperor pardoned him on these conditions: that he should adhere to the Roman Catholic church; and in case any change should happen in his country, reduce every thing to its pristine state: that he should swear fealty to the emperor, king Ferdinand, and the empire; renounce the alliance of France and Denmark; engage in no league that should not comprehend the emperor, king Ferdinand, and their heirs; and that he should yield up Guelderland, and assist the emperor in reducing the towns of that duchy, which should refuse to submit. In consideration of these concessions, Charles restored to him the duchy of Juliers, except the cities of Heinsberg and Sittard, which he proposed to keep for some time as pledges of the duke's fidelity<sup>e</sup>.

The emperor marches to Duren, which is taken by assault.

Francis, reduces Luxemburg.

A. D. 1544. Charles presides at the diet, and is favourable to the Protestants.

THIS treaty was concluded without the participation of Francis the first, who was actually on his march with a strong body of forces to support the duke; but hearing by the way of this accommodation, he discharged his resentment upon the city of Luxemburg, which, for the second time, he reduced to his obedience. Mean while, the Imperialists having received a reinforcement of troops from Henry king of England, with whom the emperor had concluded a new alliance, they attacked Landrecy in the Low Countries; and as soon as the emperor understood it was invested, he marched thither with the rest of his army, after having settled the affairs of Guelderland. At the same time, the king of France took the same rout with all his forces, and a general battle was expected; but Francis, having supplied the town with succours and all sorts of warlike ammunition, retired without fighting; and the emperor, being hindered by the winter from continuing the siege, or undertaking any other enterprize, returned to Germany, in order to preside at the diet which he had convoked<sup>f</sup>. At this assembly, which was held at Spire, the subjects of deliberation were the complaints of the Protestants, and the war against France and the infidels. The states having duly considered these points, unanimously agreed to accommodate the emperor with double subsidies; and, concluding that the war against the Turks would be carried on with greater advantage and security, provided they could compel France to sue for peace, they resolved to make a strong effort for that purpose, and consented to furnish six Roman months for defraying the expence of levying four thousand cavalry, and four and twenty thousand infantry; as well as to enable king Ferdinand to provide for the places on the frontiers of Turkey. With regard to future wars which should be carried on against the Ottomans, it was decreed, that every person, without exception, should contribute according to his ability. Severe penalties were likewise ordained against those who should engage in the service of foreign princes, particularly of the king of France; and orders were given to the magistrates to proceed against such delinquents with all the rigour of the law. As for the affair of religion, a decree was made, suspending the execution of the edict of Augsburg, and securing all persons from being molested on account of their persuasion, every dispute on that subject being referred to the decision of the ensuing diet, until a free, general, or national council could be held in Germany. It was also agreed, that each party should enjoy their present possessions; and that on the re-election of the judges of the imperial chamber, a like number should be chosen of each religion. This decree

- a was very agreeable to the Protestants, and had such an influence upon the elector of Saxony in particular, that he entered into a particular treaty with the emperor; by which, for the first time, he acknowledged Ferdinand as king of the Romans; and Charles, on his part, approved and ratified the mutual hereditary compact between the families of Saxony and Cleves; specifying, that if the duke of Cleves should die without heirs male, the elector of Saxony and his heirs male should succeed to his dominions. In order to strengthen this new tie between the houses of Austria and Saxony, king Ferdinand, with the emperor's consent, promised to bestow in marriage his daughter Eleonora upon the elector's eldest son, provided the reconciliation in point of religion should take place, before the princess should have attained to an age requisite for the consummation of the nuptials. This last article
- b was communicated to very few; and kept so secret on both sides, as to escape the knowledge of the landgrave and all his allies<sup>e</sup>.

THIS decree concerning religion was not more agreeable to the Protestants than mortifying to the Roman Catholics; who, with difficulty, were prevailed upon to give their assent, in consequence of the intreaties of Charles, who assured them, that what he had done was from an apprehension of being obliged to make a more disagreeable compliance, by the majority of suffrages on the Protestant side; and that as the affair was referred to the decision of another diet, future measures might be taken in favour of the Catholics.

- THESE regulations being made, the emperor set out from Spire, in order to execute the design which they had formed against France, in concert with the king of England.
- c These two princes had laid the scheme of attacking that kingdom at the same time, and of appearing before Paris at an appointed day, in order to join their forces, sack the city, and ravage the country as far as the river Loire. As all the necessary preparations had been made for an expedition of this sort, it would, in all probability, have succeeded, had not the English amused themselves in the siege of Boulogne, which they resolved to take before they proceeded farther. The emperor, taking this opportunity of retrieving what he had lost in Luxemburg, and of revenging the affront he had received in the defeat of the marquis of Guaſte, at the battle of Cerifolles (T), advanced towards Metz, where, having assembled his army, he undertook the siege of the city of Luxemburg, which surrendered to him about the end of May. He likewise made himself master of Ligny in the province of Barre,
- d and St. Dizier, from whence he advanced, by the way of Chalons, as far as Chateau-Thierry. This rapidity produced such consternation in Paris, that all those who had means to retire, even the very students, deserted the place, and Francis, finding himself so suddenly saddled with two such powerful enemies, was advised to send proposals of peace to the emperor. He accordingly dispatched ambassadors on that errand, who finding Charles disgusted at the English, who, instead of joining him according to their promise, had spent the time in taking places on the frontiers of Picardy; they managed his chagrin with such dexterity, that he at length condescended to treat with the king of France without any regard to his ally; and upon the seventeenth of September a peace was concluded at Crepy on these conditions: All that has been taken on either side, since the truce, shall be restored;
- e the duke of Lorraine shall keep possession of the town of Stenay, under the protection of the province of Luxemburg; the emperor and the king shall employ their joint endeavours and strength in re-establishing the ancient religion and concord in the church; the king shall furnish six thousand cuirassiers, and ten thousand foot for the war against the Turk; he shall renounce all his pretensions to Arragon, Flanders, and the kingdom of Naples, Artois, and Guelderland; the emperor on his part shall quit his claim to the Boulonnois, Peronne, and the other towns situated upon the Somme, as well as to Lower Burgundy and the Maconnois; he shall give his eldest daughter Mary, or his niece, the daughter of his brother Ferdinand, in marriage to Charles duke of Orleans, the king's son, and in four months declare which of the two he will bestow; if his daughter, he shall settle upon her, by way
- f of dowry, the country of Brabant, Guelderland, Luxemburg and Limburg, Flanders, Holland, Friezeland, Hainault, Artois, Namur, Utrecht, and all the other countries on that side, as well as Upper Burgundy, called Franche Comté, to be enjoyed by her after his death. In consideration of which settlement, the king shall, on his side, for himself and his children renounce all right to the Milanese; and if the emperor's daughter shall die without children, the duke of Orleans shall restore all these countries, reserving his right upon the Milanese, in like manner as the emperor shall retain his claim to Burgundy: if the daughter of

(T) This battle was fought between Francis count Enguien, third son of Charles I. duke of Vendome, and the marquis of Guaſte, general of the imperial army, who was totally defeated, with the loss of ten thousand men, all his artillery and baggage. By this victory the French became masters of the town of Carignan, and all Montferrat (1).

Ferdinand be pitched upon, she shall have in dower the principality of Milan; and the marriage with one or the other of these princesses shall be consummated within the year; the king shall reinstate the duke of Savoy in all his dominions, and keep possession of Hesdin, until it shall be otherwise determined; and lastly, the emperor shall interpose his good offices for promoting a peace between France and England<sup>b</sup>.

THIS treaty being signed and ratified on both sides, contrary to the opinion of almost all the world, Charles returned from Soissons to Brabant, and sent his Spanish troops into winter-quarters in Lorraine and the neighbouring countries. But thinking the peace he had concluded not firmly cemented, while France was at war with the king of England, his ally, he prevailed upon the two kings to send their ambassadors to Bruges, where, with his own, and the deputies of the Protestant princes of Germany, conferences were begun in order to effect an accommodation between England and France; but, at that time, all their endeavours proved abortive<sup>i</sup>.

convoked at Worms.
A. D. 1555.

The Protestants refuse to refer themselves to the council of Trent.

THE pope, who waited for nothing but the accommodation of the emperor, and the king of France, in order to promote the holding of the council, which hitherto had been hindered by the wars, now issued bulls for a convocation in the month of March in the following year, while the emperor issued orders for assembling a diet at Worms, on the fourth of the same month, though he could not reach that place till the month of May, so much was he incommoded by the gout. The design of this meeting was to concert measures for quieting the troubles of religion, to re-establish justice and peace through the empire, and provide for the support of the war against the infidels. But the Protestants, having declared that they could not refer themselves to the council of Trent, and insisting upon that point's being discussed before they proceeded to any other, the emperor broke up the diet, and referred the affair to another meeting at Ratisbon, where he invited all the states and princes to appear in the month of January.

WHILE every circumstance seemed to promote discord, a war was actually begun by the ravages of Henry of Brunswick, a man of a turbulent disposition and infamous life, who had obtained a great sum of money from the king of France, on pretence of raising soldiers in Germany against the English; for whom Frederic Reiffenberg was actually employed in levying troops in Saxony. But Henry having received the money, and privately assembled a good body of forces, instead of performing his promise to Francis, he turned his arms against the Protestants. Though he was commanded by the emperor to desist, and submit to the laws of his country, he made an assault upon the city of Rottenburg; from whence being repulsed he laid waste all the Lower Saxony, and threatened destruction to the maritime towns, unless they would renounce the confederacy of Smalcalde. From this circumstance the Protestants began to suspect that the emperor connived at his proceedings, that he might take the advantage of his success against them; and in order to check his progress, they assembled an army, the command of which was given to Philip landgrave of Hesse, who, after some successful skirmishes, and fruitless negotiations of peace, compelled him to surrender at discretion. The emperor, who was then at Bruges, being informed of this event, wrote a letter to the landgrave, wherein he endeavoured to extenuate the guilt of Henry, whom he desired him to release, according to the generous custom of their ancestors. He likewise ordered him to dismiss his troops, as the danger was now over; and if he had cause of complaint against any person for having assisted Henry in his excesses, he should have recourse to the determination of the law. This mildness in favour of a public disturber of their peace did not serve to extinguish the suspicion of the Protestants, which was soon after confirmed by his behaviour on another occasion; for instead of carrying on the war against the infidels, with the supplies that had been granted for that purpose, he sent Gerard Feldwig to Constantinople, who, in the name of Ferdinand, concluded a truce with the Turk<sup>k</sup>.

A. D. 1456.

They prolong their confederacy, and prepare for war.

THE prorogation of the diet gave great umbrage to the Protestants, who expected that the emperor, in treating the article of religion, would have put a stop to the processes, which the imperial chamber had renewed against them, on account of the church-lands they possessed; and they began to credit the advices they had received from different quarters, informing them that the emperor and king Ferdinand wanted to amuse them with false hopes, until they should have preparations for attacking and oppressing them by open war<sup>l</sup>. They resolved, therefore, to assemble at Frankfort, in order to deliberate upon the means of defending themselves from the executions of the imperial chamber, and the other misfortunes with which they were threatened. After having weighed these matters with due attention, they determined to prolong their confederacy, and prepare for war; and understanding that Frederic the second, successor to his brother Lewis, elector palatine, had invited Protestant ministers to preach in his capital city of Heidelberg, they sent a mes-

- <sup>a</sup> senger to him with congratulations upon his conversion <sup>m</sup>: but the joy of this happy event was in a few days moderated, by an account they received of Luther's death. During the council of Trent, which was opened at the time appointed by the pope's last bull for that purpose, Luther had been invited by the counts of Mansfeldt to determine a difference, which had happened among them, touching the limits of their territories. Though he had never been used to meddle in such affairs, his whole time having been dedicated to his studies, yet as he was born at Eisleben, a town depending upon the counts of Mansfeldt, he could not refuse that service to his native country, and accordingly, with the consent of the elector of Saxony, went thither, and was met by Justus Jonas and Melancthon, who were chosen as the other two arbiters of the dispute. But his endeavours were at that time unsuccessful in determining the difference, in which new difficulties daily occurred: however, at the earnest request of the counts, he returned a second time to the same place, accompanied by Justus Jonas, bishop of Hall, and met with a very splendid reception from the counts. His health had been for some time impaired by the vexation and chagrin, which he suffered from his difference with Zuinglius (U), and the decisions of Melancthon on these disputes. Nevertheless, he used his endeavours for settling the affair in dispute, and sometimes preached in the church, where he likewise administered the sacrament. At length he was seized with an oppression of the breast, of which he died without any marks of pain or anxiety, at the age of sixty-two. The counts of Mansfeldt earnestly desired that he might be buried in their territories, where he had first seen the light, and where it was his fortune to give up the ghost; but, by order of the elector of Saxony, his body was conveyed to Wurtemberg, and there interred with great funeral pomp <sup>n</sup>.

The death of Luther.

- MEAN while the infirmities of the emperor, which daily increased, having hindered him from being present at the diet of Ratisbon on the appointed day, it was not opened till six months after, when, perceiving that the greatest part of the Protestant princes had neglected to appear in person, and even to send deputies, and that his hopes of terminating the differences in religion were baffled, as the confederates of Smalcalde had paid no regard to the council, which had for some time been opened at Trent, the emperor in full diet bitterly reproached them for their insolence and obstinacy, and did not scruple to declare, that for the future he would make use of his power and authority for bringing them to reason. Having foreseen that things would come to this extremity, he had sent the cardinal of Trent to Rome, in order to conclude a league with the pope, which was accordingly signed on the twenty-sixth of the same month. By this treaty it was agreed, that the pope should furnish the emperor with twelve thousand Italian foot soldiers, five hundred horse, and two hundred thousand golden crowns to be deposited at Venice: that Charles should for one year, levy in the pope's name one-half of the church revenues through all Spain, and even be at liberty to mortgage the income of monasteries in that kingdom, to the amount of five hundred thousand golden crowns, for the expence of the war, on condition that he should give security for repayment out of his own estates, because the expedient was without example; that they should, with all their force, oppose every person who should pretend to thwart their enterprize, and reciprocally assist each other during the continuance of the war, and even for six months after it should be at an end; and lastly, that every prince and state should be admitted into the league, upon condition of participating of the gain and expence of the undertaking. This confederacy between the emperor and the pope acted as a caution upon other princes to be upon their guard, and produced a peace between France and England, which was concluded at the same time <sup>o</sup>.

The emperor concludes a treaty with the pope against the Protestants.

- Now that a rupture was inevitable, the emperor published a manifesto, in which he declared, that he did not take up arms on the score of religion; but was obliged to proceed to that extremity by the rebellion of certain people, who contemned the decrees of the diets, assembled without order, excited foreign powers against him, pillaged the princes of the empire, and, by a constant exercise of violence and oppression, endeavoured to destroy the freedom and security of the public. This manifesto was answered by the Protestants, whose chiefs were John Frederic elector of Saxony, and Philip landgrave of Hesse, who affirmed, that notwithstanding the emperor's declaration, he had undertaken the war with a view to tyrannize over the consciences of men; and to convince him, that they would not be tamely oppressed, they, in a little time, assembled an army, consisting of eighty thousand foot and ten thousand horse, with an hundred and thirty pieces of cannon.

(1) Melch. Adam. in vita Theo. Germ.

The landgrave of Hesse takes the field; and is, together with John Frederic elector of Saxony, put to the ban of the empire.

THE emperor had used his endeavours to assemble his troops privately, in order to attack the allies of Smalcalde before they should be in a posture of defence; but he was disappointed by the vigilance of the landgrave, who had taken the field with his army, after having sent prince William, his eldest son, who was then in the sixteenth year of his age, into the city of Strasburg, which was well fortified for his security. Mean while, Charles put John Frederic elector of Saxony, and Philip landgrave of Hesse, to the ban of the empire, declaring them perturbators of the public peace, violators of the faith, transgressors of the law, and usurpers of church-lands, and whole provinces, taxing them, at the same time, with having made use of the specious names of religion, peace, and liberty, in order to seduce their fellow-subjects from their duty to their country, and their allegiance to their emperor. He sent this declaration to Maurice duke of Saxony, and his brother Augustus, the elector's cousins, together with the reasons that obliged him to proscribe their kinsman; and, in order to engage these noblemen in his interest, and to persuade the world that it was not a religious war, he promised the electorate to Maurice, although he was a Lutheran. At the same time he ordered his troops to march into the territories of the elector, though they were not yet equal to those of the confederates either in number or munitions of war; and after having placed a strong garrison in Ratisbon, he took the field, and occupied an advantageous post, upon the river Izer, between Landshut and the camp of the landgrave. There he was joined by the troops of the pope, amounting to ten thousand foot and five hundred horse; and soon after, he received another reinforcement of six thousand veteran Spaniards from Naples and Milan; so that his army being augmented to five and forty thousand choice men, he was in a condition to quit his camp, and act against the confederates. While he kept this post, which was in the dominions of the elector of Bavaria, a difference arose between the landgrave of Hesse and the elector of Saxony; this last having proposed to attack the emperor, before he should be reinforced, and the former objecting to that expedient, as an insult and injury offered to the elector of Bavaria, whom they looked upon as a well-wisher to their cause. At length, however, they wrote a letter to that prince, explaining their grievances, and intreating him to compel Charles to evacuate Ingolstadt and Rain. In answer to this request, he gave them to understand, that as he was not strong enough to oppose the Imperialists, he must be excused from attempting an enterprize that would be productive of his own ruin; and that he hoped, he should not on this account be considered as an enemy by the confederates.

The Protestant army marches towards Ratisbon.

Charles takes the route to Ingolstadt.

IN consequence of this ambiguous answer, they resolved to undertake the siege of Ratisbon, in which there was an imperial garrison, and to occupy an advantageous place, where they might fight the emperor in case he should come to the relief of the city. Charles having by this time assembled all his forces, except those that were expected from Lower Germany, under the command of the count de Buren, put his army in motion; and the Protestants suspecting that his design was to invade Misnia and Saxony, immediately built bridges and crossed the Danube; but afterwards understanding that he took the route to Ingolstadt, they regained that river by another road, in order to prevent him from taking possession of Newburg and Donawert, and opening a passage into the country of Wirtemberg. Finding the emperor encamped at Ingolstadt, they drew up their army in order of battle, and had they attacked his camp, in all probability, that day would have put an end to the war; but after some inconsiderable skirmishes they withdrew their forces, and next day he was too well fortified to dread their attempts. After having trifled away some days, during which the emperor kept himself intrenched, they decamped with a view to hinder his junction with the count de Buren, who being, by a special messenger from Charles, informed of their design, eluded them by changing his route, and safely arrived in the imperial camp. Thus reinforced, the emperor marched to Newburg, which was surrendered to him without opposition: then he moved to Marxheim, from whence he set out for Donawert; but for the convenience of the situation, turned to the right, and encamped at Mobeim. In this march the two armies skirmished with each other, and Albert, son of Philip duke of Brunswick, was mortally wounded in one of these rencounters. Here the confederates had resolved to attack Charles in his camp; but he having received notice of their intention, thought fit to remove to Donawert, which had a few days before been taken by a detachment of his army. Without specifying the particulars of this campaign, which produced no general action, it will be sufficient to observe, that the affairs of the Protestants were ruined by the dissensions between the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse, who being invested with an equal command often opposed each other with great animosity, to the detriment, and, indeed, the destruction of the common cause. Many fair opportunities were lost by this contention: want of vigour and unanimity appeared in all their operations, while the strength and vigilance of Charles every day encreased; so that, towards the

- a latter end of the year, the chiefs were fain to solicit an accommodation ; but he proposed such hard conditions, that they resolved to continue the war rather than submit to a shameful peace : though by this time the elector of Saxony was stript of his dominions by count Maurice and his brother, who taking advantage of their uncle's absence, and being joined by the forces of Ferdinand king of the Romans, possessed themselves of almost all the electorate <sup>a</sup>.

ULRIC duke of Wirtemberg, seeing the declining situation of their affairs, withdrew himself from the confederacy, and submitted to the emperor, in which conduct he was imitated by the cities of Ulm, Frankfort, Memmingen, Bibrach, Ravenspurg, Kempten, Augsburg, and Strasburg.

- b THE Protestant party being very much weakened by this separation; the elector of Saxony endeavoured to repair their loss by converting to their advantage the correspondence which he had maintained in Bohemia, with those that professed the reformed religion. For this purpose he approached the confines of that kingdom, but was disappointed by the foresight and care of Ferdinand, and constrained to make a shameful retreat towards his own dominions. This misfortune touched him the nearer, as he at the same time found the hopes extinguished which he had conceived from England and France, the kings of which two nations were now dead; at a juncture when he had reason to expect powerful assistance from both. The emperor would not let slip so fair an opportunity of terminating the war; and, therefore, having received advice that the elector of Saxony, since his return
- c to his own country, had surprised Frieberg and Meissen, two places belonging to duke Maurice, he resolved to pursue him with all expedition, in order to stop the progress of his success, and early in the spring set out from Egra with his whole army, accompanied with king Ferdinand, who commanded six hundred cuirassiers, a thousand hussars, and ten companies of foot; and Maurice and Augustus, dukes of Saxony, at the head of a like number of troops. Thus attended, Charles marched with such dispatch, that he had well nigh taken the elector by surprise; for he had detached his Hungarian and Spanish horse with orders to secure the roads, and apprehend every person they should meet, that his march might be kept secret. This precaution succeeded so well, that he had already entered Misnia, and was very near the troops of the elector, before they had the least intimation of his approach.
- d When he was within a day's march of them, the two armies being separated by the river Elbe, and understood from his scouts that the elector was encamped near Mulberg with nine thousand men, he advanced in order to attack him: and several officers, perceiving the Hungarian and Spanish troops on the other side of the river, advised the elector to retire to Wirtemberg. But that prince, who could not believe that the emperor was so near him, mistook those troops for the forces of duke Maurice, which he despised, and would not at any rate decamp till after service, because it happened to be the Lord's day. Before the emperor arrived on the banks of the river, duke Maurice sent some officers to inform the elector of his imperial majesty's approach, and to advise him to send deputies to Charles to sue for peace. He at the same time promised to use all his influence in his behalf,
- e and gave him to understand that the emperor was very well disposed to listen to terms of accommodation. The elector answered, he was not yet reduced to the necessity of suing for peace, as he was possessed of three great advantages, which hindered him from dreading the attempts of his enemy; that he was secured by a deep river, a vast forest, and the town of Wirtemberg, in the neighbourhood of which he would not fail to profit, according to the emergency of his affairs. He, therefore, rejected the advice of duke Maurice, and made proper dispositions of his forces and artillery on the banks of the river, in order to hinder the imperial troops from fording or throwing a bridge over it, as well as to defend a bridge of boats which he himself had made. But seeing the emperor arrive, and his guards attacked by about a thou-
- f sand Spaniards, who had courage enough to wade the river, and even use their bows in the middle of the stream, he set fire to his bridge of boats, one part of which was consumed, while the other, being separated from the bank, was carried down by the course of the river. Upon this occasion, some of the Spanish soldiers swam across with their swords in their mouths, and notwithstanding a shower of arrows that was discharged upon them, seized the boats and carried them to the other side, where, together with those the emperor had brought thither upon waggons, they were formed into a bridge sufficient for the passage of his army and baggage. The elector, who during this transaction was at church hearing sermon, being informed of their success, ordered his army to decamp and march towards Wirtemberg; but the emperor, who knew the fate of that day depended upon his expedition,
- g commanded his hussars and light horse to pass the river without delay, and pursue the Saxons, while he himself followed with the rest of his army. Accordingly, he overtook the elector in the forest, about three miles on the other side of the Elbe; and, after having exhorted his people to do their duty, began the attack, his cavalry being divided into two bodies; in the first of which were the duke of Alba, Lanoy, Antonio de Toledo, Baptista Spinella, and duke Maurice, while the second was conducted by the emperor in person, accompanied by king Ferdinand, with his two sons, and the prince of Savoy. The elector would have been in a condition to stand his ground, had all his troops been assembled in one body; but he had left part of them at Wirtemberg, while William Thumstrein commanded another detachment in Bohemia, which the activity of the emperor did not give him time to call in; so that, after an obstinate engagement, which lasted till night, he was overwhelmed by the number of his enemies, and compelled to surrender prisoner of war<sup>r</sup> (X).

The elector is defeated and taken prisoner.

The elector of Brandenburg intercedes in his behalf.

Conditions of his pardon.

As soon as the elector of Brandenburg understood the event of this battle, he waited upon the emperor, who had gone to besiege Wirtemberg; and though John Frederic, elector of Saxony, was already condemned as a rebel to be beheaded, with a confiscation of his electoral dignity and dominions, which were conferred upon duke Maurice; the elector of Brandenburg solicited so pressing and so effectually in his behalf, that his life was saved upon conditions which he himself was glad to ratify. In consideration of this pardon, he renounced the electoral dignity for himself and his children, leaving to the emperor the power to dispose of it according to his good pleasure: he promised to restore to Charles the towns of Wirtemberg and Gotha, with their artillery and one-third of their provision, the other two-thirds, with all the moveables and utensils, being appropriated to the use of the duke. It was likewise stipulated, that the garrisons should march out without colours; that the elector should set at liberty Albert marquis of Brandenburg, and restore all he had taken from him, while the emperor should behave in the same manner to Ernestus duke of Brunswic and his son; that the prisoner should yield up all he had taken during the war from the counts of Mansfeldt and Solmes, as well as from the master of the order of St. John of Prussia: that he should renounce his right to Magdeburg, Halberstadt, and Hall, obey the imperial chamber, contribute towards the maintenance of its officers, and procure the release of Henry duke of Brunswic and his son, who were kept prisoners by the landgrave of Hesse; that he should abandon every alliance he had engaged in against the emperor and Ferdinand, and enter into none for the future without comprehending them, their provinces, and allies; that he should have an allowance of fifty thousand crowns a year for the maintenance of himself and his family, to be deducted from the electorate and the other lands conferred upon duke Maurice; that, with the permission of the said duke, and under the good pleasure of the emperor, he should retain the town of Gotha, after having demolished the castle and fortifications; on these conditions, all other punishment should be remitted, except that of his remaining in custody under a guard of the emperor or the prince of Spain his son. By virtue of this treaty, the city of Wirtemberg was immediately put into the hands of the emperor, after the princess Sybilla of Cleves, the prisoner's wife, her son, and brother-in-law, had retired from it with the garrison<sup>s</sup>. This great affair being thus determined, the elector of Brandenburg and Maurice duke of Saxony resolved, if possible, to effect an accommodation between the emperor and the landgrave of Hesse; for whom they interceded so powerfully, that Charles agreed to the project of a treaty, importing, that the landgrave should come in person and ask pardon on his knees of the emperor; that he should, for the future, behave himself with that respect and obedience which he owed to his imperial majesty; observe the decrees made for the good of the commonwealth; submit to the judgment of the chamber, and contribute to its support, as well as to that of the war against the Turks; renounce all sorts of confederacies, and in particular that of Smalcalde, and deliver all the writings of that league to the emperor; that he should make no alliance in which the emperor and king Ferdinand should not be included; that he should defend the frontiers of his country against all the emperor's enemies; that he should not undertake the defence of any person whom the emperor wanted to chastise; but, on the contrary, punish all those of his subjects who should presume to carry arms against his im-

(X) This battle was fought in a wood called der Schwainhart, where the elector was wounded in the cheek while he fought with great intrepidity. At length, being surrounded by the enemy, so that he could not possibly escape, he surrendered to one Thilon Trotte, a gentleman of Misnia, who conducted him to the duke of Alba, by whom being presented to the emperor, "I surrender myself (said he) prisoner to your Imperial majesty, and all the favour I ask is a prison suitable

"to my rank." Charles answered with an air of disdain, "You own me then at length your emperor---" "well, I will treat you as you deserve." So saying, he turned his back upon him, and went away, while king Ferdinand reproached him in much harsher terms. Ernestus duke of Brunswic was also taken prisoner in this battle; but the electoral prince, though wounded, found means to escape to Wirtemberg, with about four hundred men (1).

- a perial majesty, to whom, in case of necessity, he should grant a free passage through his territories; that he should recal all his vassals and subjects in the service of any power at war against the emperor; and if they would not obey the summons in fifteen days, confiscate their estates for his imperial majesty's use; that towards the expence of the war he should, in four months, furnish an hundred and fifty thousand crowns, demolish all his fortresses and castles, except Ziggenheim and Cassel, and oblige the garrisons to enter into the service of the emperor, without whose permission no place in his dominions should, for the future, be fortified; that he should deliver up all his artillery and munitions of war, of which his majesty would occasionally supply him with what should be barely necessary for the defence of those places that remained; that he should set at liberty Henry duke of Brunswic and his son, restore their country, and repair the damage they had sustained at his hands; that he should part with all he had usurped either from the order of St. John of Jerusalem, or the Teutonic order; engage in no enterprize against the king of Denmark, or any other of those who had favoured or assisted the emperor; but, on the contrary, release all the prisoners of war without ransom; that he should appear at trial, in order to satisfy all those who should have any demands upon him at law; that these articles should be ratified by his children, and the nobility and commonalty of his country, who should oblige themselves to deliver him up to the emperor, in case he should infringe any part of his promise; and that the elector of Brandenburg, duke Maurice, and Wolfgang count palatine, should become guarantees of the treaty, and employ their forces against him, in case he should violate his engagements. These conditions being thus concerted, were communicated to the landgrave, who, by the advice of the states of his country, accepted them, with the proviso, that he should not be obliged to submit to any future clause<sup>1</sup>.

- THE emperor, seeing this affair in such forwardness, put duke Maurice in possession of the city of Wirtemberg, and advanced towards Hesse, with a view to invade it, in case the landgrave should alter his resolution; but that prince repaired to Hall, in order to wait upon him, and signed a treaty, though he at first hesitated upon an additional clause, importing, that the emperor reserved to himself a right of explaining all doubts that might arise upon any of the articles. The treaty being thus executed, he was conducted by the elector of Brandenburg and Maurice duke of Saxony to the emperor, seated upon his throne, before which he kneeled, while his chancellor read a paper, signifying that the landgrave asked pardon for the offence he had committed against his imperial majesty, and humbly begged to be re-admitted into his favour, which he should endeavour to deserve by his future fidelity, respect, and obedience. The emperor answered by the mouth of George Hilde, that though the landgrave had deserved a very severe chastisement, as he himself owned, yet out of regard to the intercession of some princes, who interested themselves in his behalf, he was neither condemned to death, proscription, nor the loss of his estate, the emperor contenting himself with the execution of the articles specified in the treaty, and being pleased to pardon his vassals and subjects, provided they would faithfully adhere to the letter of this accommodation, and acknowledge, as became them, the favour they had received.
- c The landgrave believing the emperor was sincere, returned thanks for his clemency; and, as he had remained a long time on his knees, rose up on his own accord. In the evening he was invited to supper, together with the elector of Brandenburg and duke Maurice, at the lodgings of the duke of Alba, where he found himself arrested by order of the emperor. His two friends, the elector and duke Maurice, were extremely concerned at this unjustifiable act of oppression; and, in order to console the prisoner, staid with him all the night, assuring him they would use their whole influence in procuring his release. Accordingly they, next day, waited upon the emperor, to whom they complained of this outrage, humbly beseeching him to set the landgrave at liberty, according to the convention which they guaranteed, in consequence of his majesty's promise. The emperor answered, that he had never promised the prisoner should not be detained, but that he should be exempted from perpetual imprisonment; and to support this assertion, produced the treaty, in which his ministers, in order to elude the true meaning of the accommodation, had perfidiously foisted in one word for another (Y), which, instead of securing the landgrave's liberty, subjected him to imprisonment<sup>2</sup>. The two intercessors protested against this alteration; and, after long debates, the emperor sent notice to the landgrave, that he might go about his business; but, at the same time, refused to favour him with a safe-conduct, notwithstanding the earnest solicitations of the princes in his behalf; and two days after he was ordered to follow the emperor, a command which he obeyed with the greater resignation, as the elector and duke Maurice had assured him they would not leave the emperor until he should be set at liberty. Accordingly they attended his Imperial majesty to Naumburg, renewing their importunities without ceasing, until they were forbid to proceed farther, otherwise the landgrave should be sent into Spain. Thus restricted, they were fain to desist, after having communicated their reasons to the prisoner, whom they advised to pay the hundred and fifty thousand crowns without delay, and give security for the execution of the other articles of the treaty : circumstances which, in all probability, would induce the emperor to give him his freedom ; and they assured him, they would not fail to be at the diet appointed to meet on the first of September next at Augsburg, where they would exert their whole power for his interest. According to their advice, the landgrave, who bore his captivity with extreme impatience, ordered the money to be raised, and the fortresses to be demolished, with a view to facilitate his enlargement ; but after the sum was paid, the forts demolished, and the cannon delivered up, he found himself still a prisoner as much as ever. This perfidious behaviour of the emperor with regard to the landgrave incensed not only the princes who had negotiated the accommodation, but likewise almost all the states of Germany, before whom they resolved to lay their public complaints at the ensuing diet. In effect, sometime after the opening of that assembly, the ambassadors of Saxony and Brandenburg did not fail to join the princess of Hesse and her sons in soliciting the liberty of the landgrave, and in remonstrating that the prisoner had already fulfilled all the conditions of his treaty with the emperor *. But Charles eluded their solicitations, by giving the diet to understand, that of three points on which they were chiefly to deliberate, the discussion of that which concerned the interest of particulars ought to be delayed until they should have come to some resolution on the other two, which regarded the general good of the empire : for he declared his principal aim was to re-establish the peace of Germany, by a re-union of those who had been divided on the score of religion, and by a free and impartial administration of justice under the authority of the laws, which had been trampled upon, to the disgrace of the Germanic nation †.

Where the Formula ad interim is received.

THE first article created long and obstinate disputes ; for the pope had transferred the council of Trent to Bologna, where he resolved to continue the sitting, notwithstanding the pressing instances of the emperor and the princes of the empire, who besought him to remit the council to Trent, and protested against all the proceedings at Bologna. This inflexibility of the pope obliged Charles to find out some medium, by which he might please both parties, and the best expedient he could pitch upon, was to employ learned men in composing a regulation upon all the controverted points of religion, until the council should have published a final decree, by which the orthodox faith would be established. As he thought it would still be his interest to keep measures with the pope, he sent this project of regulation to his holiness, who objected to two articles contained in it, namely, the marriage of priests, and the administration of the communion in both kinds to the laity. Notwithstanding this opposition of the pope, it was presented to the diet, where it was received as a kind of decree, for which the elector of Mentz thanked the emperor, in the name of the states, although they had vested him with no such commission. The Catholics murmured at this formula, which was called ad interim, as if they had thought the emperor intended to change the essence of religion ; but he told them, that what he had done related only to the Lutherans, whose affections he wanted to conciliate by this indulgence ; but that as for the Catholics, they were at liberty to adhere to their ancient customs ; and, indeed, in his constitution they are expressly enjoined to stand firm in their faith, for the advantage and union of the church ‡.

The emperor

nity to Maurice duke of

HAVING taken this measure, which was agreeable to neither party, and only received by compulsion, he proceeded to the deliberations of the administration of justice, and the authority of the laws, when he insinuated to the states, that if they would leave these matters to his care, he would employ his whole attention in redressing that grievance ; and, in the mean time, as the Imperial chamber was in a manner overwhelmed with business, he proposed to add ten to the number of assessors, that the causes might be decided with more dispatch. The states subscribed to his advice without hesitation, and referred the whole affair to his management, promising to contribute to any additional expence he should think necessary. As for the last point, concerning the particular interest of some princes and states of the empire, Charles declared that he himself would take cognizance of these complaints ; and, in order to appease Maurice duke of Saxony, who still insisted upon the landgrave's being set at liberty, he in full diet confirmed to him the territories of John Frederic, duke of Saxony, and the electoral dignity, not only for himself and his heirs male, but these failing, for his brother duke Augustus and his sons ; still, however, deducting those lands

- a which were reserved for the maintenance of John Frederic and his successors. Charles, having disembarassed himself of this troublesome business, had no other point to gain at this diet except that of persuading the states to grant him a considerable supply for the necessities of the empire; and he succeeded so well in his endeavours, that they were prevailed upon not only to comply with his request, but also to grant a hundred thousand crowns a year to king Ferdinand, till the expiration of his truce with the Turk. They moreover agreed, that all the provinces which the emperor possessed in High and Low Germany, should be put under the protection of the empire, on condition of their contributing their quota of subsidies in proportion with the other states, in all public emergencies, without, however, suffering any innovation upon their own laws and jurisdictions; and lastly, that the general peace of the empire might be the better secured, it was resolved that the constitution of public peace, enacted for his grandfather the emperor Maximilian, should be renewed and augmented; and this was actually corroborated with another new constitution, having the full force of a law through the whole empire<sup>a</sup>.

BEFORE the diet was dismissed, he ordered letters patent to be expedited, inviting and requiring the states, particularly those of the confession of Augsburg, to assist at the council as soon as it should be re-established at Trent, promising that all points should be examined and discussed, according to the scripture and doctrine of the holy fathers: and that the prelates and theologicians of the Protestant faith, should be as favourably received as those of the other persuasion (Z).

- c THE deputies were no sooner departed, than the emperor set out for the Low Countries, having ordered his son Philip to meet him at Brussels: that young prince being in Spain could not arrive in Flanders till the beginning of the following year, when he was acknowledged as the presumptive heir of Charles, in the Low Countries, the states of which did homage to him in that quality<sup>b</sup>.

Charles sets out for the Low Countries. A. D. 1549.

- d SOME time after this transaction, the emperor, as a testimony of his zeal for the church, issued an edict against all who should profess any other than the Catholic orthodox religion, and even established divers tribunals of inquisition, to proceed against those who should transgress the edict, and condemn them to the penalties therein expressed. This decree was the torch that lighted up a flame which could never be extinguished; for the governors of those provinces, with a view to signalize their own conformity with the zeal of their master's, successively extended their power to such acts of tyranny and oppression, that the subjects, thinking themselves authorised by that necessity which can stoop to no law, shook off the yoke, had recourse to arms, and put themselves in a posture of defence. In a word, this revolt prospered to such a degree, that the oppressors, far from being able to reduce the rebels to obedience, were obliged in the sequel to receive them as friends, and own them for sovereigns; and had the mortification to see not only Lutheranism, but also all sorts of religions introduced and tolerated in the country; so true it is that violence and restraint in matters of religion are very dangerous and impolitic remedies.

Where he establishes tribunals of inquisition.

- e THIS unlucky edict filled all the Low Countries with consternation and despair; but particularly affected the German merchants who traded at Antwerp; and it gave such umbrage to the Lutheran princes and states, who had resumed their courage on seeing part of the emperor's troops disbanded, that they ventured to protest openly against the Formula ad interim, which even those rejected by whom it had been formerly received<sup>c</sup>. At the ensuing diet, which was held at Augsburg, Charles loudly complained of this protest, with a view to prevent all troublesome consequences; and, in order to please the Protestants, abolished the inquisition in the Low Countries, so far as it regarded foreign merchants. He, moreover, in confirming the decree of Interim, assured the states, that the differences in religion would soon be determined by the council, which pope Julius the third had, by this time, re-established at Trent; where Christians of all denominations, even those who had changed their religion, should have liberty to propose their sentiments, under his protection and safe-conduct. Thinking by these expedients, which met with no opposition, that the Protestant princes were satisfied, he dismissed the assembly; and his son Philip, who had been there in prison, soon after set out for Italy, on his return to Spain, with his brother-in-law Maximilian, son of Ferdinand, who accompanied him thither, in order to Charles is solicited to set the landgrave at liberty.

A. D. 1551.

From Augsburg the emperor removed to Inspruck, where he resolved to pass some months, that he might be near the council of Trent, and at hand to make the necessary provision for the war of Parma, against Henry the second, king of France, who supported the interest of Ottavio Farnese, lord of Parma, which the pope wanted to possess in exchange for some other territory <sup>d</sup>. Hither Charles was followed by the ambassadors of Saxony and Brandenburg, who pressinglly solicited him to set the landgrave at liberty: he was likewise importuned, on the same subject, by the king of Denmark and several other princes, who endeavoured to prevent the evil consequences which the long and severe captivity of that prince might entail upon Germany. The emperor continued to amuse these intercessors with vain promises, and declared that he would actually accommodate the affair with Maurice elector of Saxony, whom he ordered to attend him for that purpose <sup>e</sup>. Maurice, who from this answer, which had been so often repeated, foresaw that nothing was to be expected from the justice or good-will of Charles, resolved to put an end to the negotiation, and take another method which would be more effectual. He likewise wanted an opportunity of effacing (if possible) the bad impression of his character, which his conduct had made among those of his own religion, who believed he had sacrificed to his ambition John Frederic, duke of Saxony, his own kinsman and benefactor, who they suspected was still detained in prison by means of his secret intelligence with the emperor. With a view, therefore, to regain their esteem and affection, which he knew he should never retrieve but by attacking Charles, whom they considered as the tyrant of their consciences and liberty, he endeavoured by all possible means to put himself in a condition to support a war against the emperor; and, indeed, he conducted himself with such secrecy and address, that the world was surprised to find he had, by the intervention of Albert marquis of Brandenburg, entered into a league with the king of France, and retained in his service not only the German troops which had been employed in the siege of Magdeburg, but also those who had evacuated the city in consequence of the accommodation (A). He had likewise secured the assistance of Joachim elector of Brandenburg, Frederic count palatine, the dukes of Wirtemberg, Deux-ponts, and Mecklenburg, and Ernestus marquis of Baden; but he determined to declare himself at this time, because he looked upon it as the most favourable conjuncture that ever could occur; <sup>d</sup> for the emperor was on one hand occupied in the war of Parma against the French; and on the other, Ferdinand was embroiled with the Turk, who had marched into Hungary, on pretence that he and the emperor had broke the truce; the last in besieging and taking the town of Afric in Barbary, and the other in seizing certain places in Hungary, which had been possessed by the Turks: besides, Charles had scarce any other troops than those he had withdrawn from Saxony, to assist at the siege of Magdeburg, during which Maurice, who commanded in chief, had gained a great number of the officers over to his interest. Thus prepared, he took the field with his army, at the same time publishing a manifesto, that contained his reasons for having recourse to that extremity: he at once made himself master of the towns that were in his route; and advancing into Suabia, invested the city of Augsburg, which he reduced in a few days; from thence he marched towards the Alps, in order to secure the passages against the Spanish and Italian troops; and his approach immediately dissipated the council of Trent: the bishops who composed that assembly having fled to different places of greater safety, after they had prorogued the council for two years, or longer, provided an accommodation among the princes could not be effected before that period. Mean while, the emperor himself was struck with such consternation at this unforeseen progress of Maurice, that he forthwith dispatched king Ferdinand to treat with him about conditions of peace. <sup>e</sup>

Charles being struck with consternation, sends his brother Ferdinand to the elector with proposals of peace.

THESE two princes had an interview at Lintz, where the elector, who designed to surprise the emperor at Inspruck, endeavoured to amuse Ferdinand with pacific professions, and a mutual agreement, importing, that an assembly should be held at Passau, on a certain day, to deliberate upon the means of concluding an accommodation, and that a truce for fifteen days should commence on the first day of meeting. This stratagem in some measure succeeded; for while Ferdinand returned to the emperor, to give an account of his negotiation, Maurice, resolving to make the best use of the intermediate time, advanced with great expedition, and forcing, with equal gallantry and success, the passes of the

These three, without any other equipage, which, indeed, the hurry of their flight would not permit them to prepare, retired with great fear and precipitation to Villach on the Drave; and Maurice advanced with such expedition, that next day he entered Inspruck, where all that belonged to the emperor's court was abandoned to pillage, though the equipage of Ferdinand was spared, and the citizens carefully protected from violence and plunder, he being desirous to convince them that he had not taken up arms to enrich himself, but solely to redress the grievances of those who were oppressed <sup>2</sup>.

WHILE the elector pursued Charles with such activity, the king of France, in consequence of the treaty which he had subscribed, marched to the frontiers with a powerful army, and possessed himself of Verdun, Toul, and Metz, together with Nanci and the whole country of Lorraine, from whence he advanced to Haguenau, in order to make a diversion in favour of his allies <sup>3</sup>.

The king of France makes himself master of Verdun, Toul, Metz, and Nanci.

THE emperor, having posted himself in a place where he could no longer apprehend any insult from the elector of Saxony, his whole care was employed in assembling as great a number of troops as he could bring together at the foot of the Alps, that he might be in a condition not only to oppose the progress of the enemy, but also to support the Roman Catholic party during the continuance of the assembly at Passau, where the princes actually met upon an appointed day, in order to concert measures for an accommodation. Before the deliberations began, the Protestants received a message from Charles, importing, that he would send the landgrave's head to Maurice, provided he should refuse to accept the terms of peace proposed. This menace had its weight with the elector and the chiefs of his party: and both sides exerted their endeavours towards an agreement so heartily, that in a few months they concluded the famous treaty known by the name of the Pacification of Passau <sup>1</sup>.

The pacification of Passau.

- d IN consequence of this peace, the landgrave was set at liberty; but afterwards arrested at Maestricht, by order of queen Mary, governess of the Low Countries, who said she could not enlarge him, until she should know the emperor's pleasure more particularly on that subject. Her pretence for apprehending him was, that Reiffenberg, who was in the service of the landgrave's son, had, with his troops, joined Albert marquis of Brandenburg, one of the princes engaged in the Protestant alliance with France. This conduct she considered as a violation of the peace. But he was soon discharged, by the command of the emperor, and in six days after arrived in his own territories.

- e CHARLES the fifth, whose chief aim in granting these indulgences to the Protestants was to procure their assistance against Henry the second of France, found means to engage their whole force in his interest; and seeing himself at the head of fourscore thousand men, resolved to be revenged upon his rival without delay. For which purpose he immediately began his march to Strasburg, where he was very well received by the magistrates of the city; and, while his army passed the Rhine, he chose his head-quarters in a village near Haguenau. Six whole days were consumed in transporting his troops, cannon, and baggage, when advancing to Landau, he remained inactive sixteen days longer, and did not begin the siege of Metz until the twenty-second of October. By these delays the duke of Guise had time to take all the necessary precautions, and accordingly he supplied the cities of Metz and Nanci with all sorts of munitions of war; and a good number of gentlemen volunteers went into those places, in order to signalize themselves in their defence. Albert marquis of Brandenburg had hitherto continued firmly attached to his engagements with France, and at that time occupied a post near Pont a Mousson, with fifty companies of foot and a good number of cavalry: but having changed his sentiments at the approach of the emperor, he carried on a secret negotiation with that prince, and, on the fourth of November, actually joined him in his camp before Metz, after having routed and made prisoner the duke d'Aumale, who, being informed of his intention, had come to secure his person, and hinder his junction with Charles. To convey a just idea of the valour, resolution, and obstinacy of the besieged, let it suffice to observe, that the place was attacked by an army of a hundred thousand foot and twelve thousand horse, and battered by a hundred and fourteen pieces of cannon, under the eye of the emperor himself; yet his efforts were vain, and, towards the end of December, he was fain to raise the siege, after having lost one-third of his army by the coldness of the weather and contagious distempers, as well as by the uncommon valour of the enemy. One part of his troops he put into winter-quarters in the country of Triers, and with the rest retired to the Low-Countries, as much mortified as the king of France was rejoiced at his disappointment<sup>k</sup>. He was not, however, discouraged by this disgrace; on the contrary, he took the field in the beginning of the spring, to revenge the injury he had received; and marching to Tercuane, the place was taken by assault, and razed to the ground; but whether his bodily infirmities, or the decline of his faculties, which no longer retained their former vigour, hindered him from acting with his usual spirit, or that he had other designs in his head, certain it is, he proceeded no farther on that side; but leaving his army under the command of Emanuel Philbert, son of Charles duke of Savoy, he converted his attention to other objects, endeavouring to prevent the troublesome consequences of an intestine war, which was kindled in Germany by Albert marquis of Brandenburg (C), since his retreat from Metz, as well as to effect a match between his son Philip and Mary, daughter and heiress of Henry king of England, which was soon after actually consummated<sup>l</sup>.

THIS interesting affair being settled to his wish, he resolved to put an end to the practices of Albert, who in a severe battle fought near the river Weser, had been defeated by Maurice elector of Saxony, though the victory cost this prince his life, he having received a wound, of which he died in two days. Albert escaped into Franconia, where he found means to re-assemble some troops; but being again routed by the forces of Ferdinand, and the neighbouring princes, he was compelled to seek refuge in France; and the emperor having determined to proceed against him as a perturbator of the public peace, as well as to remedy the disorders which had been produced by his rebellion, he convoked several diets successively, which proved abortive through the intrigues of Albert's friends, and the absence of the emperor, who was disabled by his infirmities from attending in person. At length the marquis, whom the king of France had favoured with his protection, was, on the part of that prince, comprehended in the treaty of truce, which was concluded in the abbey of Vaucelles near Cambray, by the ambassadors of the emperor, and his son Philip, king of England, on the one part, and those of Henry the second, king of France, on the other; a truce to be observed by sea and land, in the Low-Countries, Italy, and elsewhere, for the term of five years, on condition that both parties should keep the towns and territories which they had at present in possession<sup>m</sup>.

Augsburg.*

THAT very day on which the treaty was signed, Ferdinand opened the diet at Augsburg, in the name of the emperor, in order to execute the treaty of Passau; but the debates concerning the regulations on the subject of religion, were carried on with such heat and obstinacy of altercation, that after a very long session they could hardly be brought to agree to an occasional resolution, by which it was decreed, that no Catholic or Protestant should be injured or insulted on account of his religion, but all differences be determined according to the laws and customs of the empire; that if any archbishop, bishop, prelate, or other ecclesiastic, should renounce the old religion, his dignity and benefice should be forfeited, without any prejudice to his character, and his place be filled up by the chapter or college possessed of the power of election; that as some ecclesiastical revenues had been seized upon by certain states of the empire and their predecessors, and converted to other religious purposes, such as the maintenance of schools and ministers, these alienations should not be disputed at law; that the ancient ecclesiastical jurisdiction should not extend to the religion, faith, ceremonies, and ministerial functions of those who adopted the confession of Augsburg, but remain suspended, and without effect, until the determination of all the differences of religion, though it should continue in force in all other matters; that the clergy should for the future enjoy their estates, rights, and privileges, without, however, encroaching upon the temporalities which the laity possessed before this division in religion; that the necessary expence for the service of the church, the maintenance of schools, charities, and hospitals, should be equally levied on the professors of both religions, and,

(C) Albert marquis of Brandenburg, after the pacification of Passau, to which he refused to subscribe, continued the war against the Roman Catholics, and, among other violences, extorted the promise of severe contributions from the bishops of Wurtzburg and Bamberg, who complained to the emperor, and were absolved from those compulsive bargains, which, however, were confirmed again to Albert when he joined Charles at the siege of Metz. The bishops adhered to the first sentence; and when Albert had recourse to military execution, they appealed to the imperial chamber, who made a decree in their favour. At the same time, the emperor exhorted him to desist, and submit to the determination of the law: but far from giving ear to this admonition, Albert laid waste the country with fire and sword, and committed terrible ravages, which gave rise to a civil war (1).

WHILE Ferdinand thus regulated the affairs of Germany, the emperor, feeling his health daily decline, and the vigour of his mind decay, resolved to deposit the burden of government, and repose himself in the shade of private life. Perhaps, alarmed at the power and prosperity of Henry the second of France, whom he considered as his rival, he was afraid of seeing those laurels withered, which he had gathered in the course of a long reign; and, in order to prevent that disgrace, thought proper to oppose the youthful spirit of his son Philip to the enterprising genius of the French king. Be that as it will, he had for some time cherished the thoughts of abdicating the throne, and actually recalled his son, on whom at his marriage he had bestowed the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, together with the duchy of Milan. Having assembled the states of the Low-Countries at Brussels, he created Philip chief of the order of the Golden Fleece, and then resigned to him the sovereignty of all those provinces. In consequence of which resignation, he received the oath and homage of the states, in quality of their new sovereign, as soon as his father quitted the assembly. Charles, soon after this transaction, divested himself of all his royalties and signories in Europe, as well as in America, conferring them all upon Philip, and reserving to himself no more than a pension of two hundred thousand ducats, to be deducted from the revenue of Spain; and now nothing remained but to quit the empire in favour of his brother Ferdinand: however, this abdication he postponed for a year, during which he hoped that prince would accept the imperial crown, on condition that Philip should be elected king of the Romans, and declared his successor; but here he was disappointed in his expectation by the address of Ferdinand, who found means to secure the empire to his own son, and to elude his brother's solicitations in behalf of Philip.

- THE emperor finding his brother inflexible on this subject, and resolving to set out for Spain without delay, signed a formal resignation of the empire, which was put into the hands of William de Nassau, prince of Orange, Gregory Sigismund Hilde, vice-chancellor of the empire, and Haller his secretary, whom he sent as his ambassadors to the next diet, to signify his abdication to the electoral princes, and to deliver the scepter, crown, and other regalia, to Ferdinand king of the Romans. Charles having thus intirely dispossessed himself of all his dominions, and made the necessary preparations for his passage into Spain, where he had chosen his retreat, he departed from Brussels, accompanied by five crowned heads; namely, his son Philip king of Spain, England, and Naples; his son-in-law Maximilian king of Bohemia; the king of Tunis; his two sisters, Eleonora queen-dowager of France, and Mary queen-dowager of Hungary and Bohemia; together with the dukes and duchesses of Savoy, Lorraine, and Parma, and a great many other persons of distinction. At Ghent, he dismissed the ambassadors of foreign princes, after he had desired them to recommend his son to their respective masters; then, continuing his journey, embarked at Flessingen with his two sisters, and in a few days arrived in Spain. When he landed at Laredo, he is said to have prostrated himself upon the ground, and kissing the earth to have exclaimed, 'O my beloved country, may heaven shower down its blessings upon you: naked I came from my mother's womb, and naked I return to thee, which I regard as a second parent. In return for all I owe thee, I now consecrate to thee my flesh and bones, the sole offering which I have now to bestow.' Then casting his eyes upon a crucifix, which he had used by way of standard in all his battles, he gave thanks to Jesus Christ, by whose goodness he was permitted to revisit, in his latter days, that province which he had always cherished with particular veneration and esteem. At his landing he was met by the nobility and clergy of the kingdom, whom he received very graciously, and then repaired in a litter to Valladolid, where he saw his grandchild Don Carlos, whom he enriched with many pious advices. From thence he removed into the province of Estramadura, and shut himself up in the cloister of St. Justus, of the order of St. Jerom, where he lived two years as a simple friar, conforming to all the strictest rules of the convent; and here he died of a gouty fever, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, after having received the eucharist in both species; a circumstance which hath induced some people to believe that he favoured the Protestant religion (D). His body was deposited at Granada, near those of his his mother, grand-father, and grand-mother ; but it was afterwards translated to the Escurial, by the order of Philip the fourth. He was survived but three weeks by his sister Mary, widow of Lewis king of Hungary and Bohemia, who had been governess of the Low-Countries for the space of five and twenty years, his other sister Eleonora having died in the month of March in the same year. Such was the end of Charles the fifth, who was certainly the most powerful prince that ever sat upon the imperial throne. His person was agreeable, though inclining to corpulence : he was of a middling stature, with blue eyes, an aquiline nose, and pointed chin ; and his hair, which was sandy, he always wore so short, that one half of his ears were uncovered. Though he had made no progress in learning, he was perfectly well acquainted with the Flemish, German, Spanish, French, and Italian languages, and understood a little of the Latin. He ordered the Courtier of count Balthazar de Chatillon, Machiavel's prince, and Polybius, to be translated for his own private use. He delighted in reading the history of Philip de Commines, which he very much esteemed, and the commentaries of Sleidan, whom by way of raillery he used to call his Liar. He often amused himself with drawing, was passionately fond of the exercise of arms, and perfectly well skilled in horsemanship, plain in his apparel, and familiar with his domestics ; at the same time, circumspect in his actions and pleasing in his discourse ; but often artful and ambiguous in his expressions : he was patient in giving audience, judicious in his answers, firm in supporting his ambassadors and officers, and grateful towards those who had served him with fidelity : yet he was rather narrow than liberal, for no prince ever expended less upon his pleasures, or took more pains in regulating his œconomy ; he was naturally amorous, but he carefully concealed this weakness, that irregularity might not be authorised by his example : he was so moderate in eating and drinking, that when attacked by the gout, he, without repining, allowed the physicians to regulate his diet by weight and measure ; and drunkenness was an excess which he could never forgive. In the beginning of his reign, he manifested more discretion than courage ; but in the sequel gave many extraordinary proofs of personal valour : yet he is accused of having erred against sound policy, in letting Luther escape ; in setting Francis the first at liberty ; in restoring Tunis, and in neglecting the defence of the Goletta ; in conferring the electorate of Saxony on duke Maurice ; in elevating the house of Medicis ; in creating Ferdinand king of the Romans ; in making war upon the pope ; in abdicating the empire ; in marrying his son Philip to the queen of England, upon dis-honourable conditions ; and in being too much attached to strangers, particularly the inhabitants of the Low-Countries, whom he employed as his principal ministers, in preference to the Germans and Spaniards, who took umbrage at his partiality <sup>a</sup>.

F E R D I N A N D.

- a CHARLES the fifth was succeeded in the empire by his brother Ferdinand, who was born at Alcala de Henares in Spain, and by his grand-father provided with a preceptor and governor, who not only trained him up in the usual exercise of princes, but likewise inspired him with the love of the belles lettres to which he applied himself with extraordinary attachment. Francis Ximenes, cardinal of Toledo, who had the care of his brother's education, persuaded Charles that he ought to remove Ferdinand into Germany, because he perceived that the Spaniards expressed more affection for that young prince, who was born and bred among them; than for his elder brother, who was a native of the Low-Countries. He was accordingly sent into Flanders, where Erasmus was engaged to superintend the rest of his education. When Ferdinand married Anne of Hungary, Charles made over to him as his patrimony, High and Low Austria, with all the domains appertaining to that house, in Germany, Suabia, along the lake of Constance, in the Hercynian forest, the Brisgaw, and on both sides of the river Ill. His brother-in-law, Lewis the Young, being slain in the battle of Mohais, he, by virtue of his wife's title, was crowned king of Bohemia at Prague; and after having defeated John de Zapolles, count of Scepus, vaivode of Transylvania, who was his competitor for Hungary, he entered into quiet possession of that kingdom, and was crowned at Belgrade, in consequence of the ancient treaties subsisting between the kings of Hungary and the princes of the house of Austria. He was afterwards invested with the duchy of Wurtemberg by his brother Charles, at the diet of Augsburg; then being elected king of the Romans at Cologne, he received the crown at Aix-la-Chapelle, as we have already observed, notwithstanding the protestations of the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, who, nevertheless, acknowledged his election a few years after in the city of Cadan in Bohemia. In the mean time, as one part of the Hungarian nobles was still in the interest of the count de Scepus, Ferdinand concluded a treaty with him, by which it was stipulated, that each should keep possession of what he at present occupied; and that upon Zapolles' death, the whole kingdom should devolve to Ferdinand. Accordingly, upon the death of that prince, the king of the Romans claimed the performance of this contract; but Solyman, upon pretence of protecting the widow and son of Zapolles, made himself master of a great part of Hungary, from whence he could never be intirely expelled. Since the last diet at Augsburg, where the affairs of religion were regulated with the Protestants, he had been continually employed on the side of Hungary, in opposing the Turks, who had made repeated efforts to extend their conquests in that kingdom; and, after having fortified the principal places with good garrisons, and all the other munitions of war, he returned to Germany, whither he was called to assist at the diet of Frankfort, where the ambassadors of Charles the fifth arrived with the act of renunciation in favour of Ferdinand, which, after due deliberation, was unanimously approved by the electors. In consequence of this approbation, they proceeded to the election of Ferdinand, to whom they swore allegiance, after having transferred upon him the imperial dignity with all the accustomed ceremonies: but pope Paul the fourth would not admit of the validity of the renunciation of Charles, or the election of his brother, because in neither case the consent of the holy see had been obtained. He even refused audience to Don Martin de Gusman, whom Ferdinand had sent to take the usual oath in his name; and that his refusal might appear to be founded upon substantial reasons, he appointed certain cardinals to examine into the merits of the affair. These commissaries were of opinion, that the pope could not admit the ambassador to any audience or public action, until he should have demonstrated in what manner the empire became vacant, and by what right Ferdinand pretended to succeed his brother, as all the proceedings at the diet of Frankfort were null and void, because carried on by heretic electors, without the consent of the pope. It would therefore be necessary to examine the motives which had induced Charles to resign the empire, and if they should be found to be just and reasonable, Ferdinand should renounce all that had been done at Frankfort, and submit to a new election. The emperor looked upon these reasons as vain and frivolous; and, without paying the least regard to the remonstrances of the pope, ordered his ambassador to make the necessary protest, and take his leave, if, in three days after this intimation, he should not be favoured with an audience; for he considered that antient custom of pro-

The ambassador punctually executed the orders of his master; and though almost all the princes of Christendom condemned this conduct of the pope, yet he persisted in his refusal, even after the death of Charles; but he himself dying soon after, Pius the fourth, who succeeded him, confirmed the imperial dignity to Ferdinand <sup>a</sup>.

But is confirmed in the imperial dignity by Pius IV.

THIS prince, upon his promotion, being desirous of settling the affairs of the empire, issued orders for convoking a diet at Augsburg, where he invited the princes and states to appear in person, he himself resolving to be present among them. There he earnestly exhorted them to submit to an œcumenical council, as the only means capable of re-establishing the union of Germany; and he promised to manage matters in such a manner, that they should be more favourably heard in that assembly than they had been in the council of Trent; but finding it impracticable to prevail upon them to consent to this proposal, he still indulged them with the free exercise of their religion within their own dominions, that the public peace of the empire might not be infringed, though, at the same time, he vehemently solicited the pope to call a new council, and endeavoured to engage the kings of France and Spain to second his solicitations. But all their joint endeavours would have been vain, had not Francis the second resolved to convoke a national council, in order to concert measures for stopping the progress of Calvinism. Pope Pius the fourth, being alarmed at this resolution, determined to oblige the princes of Christendom with a general council, which they had so long demanded; and, after having hesitated some months in his opinion, sometimes inclining to a continuation of the council of Trent, which had been suspended by Julius the third, and at other times disposed to call a new one, he at length adhered to the former suggestion, and published a bull for renewing the council of Trent, whither all princes, prelates, and ambassadors, were invited to repair <sup>b</sup>.

A. D. 1560.

Who re-opens the council of Trent.

The Protestants assemble at Naumburg, and refuse to submit to the council.

ON the publication of this bull, the Protestants obtained permission of the emperor to assemble at Naumburg in Saxony, where they were visited by two nuncios, whom the pope had sent into Germany to invite them to the council. Their arrival and business was no sooner notified, than the assembly sent an escort to attend them. They were immediately introduced, and politely received by the princes, who heard their harangue with great attention; and having received the bulls and briefs of the pope, to which they promised an answer should be given, they ordered them to be reconducted to their lodging with the same ceremony: but they were no sooner returned, than the pope's briefs were sent back by the hands of three gentlemen, who told them, in the name of the assembly, that the princes observing that the pope had in the inscription distinguished them by the appellation of his Sons, they could not receive his brief on these terms, as they could not acknowledge him for their father. The nuncios replied, that this was no more than a form which his holiness observed in writing to all Christian princes; but the messengers, without taking notice of this reply, left the briefs upon a table, and retired. This was the prelude of the resolution, which a few days after, the princes sent to the nuncios by ten of the counsellors, specifying, that they would receive no invitation from the pope to repair to a council, which he had no power to convoke; this being the prerogative of the emperor, to whom alone, as their sovereign, they were bound to explain themselves on the subject <sup>c</sup>. At the same time, the assembly expressed their esteem for the persons of the nuncios, who would have met with a better reception, had not they been invested with that odious title. After they had been dismissed with this declaration, the princes put an end to their sitting with a remonstrance, importing, that they would adhere to the confession of Augsburg, whatever should be determined in the council of Trent <sup>d</sup>.

A. D. 1562.

Maximilian, the emperor's son, is elected king of the Romans.

MEAN while, the emperor resolving to establish the imperial crown in his own family, issued orders for convoking a diet at Frankfort, where he managed his interest with such address, that his son Maximilian was elected king of the Romans, with the unanimous consent of all the princes and states, that prince having been already promoted to the crown of Bohemia. Ferdinand likewise took this opportunity of once more attempting to persuade the Protestants to submit to the council; but they continued unshaken in their resolution, demanding a free council, in which the pope should not be both judge and party, where they might deliberate with freedom upon the morals and ecclesiastical conduct of Rome, the depravity of which was the subject of universal complaint. The emperor, finding them inflexible in this point, resolved to take another method, in order to re-unite them to the church; and for this effect, in concert with Charles the ninth, king of France, con-

a certified a remonstrance to the fathers of the council, exhorting them to undertake a reformation of manners among the ecclesiastics, in order to remove that stumbling-block, of which the Protestants and Calvinists so justly complained. An ample memorial of these abuses, together with the means of reforming them, was actually drawn up by order of the emperor, and sent to the council, whither also the king of France dispatched the cardinal of Lorraine, with instructions upon the same subject: but the pope affirming, that such a reformation was the province of him alone, would not allow the council to take cognizance of the affair. The emperor had the mortification not only to find his purpose thus baffled, but likewise to see himself disappointed in a demand which he had made in favour of the Protestants of Germany, among whom he requested that the communion in both species, and the marriage of priests, should be allowed; but his holiness would consent to neither, although the greatest part of the Catholic doctors judged such a condescension necessary, in order to facilitate the re-union of the Protestants with the Roman church<sup>y</sup>. This was the last public transaction in which Ferdinand was concerned; for in the month of February of that same year, he was attacked by a fever, which terminated in a dropsy, that put a period to his life. He died at Vienna on the twenty-sixth of July, and the sixtieth and first year of his age. His obsequies were performed in the same city, on the month of August of the year following; after which ceremony his body was carried to Prague, where it was interred by that of queen Anne his wife, with whom he had lived in the utmost harmony of conjugal affection. Ferdinand dies at Vienna. A. D. 1564.

c FERDINAND governed the empire as well as his own kingdoms with uncommon equity, clemency, and moderation. He was remarkable for his prudence, justice, liberality, and unwearied application to business; and though he was zealously attached to the Roman Catholic religion, he did not manifest his zeal by fire and sword, although often solicited to make use of these expedients; but endeavoured to reconcile the differences in religion by force of argument and truth, in pacific conferences and councils. Above all things, he was scrupulously observant of his word; inasmuch that having once promised a gratification to an old officer, who afterwards rendered himself unworthy of his favour, he performed his promise, saying, that he ought to have more regard to his own word and reputation, than to the demerits of the delinquents<sup>z</sup> (E). His character.

*F*ERDINAND was succeeded by his son Maximilian, who was born at Vienna, and educated in Spain with his uncle Charles the fifth, in whose army he made the first campaign, during the war with France. He likewise signalized his courage in that which was carried on with some of the princes of the empire; and afterwards opened the diet at Augsburg by a discourse, which he pronounced in presence of the emperor, and the princes of the empire. When this assembly broke up, he repaired to Spain, where he espoused Mary, daughter to Charles the fifth, and governed that kingdom three years in the name of his father-in-law. At his return into Germany, he greatly contributed to the pacification at Passau; after which he continued in Austria, till the day of his father's death. Maximilian succeeds him on the imperial throne.

e We have already observed, that he received the crown of Bohemia, and was afterwards unanimously elected king of the Romans at Frankfort; yet his election had well-nigh proved abortive by the death of John Jekhard, elector of Cologne, who happened to die at that very juncture. However, the chapter of Cologne being desired to nominate a new archbishop, Frederic count de Weid was chosen without delay, and immediately repaired to Frankfort, where he assisted at the election<sup>a</sup>.

f MAXIMILIAN had attained to the age of thirty-seven when he ascended the imperial throne, succeeding his father Ferdinand, not only in his dominions, but also in his good qualities, and particularly his humanity, prudence, and moderation. By his acquaintance with the Latin, German, French, Italian, Spanish, and Sclavonian languages, he acquired a surprizing facility in governing the different nations that were under his sway, and in supporting a correspondence, which he carefully maintained with all his friends and neighbours. In all disputes, especially those of religion, he preferred pacific expedients to violent measures, often observing, that spiritual things ought not to be decided by the temporal sword; and affirming, that those who espoused the contrary opinion, were enemies to union and tranquility. In consequence of this humane disposition, the whole empire breathed nothing but peace, if we except the disturbance occasioned by John Albert, duke of Mecklenburg, who all of a sudden interrupted the repose of Germany, by undertaking the siege of Rostock, against which he was incensed, because, since it was restored to that house by John king of Denmark, the populace had been guilty of divers insurrections, and the city being now exhausted by the plague, and otherwise in a very defenceless condition, the duke would not lose such a favourable opportunity of reducing them to subjection: and, indeed, he made such advantage of the conjuncture, that they were fain to submit, in order to avoid their total destruction. It was accordingly agreed, that the duke should take possession of the city with his troops; that the inhabitants should be maintained in their privileges, and all other differences referred to the decision of the emperor. The duke, however, finding himself master of the town, disarmed the citizens, and condemned them to pay a fine of sixty thousand rixdollars, and beheaded two of their number, who had been ringleaders of the last revolt. After he had taken all the necessary precautions to secure himself in the possession of the city, his brother duke Ulric set up a claim to one half of the acquisition, and the other refusing his demand, threatened to support his right by force of arms; but the affair was accommodated by the authority of the emperor, who prevailed upon them to agree that they should possess the town in common, and that the inhabitants should pay the same homage to both <sup>b</sup>.

WHATEVER inclination Maximilian had to cultivate peace on all sides, he was obliged to arm against John Sigismund, prince of Transylvania, who had assumed the title of king of Hungary, and against whom he sent an army under the conduct of Lazarus Schuendi. This general acted with such vigour and success against Sigismund, that after having taken Tokay, and some other places, he would have driven him intirely out of his own country, had not the progress of his arms been stopt by an accommodation of the emperor, by the intercession of Solyman the second, who protected Sigismund as his vassal <sup>c</sup>.

Augsburg.

THIS war being happily determined, Maximilian repaired to the diet he had convoked at Augsburg, which was opened by a speech of Albert duke of Bavaria, who, in the emperor's name, offered divers proposals to the states for strengthening the peace with the Protestants, and extirpating certain sects not comprehended in that peace; for executing the preceding regulations of the empire, and abridging the tedious proceedings at law; and, above all things, he pressed them to resolve upon granting such succours as should be sufficient to withstand the invasions of the Turk. Much time was consumed in deliberations upon these subjects, in the course of which some of the states took occasion to accuse Frederic elector palatine, of professing a religion contrary to the statutes of the empire; a charge, in consequence of which, that prince in open diet declared, that he professed no other religion than that which was conformable to the doctrine of the prophets and apostles, as contained in the confession of Augsburg, and the apology for that confession, which had been approved of in the last assembly of the Protestants at Naumburg. Nay, so much was he affected by this accusation, that by the hands of duke John Casimir, his son, he presented the bible and confession of Augsburg to the Protestant states, desiring he might be convicted of his error from those two books; a proposal by which he shut the mouths of these envious persons, who had thus impeached his character. This enmity against the elector was fomented by the practices of cardinal Commendori, who was sent thither by pope Pius the fifth, with orders to protest publicly against the discussion of any religious point; and in case the diet should proceed, notwithstanding that caveat, to threaten the whole assembly with excommunication, and in particular to declare that his holiness would depose the emperor, and divest him of all his dominions <sup>d</sup>.

IN this diet it was proposed to execute the decree of a former diet, issued against a certain gentleman of Franconia, called Grombach, who had been put under the ban of the empire, for having assassinated Melchior Hobil, bishop and prince of Wurtzburg. The decree, though issued about seven years, could not be hitherto executed, because John Frederic, duke of Saxony, son of the elector of that name, protected him in his fortrels of Gotha. However, as the impunity of such a criminal might be attended with very bad consequences in the empire, it was now ordained, that the duke should be compelled by force to surrender Grombach and his accomplices. Nor was this the only resolution taken upon the subject; for as it was well known that John Frederic granted this protection to those cri-

- a minals, that he might have a pretext for arming, and that the troops he levied were not so much designed for the defence of such malefactors, as for recovering the electorate of which his father had been divested, and even seizing upon the imperial throne itself, according to the vain prediction of a magician, who had acquired his confidence; for these reasons, I say, the diet resolved, that he should be pursued as a perturbator of the public peace, while the emperor promised to furnish a body of troops sufficient to force his town of Gotba, and make sure of himself and his fortress; and as he thought the conduct of this expedition could not be entrusted with a more proper person than Augustus, whom he had already invested with the electorate of Saxony, that prince was accordingly employed to command the army, and execute the decree of the diet<sup>e</sup>. Maximilian, having regulated
- b all the interior affairs of the empire, earnestly exhorted the states to provide for its exterior occasions; and, particularly, to find some means for opposing the Turks, who now again threatened Hungary; for Solyman was actually employed in making preparations for revenging upon that kingdom the affront which he had received before Malta, from whence he had, the preceding year, been obliged to make a shameful retreat, after a siege of four months, during which he had lost a great number of troops. The states for this service granted supplies sufficient to maintain forty thousand foot and eight thousand horse; and, as there was no time to lose, Maximilian dismissed the diet, and repaired to Vienna, in order to make the necessary preparations; for, by this time, the army of the Turks was said to amount to two hundred thousand men. The emperor exerted himself so industriously on
- c this occasion, that he was soon in a condition to take the field with fourscore thousand foot and twenty thousand horse; and having received intelligence that Solyman had already invested Zigbet, of which the brave count Zerini was governor, he marched directly to Javarin, from whence he might observe the enemy. But he was advised to remain wholly on the defensive, without hazarding a battle; and while he looked tamely on, the Turks had leisure to ruin all the fortifications of the city, and reduce the governor to such extremity, that he resolved to sally out upon the besiegers with three hundred chosen men, who, with himself, were surrounded and cut in pieces; so that the town was taken in course. Maximilian was no sooner apprised of the fate of this place, than he made his retreat to Austria; for which he is justly accused of misconduct, because he might have taken advantage of
- d that consternation which prevailed among the Turkish generals on account of the death of Solyman, who was carried off by a fit of the apoplexy two days before the town was taken, and Selim, his son and successor, being absent, they were necessarily involved in perplexity and confusion, because they had no orders to act, and knew not what measures to take<sup>f</sup>.
- BEFORE the emperor left Hungary, he placed strong garrisons in the principal towns of that kingdom; so that Selim, foreseeing that it would be difficult to make much progress on that side, was the more disposed to listen to the proposals for a truce, which was actually concluded between the two emperors for twelve years, on the usual conditions, specifying that each should retain the conquests he had made; an article which redounded to the advantage of Maximilian, whose general Schuendi had taken a great many places from the
- e enemy. These precautions being taken, Maximilian at his return sent a reinforcement of troops and other necessaries to the elector of Saxony, who had not yet finished the siege of Gotba; and that prince, being thus reinforced, soon compelled the town and fortress to surrender, on the conditions which he was pleased to impose. He was no sooner master of the place, than he punished Grombach and his accomplices with different kinds of death, according to the quality of their crimes. Duke John Frederic, whom he had made prisoner, was sent to the emperor, by whose orders he was imprisoned during life; and, that the place might never afterwards yield a retreat to the disturbers of their country, the fortifications of the town and castle were razed to the ground. This affair being ended, Maximilian convoked a diet at Fulde, in order to take measures for preventing the troubles to
- f which Germany might be exposed from the divisions and disorders which every day increased in the Low Countries. He had likewise observed, that some princes of the empire interested themselves too much in the affairs of the Huguenots of France; to the assistance of whom, prince John Casimir<sup>g</sup>, son of the elector palatine, had already marched with seven thousand horse and three thousand foot. He, therefore, took wise precautions, and persuaded the diet to issue out several decrees for the maintenance of peace in Germany; for that was the goal to which all his thoughts and all his endeavours were directed. From the same motive, he interposed in a difference, that happened the following year, between the city of Triers and the elector, who had never been able to reduce the inhabitants to obedience. He pretended, that the town was immediately subject to him, as superior and sovereign, to
- g whom they owed the oath of allegiance; that it was his prerogative to lay the necessary

taxes, establish the magistracy, keep the keys of the gates, judge all criminal processes, and order the laws to be put in execution. The citizens, on the contrary, alledged, that from time immemorial these rights belonged to them, without depending on the archbishop, except under certain conditions. The elector, therefore, seeing he had nothing to expect by fair means, invested the town on the sixth of June, and the siege lasted to the month of August, when the emperor and the other electors interposed, in order to mediate an accommodation. Accordingly they effected a treaty, in which it was stipulated, that the archbishop should raise the siege; that he should do no injury to the persons or effects of the inhabitants; that he should enter the city with some companies of horse and foot; that the general officers and guard of the elector should lodge in the place, and quarters be assigned to the rest elsewhere; and finally, that the difference should be referred to the determination of the emperor and electors<sup>a</sup>.

MAXIMILIAN's inclination for peace being perfectly well known, the Protestants of the states of Austria, to whom he had formerly refused the free exercise of their religion, resolved to take the advantage of his present disposition for obtaining that indulgence. They had the more reason to expect success, because at this time they had done him a very singular favour, in cancelling a considerable debt, which he had incurred by borrowing sums from them for the expence of the war against the Turk. In effect, the conjunction was so favourable for them, that, after pressing solicitations, the Protestant nobility were indulged with the free exercise of their religion in their castles, cities, and villages. To this condescension he was swayed, not only by motives of gratitude, but likewise by a natural sweetness of disposition, and a full persuasion that constraint and persecution serve only to widen the breach in all religious disputes.

In consequence of this moderation, he could not, without great pain and anxiety, hear the reports that were made of the horrible cruelties which the duke of Alva and Requesenes, great commander of Castile, practised in the Low Countries, with a view to force the consciences of the people: he, therefore, sent his brother Charles to Philip king of Spain, to intreat that prince to moderate those proceedings, lest an entire desertion of the provinces should ensue, and the states of the empire be affected by the evil example of such violence and persecution. These remonstrances, however, produced no effect; on the contrary, the war in the Low Countries began to rage more than ever, and in a little time was attended with those important consequences which are so well known.

From the same principles, he refused to Charles the ninth of France, the permission to make levies in Germany, for acting against those of the reformed religion: but the Protestants of Germany did not fail to send succours to the Huguenots of France, being not only moved with sympathy and compassion for their brethren in distress, but also induced by motives of self preservation; for they understood that the pope had entered into a league with the kings of France and Spain, for extirminating all dissenters from the Catholic religion; and that the duke of Alva acted on the same principle in the Low Countries. Whatever alliance of this nature those princes might have formed, certain it is the scheme was never carried into execution. The king of France even excused himself from engaging in the league against the Turk, alledging that his finances were utterly exhausted, and his kingdom reduced to a deplorable condition, by the intestine war which he maintained against the Huguenots<sup>b</sup>.

A. D. 1571.

In the mean time, the king of Spain joined his maritime forces with those of the pope, Venetians, duke of Savoy, Genoese, and Maltese, in order to act in concert against the infidels, from whom they apprehended some new design, as Selim, flushed with the conquest of Cyprus, which he had taken from the Venetians, still kept his naval army assembled about the gulph of Lepanto. The Christians, apprised of their situation, set sail in quest of them, under the conduct of John of Austria, natural son of Charles the fifth, who was invested with the supreme command, and a famous battle ensued, in which the Turks were totally defeated<sup>c</sup>.

A. D. 1572.

THOUGH the emperor would not engage in this alliance of the Christian princes against the Turk, on account of the truce which he had some time before concluded, he, nevertheless, took all necessary precautions for the security of his Hungarian dominions. For this purpose he concluded a treaty with John Sigismund, prince of Transylvania, who thereby obliged himself to renounce the title of king of Hungary, which, in imitation of his father, he had usurped, and to acknowledge himself a vassal of the emperor, although he was tributary to the Turk; but this prince dying in a few days after he had ratified the treaty, Maximilian renewed it with Stephen Bathori, whom the Turks of Transylvania had elected in his place.

THE emperor not only secured the peace of Hungary in this manner, but also managed the states with such dexterity, that they were prevailed upon to elect his eldest son Rodol-

a phus as his successor to the crown of that kingdom. Then he returned to Vienna, in order to secure him in his succession to the throne of Bohemia, and afterwards to procure his being elected king of the Romans. For his second son, he fixed his eyes upon Poland, at that time vacant by the death of Sigismund, the last of the house of Jagellon; but in this project he was disappointed by Henry duke of Valois, brother of Charles the ninth of France, who obtained that crown in preference to all his competitors.

YET Maximilian's hopes were revived by the abdication of Henry, who, in about a year after his election, abandoned this throne in order to ascend that of France, the crown of which was devolved to him by the death of his brother. This second vacancy, however, was not more favourable to the emperor than the first; for whether he was not industrious enough in canvassing among the principal palatines of Poland, or these noblemen were afraid of augmenting the power of the house of Austria, they rejected his proposal, and chose Stephen Bathori (F) prince of Transylvania, who, by his merit and valour, had acquired their love and veneration<sup>1</sup>. Maximilian, far from dropping his pretensions, resolved to support them by force of arms; because he foresaw that should he once make himself master of that kingdom, he would be in a condition to check the progress of the Turks, by whom he was incessantly molested. He, therefore, began to make preparations for asserting his claim with the sword: but, at the same time, continued, with great application, to negotiate with the states of Bohemia and the electors of the empire in favour of his son Rodolphus, who was actually crowned at Prague, and afterwards created king of the Romans.

c THE emperor, having thus regulated the affairs of his own family, employed his whole attention, for several months, on those of the empire. He likewise explained to the diet his design upon Poland; but this, and all his other projects, were interrupted by a distemper, which induced him to relinquish all worldly affairs, and turn his thoughts entirely upon the concerns of his soul. He had, for a long time, in his familiar parties, been accustomed to discourse upon the immortality of the soul; and even seemed to take pleasure in meditating upon death, which he now encountered with great constancy and resignation in the fiftieth year of his age<sup>m</sup>.

d THIS prince was extremely affable, and accessible to those who wanted to speak with him on any particular business; insomuch, that he never mortified one person with a refusal, or harsh word: he was of a forgiving temper, averse to flattery, an enemy to slander, and a passionate lover of truth: he despised luxury, avoided all excess, and was never known to purchase one jewel for his personal attire; he was well versed in war, which he conducted with equal skill and activity, notwithstanding his want of success in Hungary. So regular was his œconomy, that a set hour was assigned to every different action of his life; and every day, after dinner, he allowed even the meanest of his subjects to approach him, when they had any complaint to make, or any thing of consequence to propose: in a word, he was a tender parent and affectionate husband, having lived, for the space of twenty-nine years, in the utmost harmony with Mary his empress, by whom he had fifteen children<sup>n</sup> (G).

provinces. He accordingly embraced the proposal, with the consent of the emperor; and going thither, at first conducted their affairs to their satisfaction: but, in the sequel, they were induced, by the jealousy they entertained of all the princes of the house of Austria, to dismiss him from this employment, though he was very honourably discharged, and his place supplied by the duke of Anjou°.

He lays the Protestants of Austria under restrictions in point of religion.

THE emperor was warmed with all his father's zeal for the Roman Catholic religion, without that charity and moderation which had induced Maximilian to indulge the Protestants with liberty of conscience. He pretended, that those of Austria had extended their privileges beyond the concession which had been made in their favour; and therefore abridged them in the exercise of their religion, which he confined to the country-houses of certain gentlemen; though he resolved scrupulously to observe the pacification of Passau, by which, among other things, it was stipulated, that every prelate, in renouncing the Catholic religion, should be deprived of his benefice.

AT the desire of Philip king of Spain, and John of Austria, at that time governor of the Low Countries, Rodolphus had sent ambassadors to the confederate estates, exhorting them to listen to terms of accommodation, return to the ancient religion they had relinquished, and the allegiance which they owed to their natural prince. To this admonition they replied by a representation of their grievances, and the oppression under which they groaned from the tyranny of their governors, who, in the exercise of their power, had expressly infringed the articles of the treaty of Ghent. They, therefore, implored the good offices of the emperor, and sent an ambassador to the diet, which Rodolphus had convoked at Worms, in order to take cognizance of their affairs. Here Philip de Marnix, sieur de St. Aldegonde, who was their deputy, expatiated in a noble harangue upon the miseries of the Low Countries, and pathetically supplicated the assistance of the empire, which, however, he could not obtain, on account of the weight and influence of their oppressors, who represented them as a set of contumacious fanatics, in an actual state of rebellion; so that, disappointed in this quarter, they put themselves under the protection of Elizabeth queen of England.

Augsburg.

DURING the next diet, which the emperor called at Augsburg, in order to regulate the affairs of the empire, and particularly those of religion, which he had very much at heart, Gebbert Trusches, archbishop and elector of Cologne, who had espoused the Lutheran doctrine, sent deputies to the assembly, where he knew there was a good number of Protestant princes, with a view to obtain liberty of conscience in his diocese; and he would have, doubtless, accomplished his aim, had he not met with an obstinate opposition from the senate of Cologne, and the chapter of the cathedral, by which he was so much irritated, that, on pretence of defending the confines of his archbishopric against the enterprizes of the Flemings, he assembled a body of troops, and being assisted by some Protestant princes, surprised the city of Bonn, pillaged the treasure of the church, which was kept in the castle of Bruelle, granted liberty of conscience to his subjects, and publicly married Agnes, canons of Gurishim, and daughter of John George count de Mansfeld, of whose exquisite beauty he was very much enamoured. The pope and the emperor employed their whole endeavours and exhortations, in order to reclaim this apostate from the church of Rome; but finding him unshaken in his new principles, he was excommunicated, formally deposed, and his place supplied with Ernestus, son of Albert the fifth, duke of Bavaria. This new-elected archbishop, being obliged to support his new dignity by force against his deposed predecessor, he took the field with a body of his father's troops, reinforced by those of the emperor; and after several engagements, in which victory sometimes declared for one side, and sometimes for the other, Trusches was at last expelled from his dominions, and obliged to retire with his fair Agnes into Holland, where he spent the rest of his days in very narrow circumstances; while Ernestus, having got possession of the archbishopric, would suffer no religion to be exercised but the Roman Catholic, which hath been ever since maintained in that place; and the emperor, by an investiture, confirmed his new dignity.

RODOLPHUS, that he might have the more leisure to apply himself to the affairs of the empire, had taken the precaution to prolong the truce for eight years with Amurath the third; nevertheless the Turks, without paying any regard to this prolongation of the truce, began to make incursions into Hungary and Croatia; and a body often thousand men actually carried their ravages as far as the frontiers of Carniola, from whence they carried off a great number of Christians and cattle, together with a vast quantity of effects; but the archduke Ernestus, the emperor's brother, pursued them into Croatia, where they were utterly defeated, and their general slain.

THE same success did not attend his brother Maximilian, who three years afterwards was elected king of Poland, by part of the states of that kingdom, vacant by the death of a Stephen. He was obliged to support his claim by force against Sigismund, the son of John king of Sweden, who was likewise elected by a greater number, and that of the strongest party. The two competitors taking the field soon came to battle, in which Maximilian was routed and taken prisoner by his antagonist, who detained him in captivity till next year, when he was released in consequence of having renounced his claim to the crown of Poland.

AMURATH the third, notwithstanding the truce which he had renewed with Rodolphus, without any provocation marched an army into the field, made himself master of Repitch, Wibitsk, and some other towns of Croatia; and even arrested at Weissenburg, Frederic Krecovier, the emperor's ambassador, whom he ordered to be shut up in a tower, where he soon after died. The emperor, provoked at these hostilities, and this outrageous violation of the law of nations, sent into the field with great expedition, an army consisting of five and forty thousand men, which, having found the Turks between two rivers near Sisség, an abbey and strong castle in Croatia, attacked them with such vigour, that they were entirely defeated; their bashaw, together with several other officers and soldiers, being either killed or drowned; while the Imperialists lost not above an hundred men. Amurath no sooner received the news of this defeat, than he sent thither another army, which took Sisség: then he marched another stronger still into Hungary, where it committed great devastations, and took Wesprin, together with some other places: but the emperor having reinforced his troops, they advanced towards Belgrade, where a battle ensued, in which the Turks lost upwards of twelve thousand men. A few days after this success, Tieffembach, the emperor's lieutenant general in High Hungary, having collected a body of twenty thousand men, surprised and took by assault Zabatic, a fortress at that time deemed impregnable, and put all the Turks of the garrison to the sword, after he had defeated the succours which the bashaws of Buda and Temiswear had endeavoured to throw into the place. In less than a month he retook Fillick, and eleven other strong castles, which had been for thirty years in the possession of the Turks. He likewise delivered from slavery, an infinite number of Christians, and freed many towns and countries from the tribute of those infidels. The emperor, resolving to profit by his good fortune, sent into Hungary his brother Matthias, who made himself master of Novigrad by composition, while the counts de Serin and Nadafti drove the Turks from the fortresses of Bressens, Seczin, and Segeft, in Lower Hungary. These conquests were followed by the battle of Hatvan, fought on the first day of May, in which the Imperialists were again victorious.

The Turks are defeated near Sisség. A. D. 1593.

And at Belgrade.

THE extraordinary expence in which the emperor was engaged by this war, obliged him to convoke a diet at Ratisbon, where having explained the infidelity of the Turks, in attacking his dominions without any regard to the truce which he had renewed, the necessity of repelling force by force, and the extraordinary expence of the war, he told them he was obliged to have recourse to their assistance; and the states, having taken the case into consideration, granted a supply of some Roman months, with which he was very well satisfied. They made divers regulations touching the levies, quarters, march, and pay of the troops: they likewise laid the chamber of justice under certain restrictions, and took cognizance of some other affairs*. But with regard to the Low Countries, notwithstanding the complaints that were brought to the diet from that quarter, they took no other resolution but that of deputing some princes of the empire to the confederated states, in order to concert measures for an accommodation. At the same time, they intimated this resolution to the archduke Ernestus, the emperor's brother, who was at that time governor-general of the Low Countries; but that prince died the following year, before any thing of consequence could be transacted. The diet ended with the ceremony of investiture, which the emperor conferred upon the elector of Cologne, the palatine, the dukes of Pomerania and Wirtemberg, and some other states, that they might peaceably enjoy their principalities and fiefs. Then Rodolphus returned to Prague, in order to make the necessary preparations for the defence of Hungary, which was now become the object of his whole attention, as the grand vizir Sinan, general of the Turks, being reinforced with a powerful army of Tartars, had constrained the archduke Matthias to raise the siege of Graan. This vizir likewise had made himself master of the fortresses of Thata and St. Martin, and invested Raab or Javerin, of which he soon obtained the possession, by the cowardice and villainy of the governor, who, in consideration of a sum of money, delivered up that important place.

g This progress of Sinan, however, was stopt by those troops which the emperor ordered to advance and reinforce the army of his brother Matthias; but that which chiefly contributed to the repulse of the infidels, was the behaviour of Sigismund Bathori, prince of Transylvania, who quitted the side of Amurath, and engaged in a particular alliance with the emperor, by which it was stipulated, that they should join their forces, and act in concert against the Turks. In the beginning of the following year, Bathori engaged the vaivodes of Moldavia and Walachia in the same league; and these three princes so vigorously attacked the Turks and Tartars, who had entered their dominions, that few or none of either nation lived to return to their own countries. On the other hand, the archduke Matthias had invested Graan, and given the direction of the siege to his lieutenant-general, Charles count de Mansfeld, a brave and experienced officer; and the Turks approaching to succour the place, a battle was fought, in which they were entirely routed with the loss of five thousand men, and almost all their leaders. The consequence of this engagement was the surrender of Graan, the strongest place of that country; and this conquest was followed by that of several other fortresses and castles, which he took with extraordinary diligence and success <sup>y</sup>.

rendered to Mahomet III.
A. D. 1596.

THE following year was not so fortunate to the Imperialists. Mahomet the third, who some months ago had succeeded to his father Amurath in the Othoman empire, resolved to signalize the beginning of his reign by some great exploit; and for that purpose marched with an army of an hundred and fifty thousand men to the siege of Agria, one of the most important places of High Hungary. At first the garrison made a resolute defence, in expectation of a powerful succour, which the emperor had sent to them under the conduct of his brother the archduke Maximilian: but that prince being retarded by the rains and bad roads, the soldiers of the town, who had been always licentious, grew impatient at the delay, and even compelled the governor to capitulate, and surrender the place upon dishonourable conditions. This baseness was revenged by the Turks themselves, who enraged at the great loss they had sustained before the town, disregarded the capitulation, and put the whole garrison, man, woman, and child to the sword <sup>z</sup>.

THE archduke Maximilian, being mortified with this misfortune, and inflamed with a desire of revenge, approached the enemy's camp, and harassed them with all his power. At length a battle ensued, in which the Turks were routed, with the loss of twelve thousand men, their artillery taken, and without doubt the action would have been decisive, if an Italian renegado, who perceiving that the Imperialists, instead of pursuing their victory, amused themselves with plunder, had not returned to the charge with fresh troops, by which the fortune of the day was reversed, and the Germans put to flight in their turn. He would not, however, venture to pursue them farther than the field of battle; so that the archduke, prince of Transylvania, Tieffembach, and other officers, had time to rally their forces, and recollect themselves from the confusion produced by this check, which cost them five or six thousand men. After this battle, Mahomet seeing his army greatly diminished by the siege of Agria, and this last encounter, resolved to return to Constantinople, where he abandoned himself to his pleasures.

HE left ten thousand men in Agria, and shared the command of the rest of his army among his generals, who were so much divided by jealousy, that they could not act in concert, and when the sultan retired, gave themselves no farther concern about the progress of his arms. This neglect having raised the spirits of the Imperialists and Hungarians, they, under the conduct of count Nadaſti, and the barons of Bernsteen and Palfi, formed a scheme for surprising the fortress of Tata in Hungary, and actually carried it into execution; while the archduke Maximilian, reinforced by the emperor with a new supply of troops, made preparations for attacking the town of Pappa, near Raab, which was accordingly taken <sup>a</sup>.

and Buda.

THE following campaign commenced with a very extraordinary exploit of Adolphus baron of Schuartzemberg, who, understanding that the Turks in garrison at Raab were very remiss in their duty, resolved, if possible, to surprise that fortress. Having concerted the measures with a French gentlemen, whose name was Vaubecour, they applied a petard to one of the gates, which being burst open, the troops entered the place, and made themselves master of it, after an action which lasted four hours, during which sixteen hundred Turks were killed upon the spot, and seven hundred taken prisoners. The archduke Matthias, who commanded in Lower Hungary, practised the same expedient, with the same success, at Buda, where he found a great booty, with upwards of eighty pieces of cannon, and delivered seven thousand Christians from slavery: but he was obliged to retire without having reduced the castle; and that miscarriage provoked him to set the town on fire. In order to revenge these insults, the Turks and Tartars, to the number of an hundred and fifty thousand, entered Upper Hungary, with a resolution to force the town of Waradin, which was defended by Melchior de Redren baron de Friedland, grand marshal of the archduke Maximilian, with a garrison of two thousand soldiers, assisted by the inhabitants. During six weeks, he sustained the siege with such vigour, that the Turks were constrained to make a shameful retreat, after having lost a great many men in different sallies from the place, in which no more than seven hundred fighting men remained when the siege was raised <sup>b</sup>.

- a ABOUT that time, the archduke Maximilian was established governor of Transylvania, in consequence of the cession which Sigismund Bathori had made of that province to the emperor, in exchange for some duchies in Silesia, with an annual pension of forty thousand crowns: but after Bathori had staid two months in his new territory, perceiving that the bargain he had made was far from being advantageous, he privately returned to Colosvar, or Clofomburg, in Transylvania, where he had left his wife, who was daughter of the archduke Charles of Austria; and notwithstanding the levity which appeared in his disposition, he was joyfully received by the states of the country, who dreaded the dominion of the princes of the house of Austria, whose sway, they said, extended to the souls as well as the bodies and effects of their subjects. Besides, they were afraid that the young prince might be provoked by a refusal to reclaim the protection of the sultan, who would not fail to establish him in his dominions at their expence.

A. D. 1599.

- b THE Turks, in the mean time, to the number of sixty thousand men, under the conduct of Ibrahim Bassa, had so successfully advanced their affairs on the other side of the Danube upon the confines of Lower Hungary, that, after having repulsed the duke de Merccur, who attempted to throw succours into Canise, they made themselves masters of that and several other places; but the duke having received from the emperor a reinforcement of troops, which, together with his own, composed an army of five and twenty thousand men, he resolved to take his revenge; and advancing into Transylvania, retook by assault the town of Cronveissenburg, and gained several other advantages over the infidels. Nevertheless, after he retired, they renewed their attempts on this place, and next year reduced it again to their dominion.

Progress of the war in Hungary.

- c As all these expeditions could not be carried on without a very great effusion of human blood, both sides began to be tired of the war in Hungary, and serious thoughts of peace were entertained. A negotiation was first begun with Stephen Botsckay, an Hungarian nobleman, of the Calvinist persuasion, who, since the defeat of Bathori, and his retreat into Poland, had with the assistance of the Turk, seized the principality of Transylvania and that portion of Hungary which Bathori possessed (H).

- d A TREATY was accordingly concluded between the emperor, the states of Hungary, and this prince Botsckay, importing among other things, that the Catholics, Lutherans, and Calvinists, should enjoy the free exercise of their religion in Hungary; that Botsckay should remain prince of Transylvania during life; that a peace should be negotiated with the Turk; that the states of Hungary might, in the absence of the emperor, choose the archduke Matthias for their palatine or governor; that all the other posts should be conferred upon the natives of the country; and that the jesuits should possess nothing of their own, except the presents made them by the emperor.

A treaty concluded between the emperor and Botsckay.

- e THERE was more difficulty in treating with sultan Achmet, who had succeeded Mahomet the third; for the negotiation lasted near two years, when at length an accommodation was concluded on these conditions; that the sultan should treat the emperor as father, and the emperor treat the sultan as son, in all their letters and negotiations; that the king of Spain should (if he pleased) be comprehended in the treaty, as well as the Tartars upon the Turks assurance, that they would forbear from making incursions on the Christians; that this truce or cessation of arms should continue twenty years; that both parties should mutually send presents to each other every three years, and the emperor begin without delay, by sending one to the amount of two hundred thousand florins, which should afterwards be required by another of the like value from the sultan; that each should possess what he occupied, without pretending to impose any other taxes on their new acquisitions, than those which they paid before the war; that they should not, on any pretence whatever, attack each other in any particular place; that they should be at liberty to repair their respective fortresses; and that the agreement made with Botsckay, prince of Transylvania, should subsist in its full force (I).

Peace established with the Turks.
A. D. 1606.

THESE treaties being ratified by the two emperors, the states of Hungary assembled at Presburg, were informed that Rodolphus, on account of his infirmities, was neither able nor willing to visit them, in consequence of their pressing solicitations, that the affairs of the kingdom might be settled on the ancient footing. They likewise understood, that in pre-

(H) Sigismund Bathori, being a man of an unsteady mind, devoid of resolution, and afraid of the emperor's resentment, resigned his right to Transylvania in favour of his cousin cardinal Andrew Bathori, who was defeated and slain by the troops of the emperor; while Sigismund fled into Poland (1).

(I) About this time, an ambassador arrived at Prague from Persia, in order to dissuade the emperor, from making peace with the Turks: the same person had been sent to Spain for the same purpose, with very rich presents, among which were several cups of glass of such a texture that it could not be broke (2).

judice of his brothers, he expressed a strong inclination to favour and raise the archdukes Ferdinand and Leopold, his first cousins, who were entirely under the direction of the jesuits, whom the Protestants considered as their declared enemies. These reasons induced the Hungarians to invite and receive the archduke Matthias as their governor, according to the liberty granted to them in the treaty concluded with the prince of Transylvania. Nay, in order to deprive Ferdinand and Leopold of any hope they might entertain of ascending the throne of Hungary, they, in consideration of the emperor's infirmities and want of issue, elected his next heir Matthias for their king, on condition that he should confirm all their privileges, and indulge them with the liberty of professing in public, the new religion, which the greatest part of them had embraced <sup>a</sup>.

THE report of this election, and the conditions under which it was made and accepted, being spread through all Germany, the Protestants of Bohemia began to bestir themselves, and actually sent some of the most considerable among them to persuade Matthias to come into Bohemia, where they did not doubt of prevailing upon the states to follow the example of the Hungarians, provided he would secure them in the same privileges. Matthias, in consequence of this invitation, assembled his troops without loss of time, and marched towards that kingdom, taking his route through Austria, of which also he endeavoured to make himself master. <sup>b</sup>

THE emperor, irritated at this conduct, had taken measures for opposing the designs of his brother; but the electors and princes of the empire, apprehending troublesome consequences from such a dispute, sent deputies to meet Matthias, to represent the danger that would attend his enterprize, and to persuade him, if possible, to listen to terms of accommodation with the emperor, who (they assured him) was very well disposed for that purpose. On this assurance he complied with their advice, and matters were managed so much in his favour, by the interposition of the princes, that a treaty was concluded and signed at Prague, by which the emperor, for the sake of peace, yielded to him Hungary and Austria, and even promised to secure him in the succession to Bohemia, provided he himself should die without male issue. In consequence of this accommodation, Matthias received the royal ornaments of Hungary, by the hands of cardinal Diedrichstein, who presented them in presence of the archduke Maximilian, and a great number of princes and noblemen: then he retired with his army towards Vienna, which he entered in triumph. There he took possession of the archduchy, and ratified the truce with the Grand Seignior's ambassador, who afterwards repaired to Prague, to obtain the same ratification from his Imperial majesty. <sup>c</sup>

MATTHIAS, having been inaugurated by the states of Austria, returned to Hungary, on the frontiers of which he was received by the principal noblemen of the kingdom, at the head of ten thousand men, who conducted him to Presburg, where he granted authentic letters, confirming them in their privileges and liberty of conscience, and was afterwards consecrated with the usual ceremony <sup>d</sup>.

THE emperor in the mean time, instead of disbanding his troops, according to the agreement at Prague, allowed them to live at discretion in the bishopric of Passau, from whence they made incursions into Bohemia, ravaging the country, as they had formerly acted under the command of the archduke Leopold, his cousin-german. These disorders gave disgust to the states of the empire, as well as to those of Bohemia; and the Protestants, who were the greatest sufferers, took occasion with those of Austria, to avail themselves of their number and strength, and oblige Rodolphus by force to indulge them in that which they could not obtain by dint of intreaty and solicitation. The conjuncture was the more favourable, as a new quarrel, about this time, happened between the emperor and Matthias, this last having perceived that the other intended to make one of the archdukes of Gratz king of the Romans, to his prejudice; he, therefore, made preparations for opposing this design; and Rodolphus, fearing that he would be joined by the Protestants, whom he was known to favour in private, was fain to redress their grievances. They were, accordingly, by letters patent, indulged in liberty of conscience, and allowed to build churches and schools upon their own funds, in any place whatever, and even without the permission of the lord of the fief or high-justice. <sup>e</sup>

stant alliance, called the
union.

ENCOURAGED by this condescension, the other Protestants of the empire solicited the same indulgence, which being refused, they resolved to consult their own safety by other means; and a new alliance or association was proposed. In a little time, this was actually concluded between the prince palatine elector, the duke of Wirtemberg, Maurice landgrave of Hesse, Ernest marquis of Osnobach, Frederic marquis of Badendourlach, Christian prince of Anbalt, and several other princes, together with the greatest part of the Imperial towns. The alliance was distinguished by the name of the union, and the princes engaged in it assumed the appellation of correspondents, of which the elector-palatine was declared the <sup>f</sup> chief. <sup>g</sup>

a chief. This association was opposed by another, formed on pretence of preserving the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion, by the electors of Mentz, Cologne, and Trier, the archbishop of Saltzburg, the bishops of Bamberg, Wirtzburg, and Aichstedt, the duke of Bavaria, who was constituted chief, the archdukes of Austria, and others. It was called the Catholic league, and differed from the nature of the union, in comprehending foreigners, such as the pope and the king of Spain: nay, the bishop of Spire and the seigneur Helfenstein were sent into France, to engage that crown in this alliance <sup>b</sup>.

THE chief motive that induced each party to take these precautions, was the succession to the duchies of Juliers and Cleves, in which both, either directly or indirectly, interested themselves. John William duke of Cleves, Juliers, and Bergue, count de la Marck and Ravensbourg, had died without children; but he had several collateral heirs by his four sisters, Maria-Eleonora, Anne, Magdalen, and Sybilla, who were married in the families of Brandenburg, Neuburg, Deux ponts, and Austria-Burgaw. The principal competitors were John Sigismund, elector of Brandenburg, son of Anne, eldest daughter of Albert-Frederic, marquis of Brandenburg, and duke of Prussia, and of Mary-Eleonora, who was the eldest of those four sisters; and Wolfgang-William, son of Philip-Lewis, duke of Neuburg, and of Anne of Cleves, the second. These two princes, though both of the Protestant religion, openly disputed the succession. As for John the second, duke of Deux-ponts, son of John the first, and of Magdalen of Cleves, third sister of the same duke John-William; and Charles of Austria, marquis of Burgaw, who had married the fourth called Sybilla, they took no other than the ordinary course for supporting their pretensions. Besides these, there were other pretenders, namely, the dukes of Saxony, as descendants of John-Frederic, elector, and of Sybilla of Cleves, sister of William duke of Cleves, father of John-William, and of his four sisters; the duke of Nevers, of the same family, and the count of la Marck, marquis of Maulivrier; but the different claims of these three were of no importance <sup>c</sup>.

Contest about the succession of Juliers and Cleves.

d ALL these competitors published manifestos, and the most powerful of them prepared to maintain their right by dint of arms; a step which gave great offence to the emperor, who complained of it in a mandate addressed to the council of Juliers, in which he observed, that the constitutions of the empire prohibit those who have a claim upon any fief of Germany, from seizing it by their own private authority, but expressly enjoin them to obtain possession in the ordinary course of justice; he, therefore, in support of his own dignity, as well as to prevent the evil consequences which may arise from the conduct of those who disregard it, forbids any of the pretenders to the succession of Juliers, to take possession of their own accord, and cites all the claimants to appear within four months in his court, either personally or by proxy, in order to explain the nature of their several pretensions.

RODOLPHUS affirmed, that by the law of the empire, all such fiefs ought to be sequestered until the dispute should be determined, and this plea was not altogether without foundation; but there is great reason to suspect his design was to protract the contest, and in the mean time convert the fiefs to his own use. This suspicion alarmed the marquis of Brandenburg, and the prince of Neuburg, who in effect had the best title to the succession; and Maurice landgrave of Hesse having offered his mediation, they embraced his proposal of referring the difference to arbitration: in the mean time, they agreed to repair together to Dusseldorp, in order to assume conjunctly the administration of the estates belonging to the late duke of Cleves, and to join their forces against all those who should attempt to seize upon the succession. This transaction was agreeable to the regency of the country, and ratified by the king of France, whose protection they had implored <sup>e</sup>.

f AN assembly being at that time held in Dusseldorp, the duke and the marquis were received in that city by the magistrates, who resigned to them the government of the provinces of Juliers, Cleves, &c. of which they declared them legal possessors; but it was not so easy to gain possession of the countries situated on this side the Rhine; for while the states were sitting at Dusseldorp, the party attached to the house of Austria, had privately made themselves masters of Juliers, and the court of Vienna immediately sent Leopold of Austria thither in quality of governor, with orders to rule all the dependencies of the duchy in the emperor's name.

Marquis of Brandenburg and prince of Neuburg are declared legal possessors of Juliers.

LEOPOLD, by virtue of the powers with which he was invested, published an edict, forbidding the inhabitants to take the oath to the princes, on pain of confiscation of goods, and threatening all others who should favour their party with the pains of death. At first, this new governor behaved with good order and moderation, but at the same time tampered with the garrisons; and making himself master of those places which were weakly guarded, furnished them with soldiers, arms, and provisions: yet he did not succeed every where with the same facility, for which reason the emperor issued a new decree stronger than the first, declaring all princes guilty of leze-majesty, and ordering the magistrates, military officers, and soldiers, to abandon them, on pain of being put to the ban of the empire. a

THE court of Vienna having taken this measure, both sides prepared openly for war. The emperor and princes of his house were anxious to know in what manner France would interest itself in this affair, as they well knew the event would be favourable to the cause which that crown should espouse: the archdukes of Flanders, therefore, sent John Richardot to the king, and he was soon followed by the count of Hohen-Zollern, in quality of his Imperial majesty's ambassador. These two ministers represented to Henry the fourth, that the emperor had no design to invade the rights of the claimants; but had sent Leopold to Juliers, in order to govern the dominions of the late duke according to the laws of the empire, until the dispute about the succession should be fairly determined. b

HENRY had too much penetration to be duped by these pretences; he knew the ambition of the house of Austria, and was resolved to be a check upon its growing greatness. The matter was debated before the president Jeannin by the two ambassadors of Rodolphus, and the envoys of the princes sent thither to defend their cause; and the king declared in favour of these last, who had assisted him in his wars. He promised to succour them in his turn, and actually ordered some troops to defile towards the frontiers of Champagne, in order to support the marquis of Brandenburg and the duke of Neuburg<sup>1</sup>. The house of Austria was not idle upon this occasion; it circulated a report that the sole aim of the French was to enrich themselves with the pillage of the provinces in question, on pretence of supporting an alliance, to which in effect they had no real attachment: and this artifice c in a great measure succeeded, by arousing the jealousy of the Germans<sup>m</sup>.

WHILE these things were in agitation, the city of Donawert kindled a sort of a war in Suabia. The Protestants, who were the most powerful party, had expelled the Catholics, made themselves masters of the town, and rejected all the proposals of accommodation which were made by the emperor and his commissaries.

IN consequence of this obstinacy the town was proscribed, besieged, and compelled to sue for peace, by the duke of Bavaria, who, though he could have taken it by assault, would not expose it to the pillage of the troops; but preferred gentler methods to force, hoping, by this example of clemency, to prevent the cities of Ulm, Nuremberg, Nortlingen, and the other Protestant states of Suabia, from having recourse to such extremities; but he d was disappointed in his aim, for they joined their brethren of Bohemia, who, being daily threatened with the loss of their religious liberty and other privileges, were already in commotion; and all together complained of their grievances to the assembly, which at that time was held at Hall in Suabia, by the princes of the evangelic union, who accordingly promised to protect them.

THESE princes had assembled to deliberate upon the affair of Juliers, and almost all of their persuasion were present. In short, there was such a concourse of princes, deputies, and ambassadors, among whom was the sieur Boissiese, from Henry the fourth of France, that the number of votes amounted to forty. They agreed to undertake in good earnest the defence of the two princes possessors of Juliers and Cleves, to expel the sequestrator, e who had been appointed by the emperor, and for that purpose besiege the city of Juliers, where he was established. They likewise regulated the several proportions to be contributed for this service, in order to facilitate which, the ambassador of France promised eight thousand foot and two thousand horse, in the name of his master.

THE emperor, being apprised of this resolution, called a diet at Wirzburg, where all the electors, princes, and cities of his party, were invited to appear; and there measures were concerted for supporting the archduke Leopold, by means of a powerful army to be set on foot. After these consultations, nothing was to be seen through all Europe, but levies of troops and preparations of war, from which no state was exempted: a circumstance which plainly demonstrated, that besides the affairs of Juliers, there was some other great design f upon the anvil<sup>n</sup>.

A. D. 1610.

THIS consideration in a little time obliged Rodolphus to convoke another diet at Prague, whither several princes of both parties repaired: there, among other things, they proposed a reconciliation between the emperor and his brother Matthias; the election of a king of the Romans; the restitution of Donawert; and an accommodation in the affair of Cleves and Juliers. Touching the two first articles, nothing positive was determined; as for Donawert, it was ordained, that without any exception, the elector of Bavaria should leave the place in possession of its former liberty, after having indemnified himself for the expences of the siege. With regard to the affair of Juliers, the emperor proposed that the estates of the late duke John-William should be settled upon the elector of Saxony, and the g princes of his house, on condition that he should prove his title to be better than that of a any other competitor; that nothing should be changed in point of religion; but that he should satisfy the demands of the duke of Nevers, and the marquis of Burgaw, and pay the charges of the war, which had been incurred by the emperor and Leopold. Though this proposal was disagreeable to the greatest part of the assembly, it was carried in the affirmative; and the prince of Saxony, having agreed to fulfil the conditions, was invested with all the estates of the succession.

NOTWITHSTANDING the proceedings of the diet upon this last article, Maurice prince of Orange, and the prince of Anhalt, resolved to prosecute their design upon Juliers: and having assembled their troops, invested it without delay. This army was joined by twelve thousand foot and two thousand horse, sent thither by the king of France, under the command of the marshal la Chatre, and the place so vigorously pressed, that it was fain to surrender upon capitulation, and again delivered into the hands of the princes of Brandenburg and Neuburg, together with the other places belonging to the duchy of Juliers, which durst not make resistance.

NOTWITHSTANDING these transactions, both parties expressed a desire of seeing this grand affair accommodated, and the city of Cologne was named as a proper place for the conferences: thither repaired several princes, who were friends to both sides, together with the ambassadors of the emperor, the kings of France and England, the elector-palatine, the landgrave of Hesse, the duke of Saxony, and the United Provinces. A sequestration was proposed, though of a very different nature from that which had been effected by the emperor; but it was rejected by some, and among the rest by the duke of Neuburg; so that the assembly broke up without being able to bring matters to accommodation.

SOME months after this fruitless meeting, another was held in a castle near Leipsic, where the common friends of Saxony and Brandenburg endeavoured to compromise the affair between the two electors; and their efforts were crowned with such success, that they prevailed upon to sign a treaty, importing among other articles, that the estates of Cleves and Juliers should be possessed and governed by the elector and princes of Saxony, conjunctly with the elector of Brandenburg and the princes of Neuburg; that the emperor should be entreated to ratify this transaction; and that the family of Saxony should retain the investiture of these estates, which he had received from his Imperial majesty, without prejudice to that which Brandenburg and Neuburg had a right to demand. Nevertheless, this agreement was for that time ineffectual, because the duke of Neuburg would not give his assent; so that he and the duke of Brandenburg still remained masters of the succession.

BUT this affair was not the only source of discord between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants: these last loudly complained of other particular grievances in Bavaria, in the bishoprics of Strasburg and Passau, as well as at Aix-la-Chapelle. Those of Bohemia were likewise incensed, on account of the inquisition which the emperor wanted to establish in that kingdom, and of the mortifications which they daily suffered, in contempt of the privileges and liberty which they had formerly obtained. These outrages they suffered patiently for a long time; but, at length, they could no longer restrain their resentment, when they saw the archduke Leopold march into Bohemia, and surprise the little town of Prague, where he cantoned those troops which he had obliged himself to discharge, and evacuate the bishoprics of Strasburg and Passau.

UPON this emergency, they had recourse to king Matthias, who promised to assist them; and, in consequence of this promise, actually marched into Bohemia at the head of his army, resolving to oblige the emperor to withdraw his troops, and adhere to all the articles of his agreement with the Protestants. Accordingly Rodolphus, alarmed at the expeditious march of his brother, and the number of his forces, immediately embraced the terms of accommodation that were proposed: and it was, among other things, agreed, that the troops of the archduke Leopold should be forthwith paid and disbanded; and that the Protestants should be maintained in the liberty of conscience and other privileges which had been granted to them heretofore. But as the principal aim of Matthias in this expedition was to profit by the conjuncture in securing to himself the crown of Bohemia, he managed the pusillanimity of Rodolphus with such dexterity, that this weak prince consented to resign that kingdom in favour of his brother, and actually ceded it by an authentic deed, in which he commanded the states to acknowledge his brother Matthias as his successor in that kingdom. This resignation being very agreeable to the Bohemians, who were heartily tired of the emperor's sway, they next day proclaimed Matthias king of Bohemia; and he was crowned at Prague, in the chapel of St. Winceslaus, with nearly the same ceremonies which were observed at Presburg when he was crowned king of Hungary.

Matthias assists the Protestants;

3 LONDORP. t. 1. p. 96.

THE emperor, having thus divested himself of the kingdom of Bohemia, resolved likewise to transfer the small trouble he took concerning the affairs of the empire upon a king of the Romans, who should well acquit himself of the charge. For this purpose he convoked a diet at Mulhausen, from whence it was translated to Nuremberg, for the convenience of his going thither in person, with a view to concert measures with the princes electors, and finally determine upon the choice of a proper person to succeed him on the Imperial throne; but he being taken ill, the business for the present miscarried.

of the diet at Nuremberg.*

THE diet, however, sent ambassadors to Prague, where they found Rodolphus without any other company than the duke of Brunswic; and there they made remonstrances touching the situation of the empire. They, in the name of the electors, demanded that new regulations should be made for the administration of justice; that his Imperial majesty would change his ministers and counsellors, and summon a diet to be held in the beginning of the spring. They expressed their disapprobation of the step which Matthias had taken with regard to the emperor, whom, nevertheless, they, in some measure, blamed for the mal-administration of affairs; observing, that the cause of a great many disorders had been his omitting to imitate his predecessors, in communicating the most important affairs to the princes electors, who now besought his Imperial majesty to let them know where he intended to fix his abode, in case he should be disposed to leave Bohemia. With regard to a king of the Romans, they said they would do nothing except in concert with him; and that as they were inclined to pitch upon some prince of the house of Austria, they begged to know the person whom he wished to succeed him on the throne.

To these remonstrances Rodolphus replied, that he should be glad to see another diet convoked in some place where he could be personally present, before they should proceed to the election of his successor. Mean while, however, the electors agreed among themselves in private upon the person to be elected king of the Romans, having chosen him from the number of the competitors, who were king Matthias, the archduke Ferdinand of Gratz, the archduke Leopold of Inspruck, and Maximilian duke of Bavaria; but the decision of this, and other affairs, was referred to another diet, summoned to meet at Frankfort in the spring of the following year. During this interval, Matthias married the archduchess Ann Katharine of Inspruck, his own cousin-german; and the nuptials were solemnized at Vienna with great magnificence, though the emperor could not be present on the occasion.

dies.*

THAT prince, who, by the insinuations of Tycho Brake, was rendered jealous of his nearest relations, became every day more and more melancholy and distrustful, insomuch as to shut himself up in his palace, from which he never stirred, not even to church, till at length he was seized with a swelling and inflammation in his legs, of which, in a few weeks, he died unmarried in the fifty-ninth year of his age, and in the thirty-sixth of his reign, leaving to his successor abundance of gold and silver, together with a great quantity of jewels.

THIS prince was of a middling stature and pleasing aspect; remarkable for a sweetness of temper, a vivacity of parts, a delicacy of judgment, and an uncommon extent of capacity and understanding, by which he had acquired the reputation of an accomplished prince before he ascended the Imperial throne; while, by his zeal for religion, he had captivated the affections of his people. With these advantages he began his reign, the happy prefaces of which were, however, soon falsified by his future conduct; for, as he advanced in age, he proved himself altogether unfit for governing his dominions either in peace or war. His chief attention was engrossed by the sciences, particularly the study of mechanics; to which he was so much addicted, that he spent whole days in the shops of clock-makers and turners. His palace was filled with chymists; and one of his principal amusements consisted in the practice of that art. He passed many leisure hours in the stables among his horses, which he took great delight in contemplating; and often went thither in the dress of a groom, in order to avoid the eyes of the public. These occupations, so unbecoming an emperor, joined with a natural timidity, inspired his enemies with a contempt of his character, and encouraged them to undertake a great many schemes to the prejudice of the Imperial authority (K).

MATTHIAS, being advertised of the emperor's death, set out immediately from Vienna, with his queen and some noblemen; and arriving at Prague on the thirtieth of January,

(K) Notwithstanding these shades in his character, some authors represent him as one of the best princes that ever wore the Imperial crown, not only for his industry and address in pacifying the troubles of Germany, but also for his prowess and spirit in maintaining wars against the Turks (1).

The body of Rodolphus was deposited in the cathedral church of Prague on the sixth day of February; and about the beginning of October, his funeral rites were performed with great solemnity (2).

a caused one Rufcius to be apprehended for having favoured the faction of the archduke Leopold in Bohemia, and abused the authority of the emperor by levying large contributions in that kingdom. He was accordingly prosecuted with such rigour, as looked more like the rancour of personal enmity than the regular enquiry of justice; and the poor man, believing his adversaries implacable, made away with himself privately, in order to avoid the disgrace of a public execution. This effect of his despair confirmed the accusations that were brought against him. His body was delivered to the executioner, by whom it was dismembered, and his quarters exposed upon gibbets. An example of revenge rather than of justice; and a cruel affront to the memory of an emperor, who had always governed Bohemia with moderation *.

C H A P. XV.

Comprehending the Transactions of the Empire from the Death of Rodolphus, to the Election of the Elector-palatine to the Crown of Bohemia.

M A T T H I A S.

c I M M E D I A T E L Y after the death of Rodolphus, the elector of Saxony published a diploma in the provinces which follow the Saxon law, announcing the emperor's decease, exhorting the nobility and people to keep the peace, and have recourse to his tribunal for the decision of their affairs. As Frederic the fifth, elector-palatine, was not yet of age to exercise the vicariate, and take upon him the government of his own dominions, John count-palatine, duke of Deux-ponts, acted as his tutor, by the appointment of his deceased father; but Philip-Lewis, count palatine, duke of Neuburg, disputed with him this prerogative, as being nearer in blood to the elector; and these two separately published their patents as vicars and administrators of the empire †.

d I N the mean time, the archbishop of Mentz summoned the electors to repair to Frankfort upon the Maine, by the fourteenth of May, in order to elect a king of the Romans; and he himself was the first who arrived at that place with a grand retinue. He was soon followed by all the other electors, except the marquis of Brandenburg, who commissioned Adam Putlitz, marshal of his court, to represent his person. After much deliberation, in the course of which Albert of Austria, Maximilian of Bavaria, and the duke of Savoy, were severally proposed, Matthias was at length elected emperor, and crowned with universal applause.

Matthias is elected emperor.

He recommends unanimity to the princes.

e H A V I N G obtained the Imperial dignity, he recommended union and peace to the electors, princes, and states, protesting that his chief care should be to re-establish and maintain the tranquility of the empire. He then set out for Prague, where he employed some months in regulating the affairs of that kingdom; and these being settled, repaired to Vienna, where he fixed his residence.

f D U R I N G his stay at Prague, he had dispatched Negroni to the Othoman Porte, to complain of the enterprizes of Bathori, and of the protection which was granted him by the sultan. This minister being introduced to the divan, the prime vizir ordered the secretary to read the articles of peace concluded between the Grand Seignior and the emperor Rodolphus, as Negroni affirmed, that, according to the treaty, Botskai dying without heirs male Transylvania ought to revert to the house of Austria. No such article being found, the emperor's minister did not scruple to say that the copy was altered, and produced the two original treaties, signed by both parties, in which the article in question was inserted. The vizir declared that Botskai had no authority from the Porte to insert such a clause: Negroni replied, that the bashaw Amurath had actually signed the copy in which it was contained; the dispute lasted a full hour, and at length the determination of the affair was postponed, until Negroni should receive new instructions from the emperor ‡.

g A B O U T this time, an ambassador arrived from Persia, and another from Muscovy, and both had audience of the emperor at Prague. The first complained that, contrary to the promise of Rodolphus, peace had been concluded with the Turks: he advanced divers reasons for breaking that treaty, and concluded with demanding a categorical answer without delay.

Ambassadors arrive from Persia and Muscovy.

MATTHIAS answered, that he had the strongest inclination to maintain the friendship which his brother had contracted with the sopher; that the rebellions in Hungary had obliged his predecessor to make peace with the Turk; but in all probability it would not be of long continuance, as the empire would be under the necessity of undertaking the defence of Moldavia and Transylvania, which the Turks had already begun to harraß; that at the next diet he would concert measures with the princes, for restoring the tranquillity of these two provinces, and make the sophi acquainted with the resolutions that should be taken on that subject. The ambassador returned to his own country with this answer, and was accompanied by Adam Dorm, in quality of the emperor's resident at the court of Persia.

The Russians sue for the emperor's patronage and protection.

As for the Muscovite minister, he besought his Imperial majesty to interpose his mediation, so as to terminate the war between Muscovy and Poland, and to bestow upon Russia a prince who should re-establish the quiet of that country, which had been so many years desolated by the tyranny of their dukes. He then expatiated upon the cruelties of Boris, Demetrius, Zuiski, and other arbitrary princes, "Whose excesses (said the envoy) authorize our senate to claim your protection, and intreat that we may live according to our "own laws, under a prince of your appointing, who shall rule his subjects in equity and
"peace."

A. D. 1613.

MATTHIAS, having heard this address with secret pleasure, promised to satisfy the Muscovites, and even to employ his whole power in retrieving their peace; but, in order to be more certainly informed of the situation of their affairs, sent Peter Herman into Muscovy along with the ambassador.

In the midst of these transactions, Elizabeth princess of England was married to the elector-palatine, and the nuptials were solemnized at Heidelberg with great magnificence.

The Turks threaten Transylvania.

WHILE the palatine house was filled with rejoicings on account of this event, that of Austria was extremely concerned and perplexed about the demands of the Ottoman Porte. The Turks sent a chiaoux to Matthias, to congratulate him upon his accession to the throne, and at the same time, to demand the cession of some cities and towns depending upon Strigonia, with an entire renunciation of his pretensions to Transylvania. Gabriel Bathori, the present vaivode, saw himself threatened with the loss of his principality; and as he did not know which side to espouse, employed all his address in acquiring the good-will of both the emperor and sultan. He sent deputies to each, and loaded them with presents to dazzle the eyes of these two princes, or at least to suspend their differences; and his envoy at Vienna agreed with the emperor's commissaries, that Bathori should receive Imperial garrisons in his towns, provided Transylvania should be attacked by the Turks, from whom the emperor expected nothing but war; for they had assembled an army at Adrianople, and there was great reason to believe they intended to use it either against Hungary or Transylvania.

MATTHIAS was provided with troops to oppose the threatened irruption; but as he could not introduce German soldiers into Hungary, without the consent of the states, he convened an assembly at Presburg, and desired them to repeal the law by which it was enacted that no foreign troops should enter the kingdom; for he observed that Hungary, was not powerful enough of itself to support a war against the Turks; and promised that his German troops should commit no irregularities in the kingdom.

THIS proposal met with strong opposition from the palatine and Protestants, who were afraid that the emperor, under pretence of defending Hungary against the Turks, would employ his troops in establishing an arbitrary authority, and in destroying the privileges of the kingdom (M). However, after long and obstinate debates, the assembly thought of a medium to qualify this article of the troops; and it was agreed, that upon a rupture with the Turk, the emperor as their king, might introduce German soldiers in Hungary, on condition that if the captain was a German, the lieutenant should be an Hungarian, and the pay of both be equal. Then they reduced the subsidy which the emperor demanded; but in order to make him amends, granted to the empress one hundred and twenty thousand florins, for the coronation of that princess as queen of Hungary. Accordingly that ceremony was performed by cardinal Fortgasi, in presence of the states, and then their Imperial majesties set out from Presburg, on their return to Vienna.

A diet is summoned to meet
at Ratisbon.

MATTHIAS, in imitation of the preceding emperors of his house, employed all his industry and address in re-uniting the Protestants with the Catholic church; but all his endeavours proved unsuccessful, and served only to cool the regard which the Lutherans had entertained for his person, and even to detach them from his interests. This alteration he had occasion to see too plain, in their behaviour at the ensuing diet, which was held at Ratisbon. In the letters of convocation, the emperor assured the members, that his sole aim was to appease the troubles of Germany, and restore it to the fruition of its ancient splendor; a to re-establish the visits of the Imperial chamber; augment the number of assessors; abridge the proceedings at law, which chicanery had multiplied to excess; to reform the coin, which was very much debased; and to promote a spirit of unanimity, that all the forces of the empire might join together against the common enemy<sup>d</sup>.

(M) The emperor having quitted the assembly, that his presence might not be a restraint upon their deliberations, one of the members took the liberty to say, that the wolf of Germany was as formidable as the bear of Turkey (1).

THE diet was opened by the landgrave of Hesse, who in a short speech touched upon the different subjects which were to fall under deliberation, and referred the assembly for further particulars to the emperor's secretary Ducker, who harangued upon the care his imperial majesty had always taken both before and after he ascended to the throne, to maintain peace in Germany: he expatiated upon the abuses which had crept into the courts of justice, and the necessity of opposing the enterprizes of the Turks; he proposed a subsidy of five years to be levied in the dominions of the empire, for defraying the expence of a war against these infidels; and gave them to understand, that his imperial majesty would command the troops in person, and cheerfully expose his life and fortune for the safety of his subjects. He then made a transition to the coin; explained the malversations of the directors; exhorted the princes to recoin their money, and reduce it to the just value, so as that trade might no longer suffer from that defect: he afterwards enlarged upon the maintenance of four thousand horse, and twenty thousand infantry, a proposition which had been long ago settled in the matricular book, though always very much neglected; and he concluded by admonishing the states to agree among themselves, about the ceremonial of their sitting in the diet, which had often produced disputes that retarded the business for which they had met<sup>e</sup>.

BEFORE these points were discussed, the Protestants presented to the emperor a memorial, containing divers complaints against his privy council, which, they said, arrogated to itself the cognizance of religious affairs, contrary to the ancient constitutions of the imperial chamber, which regulated the power of every jurisdiction, reserving to the emperor and his council, no more than the articles of investiture of the fiefs, and the power of executing treaties of peace. They complained that the privy council usually nominated commissaries to decide the differences on the score of religion, in the Protestant states, and from them there was no appeal except to the council; that the commissaries were always Roman Catholics, or if one was chosen of another communion, it was only with a view to save appearances, the appeals being always reserved for the privy council. They demanded that the president of the imperial chamber should be chosen indifferently from the body of Protestants and Catholics, as well as the assessors of that tribunal, and the officers of the chancery; and that there should be an equal number of judges, professing each religion. They intreated the emperor to enquire into the reasons that induced the imperial chamber to refuse to register the decrees signed by the elector-palatine, as vicar of the empire, while the throne was vacant; to lay injunctions upon that chamber to be more observant of the old and new constitutions; and forbid it to receive religious appeals, that should be brought by persons who are neither the states nor members of the Germanic body. They complained, that those of their communion, who were in possession of ecclesiastic principalities, were refused the rank which the Catholics formerly maintained in the diets, observing, that it was an unheard of piece of injustice to deprive a prince of his rank, because he happened to be of another persuasion. They deplored the condition of those Protestants who lived in Catholic states, as being grievously restricted in the exercise of their religion, and exposed to tyranny and fraud in the execution of their wills. Finally, they desired that those of their communion, who held fiefs depending on Catholic churches, should no longer be obliged to take the oath in the name of the saints; that in the diets and councils of the princes, where the Catholics were most numerous, the decisions should not depend upon a plurality of voices; and that his imperial majesty would maintain an equal balance thro' all the provinces of the empire<sup>f</sup>.

f THIS memorial was received by the emperor, who promised to confer upon it with the princes; but, in the mean time, gave them to understand that particular griefs ought not to hinder them from contributing towards the public weal; and that after they should have deliberated upon the points which his secretary had proposed, he would examine the nature of their complaints.

THE Protestants, far from being satisfied with this answer, presented a second petition, declaring, that they could not assist at the diet, until their demands should be taken into consideration; and the emperor, having considered the articles of this second address, and advised with the three ecclesiastic electors, and the ambassadors of the duke of Saxony, sent an answer to the deputies, importing that he saw no reason which ought to engage the diet in deliberating upon their complaints, before it should proceed to the articles proposed in his declaration; that as their distresses did not interest the whole empire, they could not expect that the consideration of them should take place of those measures which were absolutely necessary for the general preservation of the empire; he, therefore, exhorted them to join the Catholics, in deliberating upon the enterprizes of the Turks, and promised to do them justice before the end of the diet.

THE Protestants still insisted upon the redress of their grievances, as a subject which ought to take place of all others, because a neglect in that particular might involve all Germany in a civil war; and observed, that the acts of former diets plainly proved it was the first care of those assemblies to compose intestine divisions, without which precaution no salutary measures could be taken for the commonweal<sup>s</sup>.

MATTHIAS, who was in great want of troops and money, could not without chagrin behold the time consumed in such remonstrances, which served only to augment the troubles of the empire. He had already received and replied to three memorials, and at length the deputies presented a fourth, giving him to understand that they had orders from their principals to insist upon knowing his final resolution touching their affairs. This preremptory demand he communicated to the Catholic princes and electors, who advised him to give no other answer than they had already received; for as winter approached, and Ratisbon began to be sickly, he could not employ sufficient time for discussing such disputes, without running the risk of leaving undetermined the principal affair for which they were assembled<sup>a</sup>.

MEAN while, the Catholics undertook to answer the memorials of the deputies, and re-criminated upon the Protestants, whom they accused of having infringed the decrees of former diets, by introducing divers sects, which had occasioned numberless disorders in the empire; of having demolished churches, persecuted the clergy, abolished the jurisdiction, customs, and festivals of the church, and of having circulated defamatory libels against the pope and the Catholic states, whom it was the emperor's duty to avenge<sup>i</sup>.

DURING this contest between the Catholics and Protestants, the arms of the Turks made great progress in Transylvania, where they supported Bethleem Gabor against Gabriel Bathori, who had rendered himself odious by his cruelty and misconduct. Matthias no sooner received the disagreeable account of these transactions, than he communicated it to the diet, in order to accelerate their resolutions in this conjuncture; he reminded them of the immediate necessity they were under to protect Hungary, which was the frontier of the empire, proposed that a powerful army should be raised without delay for that service, exhorted the states to live in peace with one another, and as the plague began to rage at Ratisbon, referred the discussion of other affairs to the next assembly.

THE Protestants, who were not sorry to see the house of Austria embarrassed, declared that they were ready to contribute towards the expence of the war, provided they could obtain satisfaction with regard to their demands; and the emperor, finding all other methods ineffectual, commissioned his brother the archduke Maximilian, to confer with them upon the articles of their complaints: but that prince, with all his insinuation, could not make the least impression upon the deputies, who would by no means swerve from their purpose; but, on the contrary, lodged a protest with the chancery of Mentz, against a new subsidy with the Catholic states about this time granted to the emperor, for enabling him to oppose the invasion of the Turks<sup>k</sup>.

THE dispute about the succession of Juliers and Cleves now raged with greater violence than ever: the elector of Brandenburg, tired of sharing the possession of these two states, made some attempts upon the rights of the duke of Neuburg, who having complained of these encroachments to no purpose, had recourse to reprisals; and matters were insensibly inflamed to such a degree, that each employed his own arms, and those of his allies, to fortify himself in the places which he occupied, and even to surprize those of his antagonist. While the elector of Saxony in consequence of the investiture which he had received from the emperor Rodolphus, obtained from the archduke Albert, governor of the Low Countries, possession of the house of Cleves, in the city of Brussels, together with all the fiefs depending upon the county of Ravenstein<sup>l</sup>, the duke of Neuburg, finding himself unequal in power to the elector of Brandenburg, resolved to strengthen his interest by an alliance with the ducal house of Bavaria, and accordingly married the princess Magdalen, sister of duke Maximilian, and the elector of Cologne: then his cause was espoused by the emperor, the archduke-governor of the Low-Countries, and the king of Spain; and his rival being alarmed at this formidable conjunction, courted the alliance of the states-general.

BEFORE this politic republic would conclude a treaty with the elector, they proposed their mediation to the duke of Neuburg, that the affair might be amicably compromised: g a but this prince having thanked them for their friendly intention, declined the proposal, unless the elector of Brandenburg would revoke every thing he had acted contrary to their agreement at Dortmund, and restore the domain of Montjoyen, together with the revenues of the allodial funds, which he had unjustly seized.

THE friendship of the united provinces was not the only alliance courted by the elector of Brandenburg; he likewise endeavoured to support himself by the assistance of Saxony and Hesse; and an assembly being held for this purpose, at Naumburg in Thuringia, the antient confederation between these three houses was renewed.

b THE states of Cleves, though solicited to declare for one or other of the confederates, resolved to remain neuter; but by letters earnestly intreated the archduke Albert, the elector of Cologne, and the united provinces, to accommodate the difference; and the elector answered, that if the duke of Neuburg should sustain the least injury, he would undertake his defence<sup>m</sup>:

MEAN while the duke promised to submit his pretensions to this succession, to the decision of the imperial council; whereas, the elector of Brandenburg, far from giving such an instance of his veneration and complaisance for that tribunal, openly declared that he would never own for judges those persons whom he knew to be prejudiced against him and his cause, and published certain proposals for accommodation, which were rejected by his antagonist; so that the breach between these princes seemed to widen every day. A. D. 1614.

c THE elector's interest was espoused by the states-general and the Protestants of Germany, while the duke of Neuburg abjured Lutheranism; in order to make sure of the Catholic league, the protection of the emperor, and the assistance of the court of Spain. The Protestants of Juliers and Cleves were alarmed at the duke's apostacy, apprehending that if ever he should become their sovereign, he would treat them as Philip the second had treated his subjects in the Low-Countries. He, therefore, in order to calm their disquiets, published a declaration, allowing liberty of conscience to those of both religions, and protesting that he should always observe the articles of agreement he had made when he took possession of the country<sup>n</sup>. The duke of Neuburg abjures Lutheranism.

d THE electoral prince of Brandenburg was not so prudent in his political conduct. With a view to attach the united provinces the more strictly to his cause, he resolved to introduce Calvinism into the states of Cleves and Juliers; a novelty which would have produced an insurrection of the nobility and people, had not he published a declaration, in which he promised that no person should be disturbed on account of religion.

e THE united provinces, in consequence of the treaty they had concluded with the elector, took possession of Juliers, on pretence of holding it in sequestration; and protested, that far from having any design to trouble the repose of Germany, their sole aim in this transaction was to accelerate an accommodation between the princes competitors. The duke of Neuburg, little satisfied with this declaration, put the other places in a posture of defence, and took the city of Dusseldorp by stratagem: while the archduke governor of the Low-Countries, openly expressed his indignation at this step of the states-general; and the marquis de Spinola, who commanded the army in Flanders, threatened to break the truce, and invade the united provinces with fire and sword. The archduke, however, would not proceed to extremities, until he had demanded the restitution of Juliers, which being refused, his army commanded by Spinola, passed the Meuse at Maastricht, and took the route to Juliers, for which the states-general were in no pain, because it was well provided for making a vigorous resistance, and count Maurice had joined the electoral prince of Brandenburg, who had a sufficient number of good troops to thwart the enterprizes of the Flemings. But they were deceived by the finesse of Spinola, who, changing his route all of a sudden, marched to Aix-la Chapelle, which was under the protection of Brandenburg, and the citizens, terrified at his appearance, surrendered their keys without opposition<sup>o</sup>. The united provinces take possession of Juliers. Spinola takes Aix-la-Chapelle.

f FROM hence he set out for Mulheim, assuming the name of the emperor's commissary, and bearing the imperial eagle in his standard; and having put garrisons in the towns of Dure, Burthen, Castor, Grewembroch, and other places that submitted to him in his march, he passed the Rhine two leagues below Cologne, where he was joined by the duke of Neuburg with eight hundred horse and five thousand infantry. Then they advanced to Mulheim, which they dismantled; and afterwards undertook the siege of Wesel, which they took after a gallant resistance, notwithstanding the efforts of count Maurice, who, in order to indemnify himself for this misfortune, made several conquests on this side the Rhine. He surprised Emerick, one of the best places in the country of Cleves, and took Rees before the Spanish general was in a condition to raise the siege; while Goch, Gennep, Kaleal, and other fortresses in the neighbourhood of the Rhine, were obliged to receive his garrisons. Santhen.

IN the mean time, Spinola made himself master of Duisbourg, and sent a detachment of his army to surprise Santhen; but his scheme miscarried; and that town, having all along maintained its neutrality, was the place chosen for the assembly, in which peace was concluded between the princes possessors. Here the conferences were opened by the deputies of Brandenburg, Neuburg, the states-general, the king of Spain, the archduke governor, the crowns of France and England, the electors of Cologne, Palatine, the duke of Wirtemberg, and several other princes of the empire; and after their respective demands of the princes possessors were examined and maturely considered, an accommodation was effected on these conditions: that no place belonging to the succession should be garrisoned, without the consent of the princes possessors; that the guard of each should consist of no more than fifty horsemen, and one hundred foot soldiers; that all the effects, benefices, and offices which had been seized and alienated, should be restored to those who enjoyed them before the misunderstanding happened between the princes; that commissaries should be nominated by both parties, in order to re-establish and regulate the police of the state, conformable to the transactions of Dortmund and Hall; and that these commissaries should be chosen from the noblesse of Juliers, Cleves, and Bergue, and be nominated in one month from the date of this agreement; that, notwithstanding the transactions of Dortmund and Hall, the two princes should have separate courts of judicature; that the court of Cleves should take place in the duchy of the same name, and in the counties of La Marck and Ravenstein, and the duchies of Juliers and Bergue, with their dependencies, have recourse to the court of Dusseldorp; that the towns, and castles of Juliers and Dusseldorp should be governed by four officers, natives of these provinces, two of whom should be Catholics and two Protestants; that each of the four should have a company of one hundred soldiers, and that they should take the oath of allegiance to the elector of Brandenburg and the duke of Neuburg; that the presidents of the chanceries, and other tribunals, should determine no difficult cause without having first consulted one of the princes possessors; that the elector and the duke should alternately confer the benefices and posts belonging to the succession, and that if he whose turn it was to nominate should leave any place vacant for three months, the other might fill up the vacancy; that the pensions and appointments of all officers, either civil or military, should be paid from the revenues of the provinces, and the remainder be equally divided between the princes, without whose consent no tax should be imposed; that the accounts of the treasures should be inspected, an exact inventory taken of the papers and titles concerning the succession, by the commissaries chosen by the princes; that the alienations, mortgages, and presents, made by one or other of the possessors before such a day, should remain in suspense until the definitive sentence of the succession; that an estimate should be made of what had been alienated by one prince in the other's territory, and a proper compensation be made from the revenue of the whole; and finally, that the two princes should bind themselves by oath to ratify the present transaction in six weeks.

cution of the treaty.*

THE execution of these articles was opposed by Spinola, who demanded, that the united provinces should promise not to intermeddle in the succession, provided another rupture should happen between the princes possessors: he moreover pretended, that he could not withdraw his garrison from Wesel without an express order from the emperor and the king of Spain; and every body perceiving that these were no other than subterfuges for eluding the articles of agreement, the assembly broke up.

Bathori is reduced to extremity by the Turks and slain at his own request.

THE Turks still continued their hostilities in Hungary and Transylvania. The bashaw Sandar having passed the Danube with four thousand horse and twelve thousand janissaries, joined Bethleem Gabor, who waited for him on the frontiers; while the bashaw Ogli advanced on the side of Walachia, at the head of another army. Bathori, fearing he should be surrounded, encamped at Milbach, the river Maruez being between him and the infidels, who, nevertheless, advanced to attack him; upon which he retired under the cannon of Wairadin, until he should receive the succours which he expected from the emperor. However, as this reinforcement was neither suitable to his expectation or his necessity, he endeavoured to make new levies towards Trinau; but he was so universally hated, that not one man would enlist; so that seeing himself reduced to necessity, pursued by the Turks, detested by his own subjects, diffident of his troops, without money and ammunition, he would not survive his misfortune, and was at his own request, slain by one of his soldiers.

He is succeeded by Bethleem Gabor.

THE principality of Transylvania was no sooner vacant by the death of Bathori, than the bashaw Sandar declared Bethleem Gabor vaivode of that province: a change which seemed to threaten it with a bloody war; but, contrary to the general expectation, peace was concluded with the Turks in forty days; and almost all the governors of places, who were supposed to be unalterably attached to the emperor, acknowledged Bethleem Gabor for their sovereign. Nevertheless, there still remained a party devoted to the house of Austria, who a were sufficient to disturb this new viavode, and even to seize upon some places in behalf of the emperor.

In consequence of Gabor's complaints, the Grand Seignior sent a chiaoux to Matthias, demanding, that these places should be restored to the person whom he had appointed as successor to Bathori, otherwise he would support him by dint of arms. The emperor answered, it was an affair of such importance that he could not decide upon it, until he should have consulted the states of the empire; so that hostilities recommenced between the Hungarians and the infidels.

A. D. 1615.

Hostilities are renewed between the Turks and the emperor.

b MATTHIAS, alarmed at these commotions, convened at Lintz an assembly composed of the deputies of all his hereditary countries, in order to lay before them the state of his affairs, and to solicit their assistance in this emergency; but some of them being very indifferent to his interest, and the Hungarians flatly refusing a passage to his troops, in their march to Transylvania, the assembly broke up without having come to any determination in his favour.

c In the mean time, Bethleem Gabor, with the assistance of the bashaw Sandar, invested the city of Lippe, and, in a few days, made himself master of the place, in consequence of a capitulation, importing, that it should not be garrisoned with Turks, or be dismembered from the province of Transylvania. This clause Gabor could not observe without giving offence to the Turks, to whom he had promised this town, together with two others; and he was not a little embarrassed by this consideration, when a very unexpected event delivered him at once from his apprehensions. The Grand Seignior having occasion for all his forces to terminate the intestine broils and foreign wars, under which his empire at that time groaned, resolved to make peace with Germany, and for that purpose sent an ambassador to Vienna with magnificent presents. A negotiation was immediately begun, and, after divers conferences, the treaty formerly concluded between Rodolphus the second and the sultan, was renewed and confirmed. All the places occupied by the Turks in Hungary were delivered up to the house of Austria; and the lands, which, during the war, had been alienated, were now restored to the right owners. This was the substance of the treaty by which peace was re-established in Hungary for the term of twenty years; though not the least mention was made of Bethleem Gabor's usurpation, which was, for the present, overlooked, lest it should have introduced a dispute that might have retarded, if not prevented, the accommodation.

d In the course of this year, a rupture happened between the duke of Brunswic and the city of that name, upon the same subject which had produced a quarrel in the reign of Rodolphus the second between the late duke Henry Julius and the inhabitants of that town. This was no other than a contest for their liberty, which they resolved to defend against the impositions of the duke, who wanted to exert a sovereign authority over them. Frederic Ulric, the present duke, had made some advances towards an accommodation; but these proving ineffectual, he had recourse to arms, and forbade his subjects, on pain of death, to maintain the least commerce with the inhabitants of Brunswic. These republicans, depending upon their alliance with the hanse towns, treated this prohibition with contempt, and incensed him to such a degree, that he levied troops, invested the city, and carried on the siege with great fury, while the place was obstinately defended by the count de Solmes, strengthened by some auxiliaries from the hanse towns; till at length a treaty was concluded by the mediation of the prince of Hesse and the king of Denmark, who was uncle to the duke, and assisted at the siege in person (N).

A rupture between the duke of Brunswic and the city of that name.

e About the end of January the Protestant states assembled at Nuremberg, in order to deliberate upon the affairs of Juliers, and every prince of that communion was present, except the elector of Saxony, who would not enter into their views, or join in the remonstrances they intended to make to the emperor, touching the possession of the states of Juliers, and the liberty of the empire, which they conceived to be in danger from the conduct of the house of Austria. Finding the elector averse to their measures, they solicited the assistance of France; but that kingdom was too much engrossed by its own intestine divisions, to grant protection to strangers, so that they separated without having brought mat-

(N) The chief articles of this treaty, which was concluded in the town of Stedenbourg, and afterwards ratified by the emperor, were these: that the duke should confirm the privileges, immunities, and customs of the city of Brunswick; and promise to obey the decrees of the imperial chamber, provided the senate and citizens would do him homage, take the same oaths to him which they had taken to his predecessors before the year one thousand five hundred and sixty-nine, and acknowledge him as their lawful duke; and that the disputes which had arisen about his jurisdiction, should be determined by arbitrators, or by the imperial chamber (1).

ters to any conclusion ; and the war among the princes, who disputed the succession of Ju- a liers, began to rage again with great fury <sup>s</sup>.

Grievances of the Calixtins, in Bohemia. MATTHIAS, after having a long time kept measures with the Protestants, now pulled off the mask, and resolved to make them feel that he was their master. Bohemia was divided by two religions, namely, that of the Catholics, and that of the Calixtins, or descendants of the Hussites, who were formerly so powerful that the emperor Sigismund, before they would own him as king of Bohemia, had been fain to indulge them with a privilege, importing, that there should be no citizen or magistrate in Prague, but such as were of their persuasion. Maximilian the second encroached upon this grant by allowing Catholics to enjoy the freedom of the city, and their number considerably increased by the favour of the king's officers, all of whom were of the same religion. In the reign of Rodolphus the b second, the Protestants of Bohemia obtained the emperor's edict for putting them and the Catholics upon an equality in all respects ; but the officers refused to publish the decree, which they deemed prejudicial to the Catholic religion ; and the court of Vienna was at no pains to enforce the execution of it : while the Catholics under a prince of their own communion, occupied the first posts of the kingdom, enjoyed the confidence of the sovereign, and their clergy were restored to the possession of all the estates of which they had been deprived by the Hussites <sup>t</sup>.

The archduke Ferdinand is elected king of Bohemia. THIS was the situation of affairs in Bohemia, when the emperor resolved to secure the crown of that kingdom to his cousin Ferdinand, archduke of Gratz, son of Charles of Austria, brother of Maximilian the second, who was the present emperor's father. This prince c was accordingly presented to the states of the kingdom, assembled at Prague for that purpose, and recommended to their choice by the emperor in person, after he had given them to understand that his brothers Maximilian and Albert, who like himself were without issue, had resigned their pretensions in favour of Ferdinand ; and that his sole view in this recommendation was to prevent the evils that might accrue to the kingdom, in case it should at his death be left without an head.

THE proposal was embraced, and Ferdinand elected king, on condition, nevertheless, that during the life of Matthias, he should not intermeddle in affairs of state, except by the emperor's express permission ; and having promised to observe this stipulation, he was solemnly d crowned in presence of Matthias and his empress <sup>u</sup> (O).

NOTWITHSTANDING the promise he had made to maintain the privileges of the kingdom, the Protestants did not fare the better for their new prince, but began to complain that the articles of their agreement, touching the exercise of religion, were not at all observed. In this very conjuncture, when they might have been easily satisfied, the archbishop of Prague ordered a church which they had built at Clostergrab, to be demolished, and with more rigour than discretion caused another at Brunow to be shut up. These proceedings induced some noblemen of the Protestant faith to complain of the outrage to the council which the emperor had left at Prague ; but they received a supercilious answer, implying, that nothing had been done contrary to the privileges of the subjects, the edicts of the emperor, or the resolutions taken by the states of the empire. e

THE complainants, seeing themselves treated with such scorn and disrespect, resolved to convoke the states of the kingdom, in order to deliberate upon their grievances ; and the emperor, being apprised of their intention, forbade them to proceed on pain of his displeasure ; but their resolution being already taken, his orders came too late. Two days after the assembly was opened, several noblemen were sent as deputies to the council, where they repeated their remonstrances, and demanded justice in a peremptory manner. Among others who sat as judges were William Schlabata, president of the chamber, Jarowslaw Bor- f sita, count de Martinitz, and Philip Fabricius, secretary of the council. These members treated them with great insolence, and rejected their demands with contempt, which irritated the deputies to such a degree, that they rushed upon them and threw them headlong from the windows of a second story into a ditch, the water of which saved them from being hurt : they had even the good fortune to escape some shot that were sent after them, and to reach Vienna without farther damage <sup>s</sup>. The burgrave of Bohemia, and Papal grand prior of St. Mary, suffered no insult, because they had behaved with moderation to the remonstrants, who therefore conducted them in safety to their own houses. The count de la Tour, who was the principal actor in this bold scene, finding he had proceeded too far to retreat, rode through the streets attended by his associates, and harangued the populace. " I do not

(O) If we may believe Struvius, he was, on his return to his apartment, absolved by the pope's nuncio of the oath he had just taken (1).

(1) Struv. period 10. sec. 8.

- a “propose myself (said he) as your chief, but as a companion to accompany you in that career, which will lead us to happy freedom, or glorious death. The die is already thrown: it is now too late to recal what is past, and misery will be your portion if you suffer yourselves to be oppressed. Your safety altogether depends upon your unanimity and courage: you must break asunder your chains, or perish by the hands of an executioner. If you take arms, and triumph over your oppressors, you will be renowned for valour, and reap the delicious fruits of your resolution: whereas, if you tamely submit to arbitrary power, you will be treated with indignity, and punished as rebels.”

- b THIS sort of declamation met with universal applause; and many Protestants, who did not approve of the violence offered to the emperor's officers, foreseeing that his resentment would make no distinctions, joined the party of the count, and seriously prepared for war. These were reinforced by the greatest part of the Catholics, who perceived that their new king Ferdinand paid as little regard to the liberties of the realm, as to the complaints of the Protestants. The whole united body assembled at the Carolin college, where they resolved to exact an oath of the garrison and inhabitants of the three towns of Prague, to secure the castle and furnish the other fortresses with troops. Then they elected thirty directors, whom they invested with the sovereign authority, concerted measures for the safety of other places, which they ordered to be fortified with all possible dispatch, gave directions for levying forces, and expelled the jesuits, together with all the Catholics, who did not favour their conduct, and whom they branded with the appellation of enemies to the edicts of his imperial majesty. Finally, they published a manifesto, that the emperor and all the world might be informed of the justice of their cause and conduct, in chastising those who were enemies of the state and perturbators of the public peace.

- c MATTHIAS was extremely incensed at the outrage which had been committed against persons of quality, invested with his authority, as well as at the subsequent proceedings of the perpetrators; but, as he no longer possessed that activity of disposition for which he had been formerly remarkable, he was loath to proceed to extremities, until he should have tried gentler methods; and endeavoured to reclaim the Bohemians by letters, edicts, and declarations: to which they paid very little regard; for tho' in their answers the emperor's person was mentioned with respect, they boldly accused cardinal Klesel, bishop of Vienna, who was his prime minister and favourite, of being author of all the errors of the administration.

- d KLESEL, though a person of obscure birth, was endued with a good understanding, and an insinuating manner; but he was imperious and unquiet, an implacable enemy to those who thwarted his designs, and much more apt to ruin a kingdom already in disorder, than to re-establish its peace by a wise reformation of abuses. He was not always hated by the Protestants of Bohemia; on the contrary, they had once paid great honours to him, as the person who had prevailed upon the emperor to indulge them with that edict, by which they enjoyed the free exercise of their religion: but now, being persuaded that he counselled Matthias to disregard that very edict, and to invade the liberties and privileges of their country, they bitterly inveighed against him as the sole source of all their grievances.

- e AT the same time Silesia abounded with malecontents, who complained of the same oppression which had excited the troubles in Bohemia. Some noblemen were disappointed in the expectation of certain dignities to which they pretended a right; and several benefices were bestowed upon Catholics, after they had been taken from those of the other communion. These impolitic steps of the emperor had produced a spirit of discontent and disaffection among the nobility, which gradually diffused itself through the whole province, and at length broke out in open rebellion, soon after the revolt of the Bohemians, with whom the states of Silesia actually entered into alliance and confederacy. This was the beginning of a bloody war, that raged thirty years in the empire, which interested almost all Europe, and was not determined till the peace of Westphalia. Ferdinand was of opinion, that the rebels of Bohemia and Silesia ought to be immediately reduced by force of arms; but his influence did not as yet predominate in the councils of the emperor, who had resigned Bohemia in his favour, on condition that he himself should retain the sovereign authority during his life: the same clause was inserted in the treaty of cession when he settled him on the throne of Hungary, which he had lately ascended.

- f FERDINAND was disgusted at these conditions, which he knew to have been suggested by cardinal Klesel, who, having always sat at the helm, could not bear to see the sovereign authority wrested from his hands, and therefore persuaded the emperor to retain the government of these kingdoms. The new king, incensed at his conduct on this occasion, represented him as an ambitious and turbulent minister, who had embroiled the kingdom of Bohemia, on purpose to render himself the more necessary to the emperor; and his remonstrances being reinforced by the archduke Maximilian, Matthias was obliged to remove him from court. He was apprehended without his master's knowledge, stripped of his cardinal's robes, and conducted to the confines of Stiria, where he remained five years a close prisoner <sup>y</sup> (P).

THE count de la Tour could not have found a more favourable conjuncture for the accomplishment of his designs, and accordingly took the advantage of it in assembling troops, and forming his army. He put garrisons in all the defensible places, from which he drove the officers and soldiers whom he suspected of disaffection to the cause, occupied all the passes, established magazines, collected money, and made all the dispositions for a vigorous resistance.

La Tour prepares for a vigorous defence.

THE emperor, who was still unprepared for using force, proposed a general amnesty to the Bohemians, and promised to re-establish them in their prerogatives, and the free exercise of their religion; but these advances produced no effect. La Tour was persuaded that sooner or later Matthias and Ferdinand would revenge the insult they had suffered in the persons of their officers, and that there was no safety but in the success of his arms; he therefore demanded succours of the Protestant princes, and opened the campaign in such a manner as flattered his party that he would soon free Bohemia from the Austrian yoke.

CRUMLAW and Budewitz are two strong places upon the Molde, and form an important pass from High Austria into Bohemia; this the count de la Tour undertook to shut against the Imperialists, by making himself master of these towns, which declared for Matthias. He accordingly took Crumlaw by assault, and summoned Budewitz to surrender; but this place withstood all his threats and solicitations; and as he was not yet strong enough to besiege it in form, he encamped in the neighbourhood, while Mansfeld, with another army, reduced the other places of Bohemia.

THIS last general, so famous for his exploits in Flanders, where he served the king of Spain, was natural son of the count of Mansfeld, and renounced the religion of his ancestors, in order to embrace the Protestant faith. He was brave, enterprising, and ambitious; and though without money, arms, or estate, by his sole courage defied the whole power of the house of Austria. Wonderfully fruitful in expedients, and incredibly bold in execution, he derived from his defeats more honour than victory could bestow upon his conquerors. He was sober, vigilant, indefatigable, eloquent, and judicious, prodigal of his fortune, and covetous of wealth to expend in the enjoyment of his pleasures. He lived replete with the most sanguine hopes and magnificent designs, and died in a village on the frontiers of the Venetians and Turks, destitute of money and resource, in a strange country, where his body could scarce have the benefit of Christian burial <sup>z</sup> (Q).

THE archduke, governor of the Low Countries, sent a body of forces to the emperor's assistance, under the command of the count de Buquoy, already famous for his valour and discretion; but before his arrival, the count de Dampierre had, by the emperor's orders, entered Bohemia with the Austrian troops, and in his route made himself master of Bistritz, Pilgram, and Polna. His design was to possess the places situated upon the river Sassava, that he might make incursions to the very gates of Prague; but this project was disconcerted by the activity of La Tour, who after some skirmishes, in which the loss was pretty equal on both sides, hampered him in such a manner, that he was obliged to retire for want of provisions.

MEAN while, the states of Bohemia demanded succours of the Protestant princes of Germany. The Silesians furnished them with six thousand men, under the command of the count de Swenbecci; while the count de Hohenloe levied some excellent troops for their service, in the dutchy of Brunswick, and the Dutch promised to supply them as soon as possible with men and money. In a word, their army soon amounted to thirty thousand soldiers, for the most part veterans, and commanded by experienced officers.

THE count de Buquoy likewise invaded Bohemia, by the frontier of Moravia, and made himself master of Tentschbrod and some other places, which having fortified with troops and

(P) Ferdinand is said to have laid a scheme for killing the cardinal with a musket-ball during the frings at the ceremony of his coronation; but as the shot did not take place, he caused him to be arrested in the palace, stripped of his robes, in lieu of which he was clothed in black apparel, and sent to the place of his exile, with an escort of two hundred horse, commanded by the baron de Breuner and the counts Colalto and Temperen. After he had been thus carried off, Ferdinand and the archduke Maximilian went and imparted the whole transaction to the emperor, who was very much afflicted at the news; and pope Paul V. being extremely irritated at their presumption, employed all his influence to set the cardinal at liberty: but it was his successor Gregory V. who found interest to have him brought to Rome, where he was tried in a congregation of cardinals, and declared innocent: upon which he was set at liberty, and returned to his diocese with the consent of Ferdinand II. (2).

(Q) He died, not without suspicion of poison, at the age of forty-six. Finding his end approaching, he ordered himself to be dressed in his richest habit, with his sword by his side, and gave up the ghost standing, being supported by two of his domestics. As he insisted on being well paid for the services he rendered to the Dutch, they used to say of him, Bonus in auxilio, carus in pretio (2).

a provisions, he went to join the count de Dampierre, resolving to engage the Bohemians, Both armies take the field. whom accordingly he found drawn up in excellent order upon the two banks of the Molde. Astonished at the number and countenance of the Protestant forces, he durst not hazard a battle, nor even advance farther into the country; but was fain to retrench himself under the cannon of Budewitz, in order to wait for a reinforcement from Vienna, which, however, was not sufficient to put him on a footing with the malcontents.

b THE emperor, finding himself too weak to cope with them in the field, thought proper to offer them an accommodation, which had been proposed by the princes of the empire assembled at Rothembourg; and the duke of Bavaria, together with the electors of Mentz, Saxony, and the palatinate, were chosen arbitrators of the difference<sup>a</sup>. Matthias pitched upon Pilsen for the congress; but as that city was remarkable for its attachment to the house of Austria, the Bohemians demanded that some other place should be appointed; and before this dispute was decided, ordered Mansfeld to undertake the siege of that town. Pilsen was one of the most considerable places in Bohemia, and tolerably well fortified for those times; but its chief strength consisted in the courage of its inhabitants, who valued themselves upon having formerly sustained a siege of ten months, against Ziskai the famous chieftain of the Hussites. The importance of this town, and the wealth which the Catholics in the neighbourhood had carried thither, as to a place of safety, animated one side to attack, and the other to defend with the utmost resolution. The besieged, of their own accord, reduced to ashes the magnificent suburbs, which constituted the chief ornament of their city, thereby giving the assailants to understand that they were determined to defend themselves to the last extremity. Pilsen is besieged by Mansfeld.

c ACCORDINGLY, the trenches were opened, and the siege carried on with uncommon vigour, while the inhabitants behaved with such obstinacy of valour, that they would have suffered themselves to be buried in the ruins of their city, rather than yield at discretion, had not the melancholy desolation of the place excited the compassion of their enemies, and induced Mansfeld to offer them their lives, effects, and liberty, provided they would take the oath of allegiance to the states of Bohemia. The condition was accepted, and the government of the town bestowed upon John-George de Solms, with whom Mansfeld left seven companies of soldiers, after having repaired the works, and filled the magazines with provisions and munitions of war<sup>b</sup>.

d AFTER the loss of Pilsen, the Imperialists retained but a very few inconsiderable places in Bohemia, which the approach of winter would not permit the count de la Tour to invest; so that he cantoned his infantry at Neubaus, and in the neighbourhood of Budewitz and Crumlaw; while the count de Swenbecci, at the head of the cavalry, made incursions to within nine miles of Vienna, took and garrisoned the abbey of Swetal, pillaged Hoefurt, Veitre, and several monasteries, and carried off a rich booty into Bohemia.

e THE Protestant cavalry, being chiefly composed of Silesians, the emperor wrote to the states of that province, complaining of the disorders they had committed in Austria: and received an answer, importing, that they only made reprisals upon the Austrians, who had exercised unheard of violences in Bohemia and Silesia; and that their aim in making Austria the seat of war was to oblige their enemies to listen to terms of peace, and to facilitate the union of the Protestants of that country with their brethren of Bohemia. In effect, the Austrian Lutherans, both above and below the river Ems, held a private correspondence with the states of Bohemia, and only waited for a specious pretext to declare themselves. This they thought they should obtain, by building a fort upon the Danube, in order to cut off the communication between Bohemia and Austria; but the duke of Bavaria, and the magistrates of Passau, complained of this transaction to the emperor, who ordered the Protestants to demolish the fort, and furnish the count de Buquoy with provisions and necessaries for his army. Though this order was ill received, it was, nevertheless, partly executed, because the malcontents of Austria durst not yet pull off the mask; and such was the situation of affairs, when the emperor died at Vienna<sup>c</sup>. The Protestants of Austria favour the Bohemians.

f AFTER his elevation to the empire, this prince had forfeited a great part of the reputation which he had formerly acquired, and could not perceive the decline of his character without infinite mortification, which was grievously encreased by the embarrassed state of his affairs, and the miscarriage of his effort towards an accommodation with his revolted subjects: these causes of chagrin had been lately augmented by the death of the archduke Maximilian, and the loss of his empress; and altogether overwhelmed him in such a manner, that he sunk into a languishing distemper, which put a period to his life in the sixty-third year of his age, and the eighth of his reign<sup>d</sup> (R). The death of the emperor Matthias.

(R) He married Ann Katharine, daughter of the archduke Ferdinand, by whom he had no issue; but he left a natural son, who was known by the name of Don Matthias of Austria.

WHEN he found himself near his end, he called heaven to witness that his chief desire <sup>a</sup> was to re-establish peace in Bohemia; and addressed himself to his successor Ferdinand in these words: "If you wish to see your subjects happy under your government, let them not " feel the exertion of your power."

A. D. 1610. IMMEDIATELY after the decease of Matthias, Ferdinand, his successor in the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia, as well as in the dominions of Austria, resolved, if possible, to succeed him likewise on the Imperial throne; and, that he might the more easily accomplish that aim, made advances towards an accommodation with the Bohemians, whose privileges he, of his own accord, promised to confirm; for this purpose, he wrote to the states of that kingdom, who, far from agreeing to the suspension of arms which he proposed, took offence at the title of heir of Bohemia, which he assumed in his letter, and affirmed, that as <sup>b</sup> their crown was elective, they had a right to choose their own sovereign. He met with no better success in summoning the states of Austria to come and take the ordinary oath of allegiance; for they replied, the affairs of Germany were in such confusion, that they must have time to deliberate upon the submission which he required; and it was not long before he understood the true motive of this evasion, which was no other than the negotiation of a treaty of union between them and the states of Bohemia.

WHATEVER inclination Ferdinand had to take vengeance on these his revolted subjects, the conjuncture was so unfavourable, that he resolved to proceed by more pacific measures; and actually sent to the states of Bohemia the confirmation of the privileges which had been granted by their former kings: he moreover promised to observe all the edicts and agreements touching religion; never to bestow the government of Carlstain, where the crown and other ensigns of royalty were kept, without the consent of the nobility of the kingdom, and of the magistrates of Prague; to confer posts and benefices upon none but natives; to alienate no demesnes of the crown; but, on the contrary, repurchase those that were alienated; to preserve the true value of the coin, without diminution or augmentation; to ratify all the donations which had been made by the kings his predecessors, except those that might be contrary to the ordinances of Ladislaus; and, finally, to maintain the subjects of the kingdom in all their rights, customs, privileges, and immunities. <sup>c</sup>

They decline his proffers, and the war continues.

THE Bohemians taking it for granted that Ferdinand was more politic than sincere in these concessions; that he would not have granted so much, without an intention to revoke the whole; that his aim was to amuse them with negotiations, while he prepared for war; and that his design was to craze with the sword what he had written with the pen: fraught with these sentiments, I say, they sent back the letter and declaration to Vienna, because in the address to the directors he had omitted the words of both communions, the confirmation of privileges equally regarding the Catholics and Evangelics. Notwithstanding this mortifying repulse, Ferdinand would have willingly suppressed his resentment, and offered safe-conduct for such deputies as they should think proper to send to Vienna, in order to treat of an accommodation; but he received no answer to this proposal, and the war continued on both sides with great animosity. <sup>d</sup>

THE count de Buquoy, at the head of his cavalry, daily alarmed the towns in the neighbourhood of Budewitz and Crumlaw; and Kinscki, general of the Evangelic army, taking the field with a thousand horse and fifteen hundred arquebusiers, defeated a body of heydukes with great slaughter. <sup>e</sup>

The Protestants of Moravia, Silesia, Lusatia, and Upper Austria, join the Bohemians.

ABOUT this period, the Protestants of Moravia, Silesia, Lusatia, and Upper Austria, demanded the free exercise of their religion; and that, as well as the Catholics, they should be admitted to the posts and honours of their several provinces; but their demands being rejected at the court of Vienna, a spirit of discontent diffused itself through all that communion; and the directors of Bohemia, taking advantage of this disposition, engaged them to shake off the Austrian yoke. The Evangelics of Upper Austria were the first who assumed the title of states, and entered into a league with the Bohemians; and then the Protestants of Moravia, Silesia, and Lusatia, taking the reins of government in their own hands, expelled all the Catholics who seemed to favour the house of Austria. This resolution was facilitated by Henry count de la Tour, who, at the head of fifteen thousand men, advanced towards Moravia, reduced Iglaw, Trebichz, and Znaim, in which last place he left a good garrison. Cardinal de Dietrichstein, who commanded for Ferdinand in that country, finding himself too weak to oppose the irruption, endeavoured to amuse the Bohemians until he should receive a reinforcement; and with this view, sent one of his secretaries to La Tour to know his reasons for invading Moravia. The count replied, that he had obeyed the orders of those who had a right to command him; and that the principal noblemen of Bohemia, who were in his army, had come on purpose to conclude with the Moravians a league <sup>f</sup> offensive and defensive against those who should presume to attack their liberty, and change the form of their government. To this declaration, the cardinal made answer, that he had <sup>g</sup>

- a no intention to thwart the states of Moravia; that he had sent them the order of king Ferdinand to assemble at Brin, and would sign the general union with Bohemia and the other provinces, provided there was nothing in it contrary to the fidelity which he owed to that prince. The assembly, however, was not held in that place, but at Znaim, under the protection of the count de la Tour.

- DITRICHSTEIN*, who maintained a private correspondence with the senate of Brin, took the necessary precautions to preserve that place for Ferdinand: he threw one hundred and twenty men into the castle of Spilberg, and ordered the barons of Nachot and Valstein, to assemble their troops in one body, and join the count de Dampierre with the Hungarians, that they might march together against the Evangelic army. This junction, which might have laid the count de la Tour under great difficulties, was prevented by the address of that general, who gained over to his interest Stubenloff, lieutenant of the cavalry which Nachot commanded, and which by his example declared for the Protestants; so that Nachot, being abandoned by his troops, retired towards Austria. Every thing at Brin conspired to favour the same cause. Cardinal Ditrichstein, the prince of Lichtenstein, the senate, and the deputies of the Catholic states, were destitute of forces to maintain their authority. The citizens inclined towards the Protestants, and conferred a whole hour with the deputies of the assembly at Znaim, who, under an escort of eight hundred horse, commanded by Swenbeci, alighted at the hotel of Anderlitz for that purpose. During this conference, the burghers of Brin crowded together in the market-place, and Eudenbourg, one of the Evangelic deputies going down to the street, exhorted them to live in amity with the states of Bohemia. Inflamed by his harangue, they immediately ran to arms, and introduced Swenbeci with seven troops of German horse, who took possession of the city, which was no sooner secured, than the deputies, repairing to the market-place, persuaded the burghers to take an oath in public, to maintain the liberty of conscience, together with the authority and privileges of the states: then they went to the cardinal, and forbid him from thenceforward to assume the title of grand-master and captain-general of Moravia: the keys of the city and castle were taken from the senate and given to Stubenloff, together with the government of the place, for which he took the oath to the states<sup>h</sup>.
- Swenbeci takes possession of Brin.

- FERDINAND*, alarmed at these insurrections, began to be afraid of losing Silesia, whether he sent Otho Melcander, in order to maintain peace and prevent disturbances; and that minister promised to the inhabitants, the friendship of the king his master, and the confirmation of their privileges, provided they would continue quiet; but to these assurances the Evangelics replied, "Let his highness Ferdinand of Austria begin by appeasing the troubles of Bohemia and the incorporated provinces, and then in due time and place we shall act according to the dictates of our duty<sup>i</sup>."

- THE directors of Bohemia, being assured of Hungary, Moravia, and Silesia, ordered La Tour to march towards Austria; and in consequence of that order he passed the river Teia, and invested Laba before the Austrians had the least intimation of his approach. The states, however, of both communions sent deputies, desiring him to raise the siege of a place which ought not to be considered as an enemy's town; and he answering, that his sole aim in besieging Laba was to expel the foreign garrison, the count de Buchein, chief of the Catholic deputies, undertook to give him satisfaction on that score; and having performed his promise, the Bohemian general quitted the place, and with his army took the route to Vienna, in the suburbs of which he quartered his troops without resistance, while Ferdinand remained in the city, in order to prevent an insurrection of the Evangelics.
- La Tour marches into Austria.

- LA TOUR* would not begin the siege until he should have made all the necessary provisions for such an important enterprize; and content with having blocked up the place, confidently waited for a revolution within, which would spare abundance of bloodshed. He was so sure of taking Vienna, that he had already regulated the plan of government to be established in Austria, from whence he was resolved to drive the princes of that house, as well as to prevent Ferdinand's being elected king of the Romans. But while he continued inactive, waiting for the effect of his intelligence, matters took a very different and unexpected turn. The count de Buquoy, profiting by his absence, privately quitted his retrenchments at Budewitz, and fell upon the troops of Mansfeld with such fury, that they were entirely defeated<sup>k</sup>, and their general obliged to fly to Prague, which he filled with consternation and alarm, while the victor took fourteen hundred prisoners, and afterwards made himself master of divers important places. La Tour no sooner received the news of this misfortune, than he gave up his project upon Vienna: and reassembling all the forces of Bohemia, resolved to repair the disgrace of Mansfeld; but the count de Buquoy had retired to his intrenchments, which were too strong to be forced; so that the other, having retaken some fortresses, returned to Prague, where an act of confederacy was signed by the deputies of Silesia, Moravia, and Lusatia, for their common defence.

By this treaty Ferdinand was stripped of a fine kingdom, and the richest provinces belonging to the house of Austria; he was likewise deprived of the dignity of elector, consequently of the easiest means for ascending the Imperial throne, from which the confederates were resolved to exclude him. As their intention was no secret from the beginning, he had endeavoured to defeat it by disposing Matthias to hasten his election; but that scheme miscarried in consequence of the emperor's death. Besides, the Germans, who were tenacious of their liberty, and jealous of the power of the Austrian house, and particularly the Protestants, who interested themselves in the commotions of Bohemia, did not seem disposed to elect Ferdinand king of the Romans, or to take any step which might aggrandize a family, which numbered Hungary, Bohemia, and even the empire among its inheritances. Indeed, the Bohemians, who pretended that their crown was elective, offered the sovereignty to the duke of Savoy, who by his mother was grandson of the emperor Maximilian the second; and it was not till after he had declined the proposal, that they made a tender of it to the elector-palatine<sup>1</sup>.

clines being elected king of
the Romans.

With regard to the election of a king of the Romans, four electors, three of whom were Protestants, promised their suffrages to Maximilian duke of Bavaria, that in chusing a Catholic prince, the world might see they had no intention to exclude Ferdinand from the Imperial throne, on account of his religion, but solely to re-establish the Germanic liberty. In all likelihood this scheme would have succeeded, had not the ministers of the pope and the king of Spain exerted all their address in dissuading Maximilian from accepting an offer which might be attended with dangerous consequences, and in deferring the election, which was accordingly postponed till the twenty-eighth day of August New-style<sup>m</sup> (S). Towards the latter end of July, the electors of Mentz, Cologne, and Triers, together with the ambassadors of Saxony, the Palatinate, and Brandenburg, arrived in great pomp at Frankfort, whither also repaired Ferdinand as king of Bohemia, after having left the regency of his Austrian dominions to his brother Leopold.

The states of Bohemia resolving (if possible) to hinder Ferdinand's admission to the electoral diet, sent thither deputies, who being refused entrance at Frankfort, retired to Hanau, from whence they wrote a letter to the elector of Mentz, complaining that he had sent the act of convocation to Ferdinand, though he had not as yet taken possession of the kingdom of Bohemia, consequently could not enjoy the privileges of an elector, which were attached to that crown; for that the electorate was not a personal but a local dignity, which no king of Bohemia could exercise except in the name of the states. To these allegations Ferdinand replied in a manifesto, that the Bohemians, in a general assembly, had acknowledged him as successor and grandson of the emperor Ferdinand, and as heir of Anne queen of Bohemia, in which quality he had been proclaimed sovereign of that kingdom.

defeated by the Moravians,

This dispute was canvassed in several assemblies held by the electors and deputies; and the archbishops of Mentz, Triers, and Cologne, would have proceeded to the election of a king of the Romans without further delay; but the ambassadors objected to such precipitate measures, until they should know the pleasure of their masters on this subject. The elector-palatine endeavoured with all his might to delay the election, without, however, openly contesting the right of Ferdinand; and in order to demonstrate his attachment to the Bohemians, attacked and defeated the count de Solms in his march through the Palatinate, with five hundred horse, to join the count de Buquoy in Bohemia. This action, which he performed on pretence that they had entered his territories without permission, was followed by the defeat of Dampierre, who commanded a flying camp on the frontiers of Moravia and Austria: he had attempted to surprize the castle of Joslawitz, but his scheme miscarried through the vigilance and valour of the Moravian horse, which amounted to four thousand; and afterwards endeavoured to make a lodgment in Niclasburg, from whence being repulsed with loss, they pursued, overtook, and totally defeated him after an obstinate engagement, in which six hundred of his men were slain, so that he was fain to retreat in disorder to Vienna. Mean while, the count de Buquoy made himself master of several places in Bohemia; and taking Piseck by storm, put the garrison to the sword, and ordered the governor to be hanged. The fate of this place overwhelmed the neighbouring towns with consternation, and many people retired with their effects to Prague: their terrors were augmented by a rumour, importing, that the count de Buquoy intended to besiege Pilsen; but this report was altogether without foundation<sup>2</sup>.

a tion; and Ferdinand king of Bohemia being chosen future emperor, was conducted to the church, and solemnly proclaimed king of the Romans: while the states of Bohemia, informed of this event, renewed their complaints, and protested against the election. In order to satisfy these malcontents, the electors agreed to assemble in the diet, where the new emperor and the states of Bohemia should appear by their deputies, and each side plead their own cause, on condition that they would promise to submit to the decision of the assembly: but this expedient was rejected by the Bohemians, who renewed their protestation, and appealed to the states of the empire from the determinations of the assembly at Frankfort. This act they sent to the electors, who did not receive it till after the coronation of Ferdinand, which was performed on the ninth of September. Ferdinand is chosen emperor.

b THE majority of the princes murmured against the election of Ferdinand, wishing that the crown had been bestowed upon Maximilian of Bavaria, who might have been easily raised to that dignity, as two of the electors were of his own family, and two more attached to his interest; but none except the Austrian princes were proposed in the electoral college; and the choice would have fallen upon the archduke Albert; had not his ill state of health rendered him unfit for the toils of government. Among the articles of capitulation signed by Ferdinand, were two additional clauses, importing, that he would never disturb the vicars of the empire in the exercise of their jurisdiction, or permit any person whatsoever to dispute the rights that depend upon their vicariate; and that he would never admit into the aulic council any other than princes, counts, and barons, born and bred in Germany, and well versed in the constitutions of the empire. This last article was intended to remedy an abuse committed by the preceding emperors, who used to fill the aulic council with their creatures, in order to make their own party preponderate.

F E R D I N A N D.

d THIS election seemed to inflame the animosity of the Bohemians against Ferdinand. The states assembling at Prague on the twenty-ninth of August, resolved that they would never acknowledge him as their sovereign, but proceed to the election of a new king, and accordingly chose Frederic the fifth, elector-palatine, in that quality. This prince being apprised in form of their determination, demanded time to deliberate and consult his allies, the principal of whom were his father-in-law the king of England, and his two uncles prince Maurice and the duke of Bouillon. These last advised him to accept the crown, flattered, perhaps, with the prospect of seeing their nephew on a throne; and he listened to their advice, notwithstanding the remonstrances of James king of England, who used all his influence in dissuading him from receiving such a pernicious present, and even protested that he would give him no manner of assistance in such a rash undertaking. The count-palatine likewise desired to know the sentiments of the elector of Saxony, touching his promotion; and the answer being unsuitable to his own inclination, he addressed himself to the other princes and corresponding states assembled at Rottemburg, who counselled him to accept the crown, as well for the interest of his own house, as for that of the Protestant religion. Thus confirmed in his own opinion, he signified to the states of Bohemia; that having consulted his allies, he found them for the most part unanimous in favour of his election; and that he would, therefore, accept of the crown with the most grateful sentiments of acknowledgment to the states, who had bestowed upon him such an honourable mark of their esteem. He then made preparations for his journey to that kingdom, appointed the duke de Deuxponts governor of the electorate in his absence, left a good body of troops under the command of John-Lewis, count of Nassau, and having regulated all his other concerns in that country, set out with the electress; and upon the frontier of the Palatinate they were met by the deputies of Bohemia, who with twelve hundred horse conducted them to Prague. Frederic V: elector-palatine, is chosen king of Bohemia.

f THE archbishop having retired to Budewitz, from whence he refused to come and consecrate the new king, that ceremony was performed, on the fourth of November, by the administrator of the Hussites, and on the seventh of the same month the electress was also crowned. The name of king made no alteration in the behaviour of Frederic, who, in order to avert the storm which he foresaw must necessarily burst upon him, employed his whole attention in making preparations for war, and in strengthening himself with new alliances. Venice was the first power that acknowledged him king of Bohemia, and Beth- and marches towards Vienna.

La Tour attacks the Imperialists in their entrenchments.

leem-Gabor, vaivode of Transylvania, soon followed the example of that republic. He wanted a favourable opportunity to conquer northern Hungary; was assured of the Grand Seignor's protection; and, depending upon the diversion which the states of Bohemia, his allies, would make in Austria, he in all haste passed the river Teisse with his army, at the head of which he marched towards Cassovia. Gabor's sudden invasion of Hungary filled the whole kingdom with terror: the places were unprovided with arms, the garrisons had been withdrawn for the war in Bohemia, and Homanor, who commanded in Hungary, finding himself unable to cope with the vaivode, retired to the frontiers of Poland, leaving Gabor master of the country. He, accordingly, penetrated farther into the kingdom, in order to give the people an opportunity of declaring in his favour, and in eight days reduced Cassovia and Pileck; so that the states of High Hungary, astonished at the rapidity of his conquests, sent deputies to offer their submission, provided they should be allowed to enjoy their privileges; and he gladly acquiesced in that condition. Their example was soon followed by the towns of Low Hungary, which sent their keys to the vaivode, who then took the route to Vienna, bearing a standard of red damask, in which were represented two armed knights joining hands, with a device importing, Concord and Association (T). The archduke Leopold, who commanded in Vienna, being apprised of Gabor's march, sent orders to the count de Buquoy to repair with his army to the neighbourhood of that city. This general had taken Piseck, and intended to besiege Thabor; but that design miscarried, and he was obliged to retreat to Meroweis. The count de la Tour advanced towards the Imperial camp, and the proximity of the two armies produced frequent skirmishes, till at length both were fain to decamp for want of provisions; when La Tour, knowing that Buquoy was recalled into Austria, left very few troops in Bohemia, and took the route to Silesia, in order to join the Moravians and wait for succours from prince Gabor. This junction being effected, he followed the Austrians, whom he found intrenched at the distance of two miles from Vienna, and attacked their intrenchments with great fury; they defended themselves for a long time with equal obstinacy, until some casks of powder being blown up by accident, they imagined themselves surrounded by the enemy, were seized with a panic, and universal disorder ensued. In this emergency Buquoy performed the part of a great general: he explained the accident which had disconcerted them, confirmed those that wavered by his exhortations, and rallying the fugitives in person, renewed the battle, which continued till night, when both sides retired with abundance of loss. Next day the attack was carried on, though with less ardour; and La Tour, seeing no prospect of being able to force their entrenchments, ordered a retreat to be sounded, leaving two thousand men upon the spot, whereas the loss of the Austrians did not exceed six hundred.

WHILE Buquoy was thus detained in Austria, Mansfeld retook several places in Bohemia. Vinterbourg, Prales, and Piseck, submitted to him, almost without resistance; and Budewitz and Crumlaw were now the only towns in that kingdom which adhered to the house of Austria; but the siege of these was an enterprize which Mansfeld was not strong enough to undertake; he, therefore, contented himself with pillaging the adjacent country, and then returned to Pilsen, of which he was governor.

AT that time Gabor, having multiplied his conquests in Hungary, advanced at a great rate towards Presburg; and Forgatsi having informed the archduke of the danger that threatened this important place, the baron de Teiffenbach was sent thither with a reinforcement of a thousand men and three pieces of cannon. This officer took up his quarters in the suburbs, where, by means of a thick fog, he was surprised by Gabor, who totally routed his detachment, and summoned Forgatsi to surrender. The grandes of the kingdom, who were then in the city, left the palatine at liberty to act according to his own judgment; in consequence of which Presburg was surrendered, and a treaty concluded on these terms: Gabor shall be acknowledged prince of Hungary; Forgatsi continue in his office of palatine; the town and castle of Presburg be surrendered to Gabor; and liberty of conscience allowed through all Hungary.

In the mean time, the Protestant electors, princes, and states of the empire assembled at Nuremberg, whither the new king of Bohemia repaired in person with all his adherents. The states of High and Low Austria, and almost all the Imperial towns, sent deputies to this diet; and the emperor, knowing he had every thing to fear from such an assembly, sent thither the count de Hohen-Zollern, to manage his interests, and ward off the blows that should be aimed at his authority. Accordingly, this commissioner explained to the states, the pacific measures which his Imperial majesty had employed to quiet the troubles of Bohemia; and the Protestants answered his memorial by a recapitulation of all the grievances they had suffered from the courts of Vienna and Rome, and the Catholic league: they in-

- a treated the emperor to restore peace to Bohemia without delay, to pay some regard to their complaints of mal-administration, and no longer give ear to some ministers of his council, whose sole aim was to foment discord between the Germanic body and its chief. The count perceived from this answer, that the assembly of Nuremberg was disposed to favour the elector-palatine; and as he could not prevail upon the princes who composed it, to observe a neutrality in the present war, he returned to Vienna to give an account of his commission. All Germany was divided between the emperor and the elector-palatine; even those princes who were united within the empire, and at peace in their own dominions, prepared for making war upon one another in Bohemia. The Catholic league assembled at Wirtzburg.
- b The ambassadors of the emperor, the electors of Mentz, Cologne, and Triers, the dukes of Bavaria, Lorrain, and Neuburg, together with the deputies of the archbishops, bishops, abbots, prelates, and the Catholic Imperial towns, were present at this assembly, where they deliberated upon means for preserving the peace of Germany, and for raising a certain number of troops, to enable the emperor to reduce the Bohemians.

- ALTHOUGH Ferdinand's party was in itself more powerful than that of his antagonist, he resolved to insure success by having recourse to all the neighbouring powers. He obtained of the pope considerable sums to be levied on the clergy, and was assisted with troops by some Italian princes<sup>1</sup>. The king of Spain promised to supply him with eleven thousand men, and undertook to make a powerful diversion in the Palatinate<sup>2</sup>. The queen regent of France, who seemed to have forgot the politic maxim of that country, which had always favoured the enemies of the house of Austria, instead of troops, which she could not afford, sent ambassadors into Germany, in order to promote an accommodation. The king of Denmark and duke of Brunswic remained neuter; but Sigismund king of Poland, and the elector of Saxony, declared in favour of Ferdinand; and, notwithstanding the opposition of the Bohemian states and their new king, made great preparations for war. The emperor's officers levied forces in Naples and Sicily, in Lorrain, the Catholic electorates, and his own hereditary dominions: the marquis de Spinola entered the Lower Palatinate with a body of twelve thousand troops; and the duke of Bavaria, at the head of five and twenty thousand, spread fear and consternation among the malcontents of Upper Austria. Next to the emperor, this duke was the most avowed enemy of the count palatine. The ancient jealousy subsisting between their families, Maximilian's zeal for the Catholic religion, and his pretensions to the succession of the Austrian dominions, which he was afraid would be dismembered, were so many motives to engage his whole power in fixing the crown of Bohemia upon the head of Ferdinand, whom he himself might possibly succeed in that dignity.

- To counterbalance this powerful association, the palatine had secured the friendship of several princes, who promised to send him succours. The marquis of Brandenburg Anspach put himself at the head of thirteen thousand men, with whom he traversed the High Palatinate; and marching along the Danube, intrenched himself in Lower Austria, within sight of the duke of Bavaria. Bethleem Gabor undertook to send ten thousand Hungarians into Bohemia, upon the frontiers of which were the prince D'Anhalt and the duke of Saxe-Weimar, with two bodies of troops, who joined the army of La Tour and Mansfeld; so that all these considerations supported the hopes and courage of the elector.

- WE have already observed, that James the first, king of Great-Britain, had resolved to observe a neutrality in this dispute. Over and above his timorous disposition, which hindered him from engaging in quarrels of any sort, and his notions of indefeasible hereditary right, which he thought the Bohemians had infringed in favour of his son-in-law, he was swayed by other motives on this occasion; for he imagined that the two competitors for the crown of Bohemia would choose him as the arbitrator of their difference; and he was, besides, afraid of disobliging the house of Austria, so as to break off his darling match between his son the prince of Wales, and Mary infanta of Spain. Nevertheless, by dint of solicitation, he was prevailed upon to allow some noblemen, at their own expence, to raise two thousand four hundred men for the service of his son in law. The command of these was given to Horace Vere, under whom the earls of Essex and Oxford served as captains<sup>3</sup>.

- By this time all Germany was in commotion, and the princes and cities were obliged to hold frequent consultations about providing for their own safety. Among others, the elector of Saxony raised troops for the defence of his own dominions; and being questioned by the Bohemians concerning the intent of these levies, he answered they were destined to defend the circle of Upper Saxony, and would act against none but such as should attack the states of that province<sup>4</sup>. Soon after this declaration, he assisted at an assembly of the princes held at Mulhausen, at which were present the archbishops of Mentz and Cologne, together with deputies from the elector of Triers, the duke of Bohemia, and the landgrave of Hesse.

They wrote a letter to the elector-palatine, exhorting him to resign the crown of Bohemia, otherwise they would oppose him with their whole force, and at the same time sent dispatches of the same import to all the states which had embraced his party <sup>a</sup> (U). But receiving unsatisfactory answers, the assembly deliberated whether or not the palatine should be proscribed; though this measure was effectually opposed by the electors of Mentz and Saxony.

MEAN while, the war continued to rage in Bohemia. Teiffenbach (X), commander of the Moravians, made himself master of Niclasburg; and Buquoy, having attacked a body of Bohemians posted near Silfendorf, under the command of the baron de Fells, was repulsed with loss, although the baron lost his life in the action.

THE operations on both sides were suspended by the arrival of the duke d'Angouleme, <sup>b</sup> ambassador from the king of France, who in an assembly of the princes and free towns at Ulm, delivered a long discourse, in which he offered the good offices of his master for the re-establishment of peace in Germany <sup>a</sup>. The deputies having acknowledged their obligation to his most Christian majesty, proceeded to deliberate upon means for restoring the tranquility of the empire; but as they could not agree upon the measures to be taken for deciding the dispute between the emperor and count palatine, it was resolved, that the Catholic league and Protestant union should mutually abstain from hostilities; and that in case any one state of either communion (excepting Bohemia and the incorporated provinces) should be attacked, the rest without distinction should send succours to its assistance.

Ulm.

THE emperor, seeing all his negotiations miscarry, sent a summons to the elector-palatine, commanding him, on pain of incurring his high displeasure, to desist from all acts of hostility, and relinquish his pretensions to the crown of Bohemia. At the same time, he addressed monitory letters to the provinces of the empire, in alliance with Frederic, to the officers who served in his army, and to the imperial towns which espoused his cause, observing, that as they were in effect rebels to the imperial authority, he had a right to execute against them the constitutions of the empire; but preferring clemency to the rigour of justice, he would pardon them for what was passed, provided they would abandon Frederic and the Bohemians; but should they continue to favour their enemies, he would proceed against them with all the vengeance of offended majesty.

IT was not long before his mandate to the elector was answered by that prince, who affirmed that the crown of Bohemia being elective, the states of the kingdom have the sole right to judge whether or not his election was lawful; that they had an independent tribunal of their own, together with laws, privileges, and customs, different from the Germanic body, upon which they in no manner depended; therefore, the prince whom they had elected as their sovereign, could not be subject to the ban of the empire; that Ferdinand had acted contrary to the articles of his capitulation, in beginning to make war upon a prince of Germany, before he had been tried in the diet, and judged according to the imperial laws and capitulations, which he had sworn to observe before his coronation <sup>b</sup>.

IN the midst of this altercation, the duke of Bavaria, at the head of five and twenty thousand men, passed the Danube at Donawert, and advanced towards Brunsborg, while the marquis d'Anspach, lieutenant of the Protestant union, posted himself with thirteen thousand men between Langenau and Tropheim; but no hostilities were committed on either side. From this camp the duke of Bavaria, by the emperor's order, marched into Upper Austria, to reduce the Protestants of that province, who, after having made some resistance, assembled at Lintz, and seeing no prospect of succour, resolved to submit to the emperor. Accordingly they were pardoned on their promising to renounce their alliance with the Bohemians, and take the oath of allegiance to the emperor, as their lawful sovereign.

THE reduction of the Hungarian malcontents was not such an easy task. True it is, the emperor and Gabor had agreed to a truce for six months, during which it was hoped an accommodation might have been effected; but Ferdinand, seeing his forces augmenting every day, began to entertain hopes of reducing the Hungarians by force of arms. His army commanded by the duke of Bavaria, already amounted to fifty thousand men, ready

(U) These were the directors of Bohemia, Silesia, Moravia, and Lusatia, the Protestant princes, the states of Austria, the counties of Weteravia, the nobility of the Rhine, Franconia and Suabia, the cities of Nuremberg, Straßburg, Ulm, Spire, and Worms, and the malcontents of Hungary and Transylvania, which last had, a to enter Bohemia by the northern side of that kingdom. Spinola, at the head of four and twenty thousand Spaniards or Walloons, had begun his march to conquer the Palatinate; and the emperor knew there was a good number of Hungarian noblemen attached to the house of Austria, besides those who, being disobliged by the contrary interest, waited for nothing but an opportunity to declare in his favour.

GABOR, apprised of their dispositions, assembled the states of the kingdom at Neubaus, where they resolved to send ten thousand men into Bohemia, at the expiration of the truce; and in the mean time declared Bezbleem Gabor king of Hungary, and appointed a day for his coronation at Presburg. The Roman Catholic noblemen opposed his elevation with all their power; and as they knew all of their communion were well wishers to the house of Austria, b prepared for making a stand at Haimburg against the partisans of this new usurper.

BOHEMIA was in universal agitation. Frederic's army did not exceed thirty thousand men; a number sufficient to carry on a defensive war against the emperor: but the elector of Saxony, who had lately set an army on foot, harraised the states of Bohemia and their sovereign with continual alarms: they, therefore, sent deputies to Dresden, intreating that prince to observe a perfect neutrality; and he refusing their request, on pretence that it was his duty to assist the head of the empire against his rebellious subjects, they dispersed letters through Misnia and Saxony, in which they exhorted the towns and states of those two provinces to oppose the enterprizes of their sovereign. The elector was so much incensed at this conduct of the Bohemians, and so eager to augment his dominions of Lusatia, that he c entered this country at the head of twenty thousand men, made himself master of Gorlitz and several other towns, and invested Budissen, which having taken by assault after a siege of three weeks, he ordered forty of the principal inhabitants to be hanged. He met with the same success in subjecting the whole province, and compelled the marquis of Jagendorf, who commanded in it, to fly for refuge to Silesia.

FREDERIC was not so much alarmed at the conquests of the elector of Saxony, as at the murmurs of the Bohemians, who, finding themselves disappointed in their expectations from England, would neither heartily obey their king, nor resolve to own the emperor as their sovereign; for the duke of Bavaria, who was already in their country with an army of fifty thousand men, offered in the name of Ferdinand, a general amnesty, provided they d would submit to the emperor, and revoke all they had done in favour of Frederic. To this proposal they replied, that they were resolved to defend their liberties at the hazard of their lives, and that having taken all the measures which human prudence could suggest, they depended upon Providence for the issue; which answer being reported to the duke, he, with marks of extreme indignation, said to the messenger, "Since the Bohemians are determined to perish, they shall perish." Mean while, the elector-palatine saw himself reduced to a very disagreeable situation; for he was hemmed in by the Saxon army on the north, and the Imperialists on the south, so as to be in danger of seeing his troops perish for want of subsistence. In this emergency he had recourse to the advice of the count de La Tour, a man extremely fruitful in expedients, who counselled him to send a body of Hungarians to ravage Misnia, these being the surest means to oblige the elector of Saxony to return to the succour of that province: with regard to the Imperialists, it was his opinion, that he ought to keep on the defensive, and let them insensibly diminish and disperse in consequence of sieges, sickness, death, and desertions.

FREDERIC approved of the scheme, in consequence of which he sent five thousand Hungarians to the frontiers of Misnia, beyond which, however, they could not penetrate, the elector having left a sufficient body of troops to defend that province; and he ordered the count de la Tour and the prince of Anhalt to cover the towns which were in the route of the Austrian army, and to throw garrisons into them when they should be obliged to retire, that by these means the progress of the enemy might be retarded.

f IN the mean time, Spinola with five and twenty thousand men made an irruption into the Palatinate, surprised Crutznach, took Oppenheim by assault, and seized all the provisions of the count-palatine, who with his allies loudly exclaimed against this infraction of the agreement at Ulm. In the midst of these transactions, Henry Frederic de Nassau joined the marquis d'Anspach with eight thousand infantry, and one thousand horse; and a council was held, in which some officers proposed to give battle to the Spaniards; but this proposal was rejected by the majority, and a misunderstanding arose between the marquis and the English, of which Spinola taking the advantage, plundered the Palatinate with impunity.

BUT, without pretending to give a minute detail of all the actions performed by detached bodies, let us observe the operations of the principal armies. That of the emperor, g composed of fifty thousand men, commanded by the count de Buquoy and the duke of Bavaria, having in one month reduced almost all the places in Bohemia, encamped near Pil-

sen, which was garrisoned by Mansfeld, as if they had intended to besiege that city; but the season being too far advanced for such an enterprize, the generals resolved to continue their route to Prague, towards which place they accordingly marched in order of battle, and their rear was attacked by Mansfeld, who, after a very warm action, was repulsed with loss.

FREDERIC, who with thirty thousand men was intrenched at Rockensen, no sooner understood the intention of the Imperialists, than he passed the little river of Pilsen, and followed the enemy, with whom he incessantly skirmished, until both armies arrived in the neighbourhood of Prague; and the count-palatine, foreseeing that he should be obliged to hazard a general action, sent his son Charles-Lewis to the elector of Brandenburg, who received and entertained him with the most generous hospitality.

FREDERIC, resolving to stand upon the defensive, took possession of a rising ground, upon which he drew up his forces in order of battle; then he rode through the ranks exhorting the soldiers to do their duty, and ordered the gates of Prague to be shut, that they might see they had no resource but in their own valour. The duke of Bavaria, perceiving their excellent order and determined countenance, called a council of war, to determine whether or not it would be proper to attack them; and this question being unanimously decided in the affirmative, the army was drawn up in three unequal lines; and the baron de Tilly, who was at the head of the Bavarian horse, on the left of the first line, ordered to begin the action. He accordingly passed a rivulet and morasses that covered the right of the Bohemians, and charged them with great fury, but met with such a reception as made him retire with great disorder. Buquoy then advanced with a large reinforcement to support him, and was encountered by Frederic himself, who sustained his efforts, and in his turn attacked him with uncommon valour, so that his troops gave way and fled in great confusion. From that moment victory would have declared for the count-palatine, had he restrained his men from pursuing the fugitives; but so inconsiderate was their ardour upon this occasion, that Buquoy observing the victors as much disordered as the vanquished, rallied some squadrons of horse, and seconded by colonel Verdugo, returned to the charge with incredible impetuosity. Notwithstanding all the efforts of the elector, who exerted extraordinary courage and activity in reducing his troops to order, and opposing this torrent, they bore down all before them; and Frederick being abandoned by his soldiers, was forced to retire. At the same, his left wing was broke by the duke of Bavaria; and the rest of his army being overwhelmed by the number of the foe, betook themselves to flight, leaving to the Imperialists their baggage, cannon, and five thousand dead upon the field of battle, besides a great number who were drowned in the Moldau. The elector finding it impracticable to rally the wreck of his army retired into Prague, from whence he departed that same night for Silesia, with his wife, children, and most valuable effects. The Imperialists, whose loss did not exceed five hundred men, encamped under the walls of that place, which submitted to the clemency of the duke of Bavaria, who entering the city in triumph, ordered the gates to be kept shut for six hours, that the authors of the revolt might not escape; and La Tour's wife and son were sent to prison, together with a great number of noblemen and citizens (Y).

arrives at Vienna as ambassador from the king of England.

FREDERICK's defeat was no sooner known in England, than the people of that kingdom, and even the parliament, began to murmur at the king's indifference towards his son-in-law; but James was so effectually amused by the address of Gondemar, the Spanish ambassador, who assured him that he would ruin the match between the prince of Wales and the infanta, if he did not keep aloof in the affair of the Palatinate, that he still refused to take any material steps in favour of the elector: indeed he sent lord Digby to Vienna, in order to negotiate an accommodation. That ambassador being admitted to an audience, demanded that the elector-palatine should be re-established in the dominions which he possessed before he was elected king of Bohemia; and that the emperor should postpone the intended ban against him for some time, during which his father-in-law would do his utmost endeavours to oblige him to make suitable satisfaction to the head of the empire. Ferdinand, whose chief aim was to gain time, answered, that he was very well disposed to pay the most profound regard to the recommendation of his Britannic majesty, and would willingly pardon the count-palatine, provided he would make proper satisfaction for his past misconduct; but as the war had been undertaken by the advice, and with the assistance of several princes of Germany, he could not conclude any treaty without their con-

a sent, though he would convoke a diet at Ratisbon, and communicate the resolutions of it to the king of England<sup>1</sup>. A few days after he delivered this answer, he received a letter from the infanta Isabella, announcing the death of the archduke her husband, which happened at Brussels on the thirtieth of July, and beseeching him to regard the intercession which had been made in favour of Frederic. On the back of this intreaty Digby presented a memorial, in which he demanded a truce for the Lower Palatinate, in consideration of which Frederic should order Mansfeld to desist from his operations, revoke the commission which he had given to John-George marquis of Jagerndorf, and put the emperor in possession of Thabor and Witigaw, the only places which still held out against him in Bohemia.

b FERDINAND, by letters to the king of England and Isabella, assured them, that in consequence of their mediation, he would treat of a truce upon these terms, before the expiration of which a general peace might be negotiated; but at the same time, he told Digby that he could not grant the suspension he had demanded, without the consent of the duke of Bavaria, who was then in the High Palatinate, whither he advised the ambassador to repair with his proposal. Digby forthwith set out for that country; and when he explained, his errand he was told by the duke, that there was no occasion to negotiate a truce for a province which was almost totally subdued, and that he would take such measures as would in a little time extinguish the war<sup>k</sup>. In effect, he had by this time no body to cope with but Mansfeld, who being obliged to quit Bohemia, had retired to the Upper Palatinate. The elector of Saxony had over-run Lusatia, the count de Buquoy had subdued Moravia; c but Silesia was still kept firmly attached to Frederic, by the influence of the duke of Jagerndorf, one of the most powerful noblemen of that province<sup>l</sup>.

In this conjuncture, the emperor giving way to his resentment against the princes in alliance with the palatine, put him and all his confederates to the ban of the empire, by an edict declaring Frederic divested of all his dominions, of the dignity of elector, and the honours of the empire, which he had hitherto enjoyed; and proscribing John-George duke of Jagerndorf, Christiern prince d'Anbalt, George-Frederic count de Hohenloe, together with the other princes and noblemen, who had assisted the palatine either with their persons or their arms<sup>m</sup>. This effect made an impression upon the states of Silesia, which, at the intercession of the elector of Saxony, were pardoned by Ferdinand, after they had renewed the oath of d allegiance, disbanded their troops, and obliged themselves to pay within the year three hundred thousand florins, for the occasions of his imperial majesty.

The elector-palatine had quitted this country, leaving the princess his wife at Custrin, where she was delivered of a son called Maurice, and repaired to the king of Denmark, who received him with open arms, and undertook to mediate an accommodation at the court of Vienna; but the more Frederic yielded in the course of this negotiation, the more was exacted by the ministers of the emperor, who not only insisted upon his renouncing the crown of Bohemia, but likewise upon his ceding the Upper Palatinate to the duke of Bavaria: they, moreover, demanded that he would reimburse that prince, and the house of Austria for the expences of the war, and repair to Vienna, in order to make what personal satisfaction the emperor should think proper to require<sup>n</sup>. These proposals were too harsh to e be accepted, and some time was consumed in manifestoes and other fruitless attempts towards a peace, while the duke of Bavaria, who was charged with the execution of the imperial ban, entered the Upper Palatinate, and at Straubing joined the baron de Tilly, who had all along observed the motions of Mansfeld. This last officer, at the head of eight thousand men, had for some months kept the war alive, not without extraordinary success; but understanding that the duke of Bavaria had passed the Danube at Straubing, and that several places in the Upper Palatinate had submitted to his orders, he traversed the Nab, and encamped upon the river Pregnitz, in the neighbourhood of Nuremberg; where, having intrenched himself with a view to wait for an opportunity of penetrating into the Lower Palatinate by f Franconia, he was suddenly invested by the duke; and being destitute of provisions and ammunition, saw it would be impossible to retreat before such a considerable army, without exposing himself to a certain overthrow. In this disagreeable situation he had recourse to stratagem, and signified to the duke of Bavaria, that he was willing to abandon the service of Frederic, and join the emperor with his army: he even drew up the articles of the treaty, demanded provisions and money, part of which he actually received, and admitted the Imperialists into Valdhausen, in token of his sincerity, and so artfully lulled the suspicion of the duke, that he found means to decamp without his knowledge and reach the Lower Palatinate, where his presence soon changed the face of affairs<sup>o</sup>.

A TRUCE for five weeks had been concluded between Spinola, general of the Spanish army in that province, and Horace Vere, who commanded the troops of the elector. The governers of the Low Countries made the king of England believe that this truce was granted to his solicitation; but the emperor's real reason for consenting to it, was that he might have time to send forces into the Lower Palatinate, in the room of those which Spinola was obliged to withdraw into Brabant to overawe the Dutch. Accordingly, Gonçales de Cordova, who succeeded to the command, was soon reinforced to the amount of eighteen thousand men; and Vere, being obliged to retire to Worms, he had no other enemy to fear, so that he took Stetin, Lademburg, and Keiserlautern, and had already reduced Frankendal to extremity; when Mansfeld, hastening to its succour, compelled him to raise the siege and retreat.

Frederic has recourse to the kings of Sweden and Denmark.

FREDERIC was at that time in Holland, where he had been received rather like a conqueror than a fugitive, and accommodated with a monthly allowance of ten thousand florins for his subsistence. He had retired to this country that he might be near England, from whence he still expected assistance and protection; but finding James as much as ever averse to any effectual engagement in his favour, he addressed himself to the kings of Sweden and Denmark, who had a personal interview at Segebert, where the palatine was present, together with the ambassadors of Brandenburg, the Protestant princes, and the states of Holland. Whatever were the deliberations of this assembly, certain it is, the king of Denmark undertook to send a magnificent embassy to Vienna, to solicit the emperor in favour of Frederic; and to his remonstrances the ministers of Ferdinand replied, that a diet was already summoned to meet at Ratisbon, where such measures would be taken on that subject as should be agreeable to the German princes. The king of England likewise complained of the invasion of the Palatinate, as a breach of the promise which Ferdinand had given, and explained his sentiments touching the satisfaction which the emperor had a right to expect from his son-in-law, observing at the same time, that in case his mediation should be rejected, he would at length have recourse to arms in favour of the elector. The emperor, who knew his disposition too well to be alarmed at these menaces, continued still to amuse him with the hopes of peace, and sent the count de Schwartzemburg to England, in order to negotiate the conditions of a truce.

The count de Buquoy makes some progress in Hungary, and loses his life in an engagement near Neuhaus.

IN the mean time, he dispatched the count de Buquoy into Hungary, to renew the truce with Betbleem Gabor, whom he would have honoured with the title of prince of Hungary, and a pension of one hundred thousand florins; but the vaivode demanding other advantages which were refused, both sides prepared for war, which was renewed with great animosity. Buquoy invested and took Presburg upon capitulation, and many other places surrendered to him on the same terms; while the marquis de Colalte reduced a number of towns and castles in Low Hungary, to the dominion of the house of Austria. At length, Buquoy undertook the siege of Neuhaus, which was defended with great gallantry. The count de la Tour, being detached with six thousand men from the army of Gabor, fell upon a convoy guarded by two thousand Austrians, who being put in disorder, Buquoy mounted his horse in order to rally and support them; but in spite of all his endeavours, they were totally routed, and he himself lost his life in the engagement; so that the Imperialists were obliged to raise the siege, and retreat with precipitation to Gutta upon the Danube, after having abandoned their train of artillery. Gabor, taking the advantage of their discomfiture and absence, made some new conquests, and being joined by Jagerndorf with his Moravians and Silesians, resolved to retake Presburg, which was accordingly invested; but Colalte defended the place with such vigour, that they were fain to relinquish the enterprize, after the trenches had been opened a whole month.

Gabor invests the city of Presburg.

ABOUT this time the elector Palatine, who had returned to Holland, was informed that the emperor had ordered the principal authors of the revolt in Bohemia to be put to death; nine of the directors of that kingdom having been beheaded, and two and thirty hanged. The execution of so many zealous adherents could not but be very grievous to Frederic, who, seeing he had nothing to expect from his father-in-law, resolved to take other measures for retrieving his dominions. He was still master of Manheim, Heidelberg, and Frankendal; and count Mansfeld, though retired into Alsace, was ready to enter the Lower Palatinate: he therefore engaged prince Christiern of Bruswick to levy an army in Westphalia, and join the count; and made a contract of the same nature with the prince of Baden-Dourlach. Accordingly Christiern took the field, and made himself master of some places in the county of La Marck: from thence he marched to the electorate of Mentz, and afterwards committed horrible devastations in the dominions of the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt. On the other hand, the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel ravaged the country belonging to the counts de Waldec, on pretence that they had received an investiture from the emperor of some fiefs which he held of his landgraviate: besides, a dispute subsisted between him and the landgrave of

- Darmstadt*, about the sovereignty of Marpurg; and, as the emperor favoured his rival, he embraced the party of the count palatine. The counts of Waldec and the landgrave of Darmstadt complained of these hostilities to Ferdinand, who ordered the duke of Brunswick-Halberstadt and the landgrave of Hesse to lay down their arms; on pain of being proceeded against with all the rigour of the law: but the count d'Anhalt, who commanded the troops of Cologne, took a more effectual method, by joining the forces of Mentz and Darmstadt, and marching across Weteravia to the valley of Buccen, in quest of Christiern, whom he found intrenched in a wood. He immediately commanded his carabineers to alight and attack the Halberstadians, who, being broke and defeated, retired in disorder to the territories of Paderborn and Munster, burning and pillaging the whole country. As for the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, when he saw Anhalt so near his dominions; he, by a letter, desired to know his intentions; when the other replied, that he had no orders to enter Hesse, and exhorted him to lay down his arms, and live in peace with the landgrave of Darmstadt. Mean while, Christiern committed great excesses in Westphalia: he ruined Pukelsheim and Bereurie, and ordered the inhabitants to be hanged: he destroyed the country with fire and sword; and, retiring to Lippe, treated all the villages as a conquered province, laying taxes and levying contributions at pleasure. The licence and impunity of his soldiers, encouraged a number of profligate ruffians to enlist in his service; so that his army, being thus augmented, soon became superior to that of Anhalt, and, over-running the bishoprics of Munster and Paderborn, filled every place with carnage and desolation (Z).
- THE emperor, whose sole aim was to subdue the elector palatine and all his partizans, resolved to employ his whole forces on the Rhine; and for that purpose granted advantageous conditions to Bethleem Gabor, who, in consequence of a treaty concluded at Niclasburg renounced the title and dignity of king of Hungary, promised to restore the crown and royal ornaments within eighteen days, and retire to Cassovia; and bound himself, by oath, to give no further disturbance to the house of Austria. Ferdinand, on his part, promised to create Gabor a prince of the empire; to let him enjoy, during life, a viscountship in Hungary; to cede, in his favour, the dutchies of Oppelen and Ratibor in Silesia: to mortgage some castles in Hungary for the payment of a certain sum; and to pay yearly fifty thousand florins, to maintain the garrisons of these places, the soldiers of which should take the oath of allegiance to Ferdinand and Gabor. During these negotiations the marriage of the emperor with Eleonora de Gonzaga, sister of the duke of Mantua, was celebrated at Oedembourg; and, after the rejoicings, the affairs of Hungary were regulated in a diet, where Ferdinand granted a general amnesty, and liberty of conscience to the Protestants.
- IN the mean time, Mansfeld, who had been obliged to retire from the Lower Palatinate by the superior force of count Tilly, marched into the bishopric of Strasbourg, took the rich abbey of Mour-Munster, made himself master of Hagenau, and opened the trenches before Saverne; but the besieged having received a reinforcement of two thousand men, he was obliged to relinquish the enterprize; and, dividing his army into small bodies, laid waste the whole province of Alsace. It was not, however, upon the valour and activity of Mansfeld alone that the elector palatine depended: he entertained great hopes from the power and influence of George-Frederic, marquis of Baden-Dourlach, who espoused his interest out of resentment against the emperor, who had adjudged the half of the marquisate of Baden to William, son of Edward, surnamed the Fortunate. This decision he considered as a grievance, because Edward having married a simple gentlewoman, her children were disqualified from inheriting the marquisate: having therefore resigned his dominions to his eldest son, he levied an army of thirteen thousand foot and three thousand horse, and prepared a considerable train of artillery, with all sorts of warlike munition. The elector palatine, elevated with the news of this armament, departed from Holland, traversed France in disguise, and arrived at Landau, where he was received by the governor count de Lowenstein, and immediately joined by Mansfeld, with whom he forthwith passed the Rhine, and obliged Tilly to raise the siege of Dilsberg. This general afterwards encamped in the front of a forest, near Wisseloch, in order to prevent their junction with the marquis of Baden-Dourlach; and Mansfeld, in order to drive them from this advantageous post, contrived an ambuscade, which succeeded to his wish. He posted his vanguard at Mingelheim; and,

(Z) Christian, or Christiern, duke of Brunswick, surnamed the Furious, called himself the friend of God, and enemy of priestcraft. Fearing that, should the Catholic party prevail, he would lose the bishopric of Halberstadt, of which he was in possession, he declared for the elector palatine, and fixing a glove of the electress in his hat, he swore he would either die or re-establish

Fredric in his dominions. He used to threaten the peasants with mutilation, in order to prevent their revolting, and tell them by way of raillery, that a countryman who was born for the plough, ought to be contented with one natural hand and foot, and supply the other with wood (1).

having disposed his artillery, detached some squadrons to skirmish with the enemy, before whom they pretended to fly. Tilly fell into the snare; for, having pursued them as far as Mingelheim, Mansfeld appeared upon their flank, plied them with his artillery, and attacked them with such fury, that they were utterly defeated, with the loss of two thousand men, and all their baggage<sup>a</sup>.

THE marquis of Baden Dourlach no sooner received the news of this victory, than, believing this was a proper opportunity to signalize himself, he, instead of joining Mansfeld, according to the advice and desire of Frederic, marched directly to Tilly; who had by this time posted himself between Vimpfen and Heilbron, and was reinforced by some Spanish regiments under the command of Gonçales de Cordova: for Mansfeld had given him time to rally his troops, by undertaking the siege of Lademburg. The Bavarian general did not decline the engagement, which began with equal fury on both sides, and at first the marquis had some advantage; but at length Tilly, after having sustained several repulses, broke his main body, and gained a complete victory over the marquis, who lost all his cannon and baggage, together with two thousand men, and with great difficulty escaped to Mansfeld with a small party of horse<sup>b</sup>.

THE count was still employed in the siege of Lademburg, which he at last took by assault, and put all the garrison to the sword: then, leaving the elector to repair the works, he re-passed the Rhine, in order to relieve Hagenau, which was invested by the archduke Leopold. Having advanced as far as Frankendal, he surprised and cut to pieces a detachment of a thousand men; and this success filled the archduke's army with such terror and consternation, that all his efforts were insufficient to detain one foldier; so that he was obliged to abandon his artillery, provisions, and ammunition: two thousand of his men were slaughtered in their retreat towards Dresenheim; the rest of his army fled to Dachstein, Molsheim, and Saverne; and the considerable magazines which Leopold had prepared at Bischwiller, fell into the hands of the elector. Mansfeld, having performed this exploit, crossed the Rhine again; and, being joined by Frederic and the marquis of Baden, marched with an army of twenty thousand men into the country of Darmstadt, which was abandoned to plunder, the landgrave himself being defeated and taken prisoner. But their progress was soon checked by Tilly, who, being reinforced, advanced with his light cavalry, and, attacking their rear, obliged them to retreat with great loss into the forest of Lorche; from whence they repaired to the Palatinate in great disorder, being altogether destitute of money and provisions<sup>c</sup>.

FREDÉRIC, having now no other resource, wrote to the duke of Brunswick to come and join him with his troops. That prince had ravaged the whole country situated upon the river Lippe: being supported by the Dutch, he had taken several towns in the territory of Paderborn, and fortified himself in Lippstadt, where he had fixed his head-quarters. Here, however, he was in danger of being cooped up by Anhalt, reinforced with ten thousand men from the Low Countries, had not the states of Holland made a diversion in his favour, by assembling all their troops at Nimeguen; in consequence of which, the arch-dutche's was fain to recal the Spaniards: so that Christiern was ready to take the field again, when he received the elector's orders<sup>d</sup>.

He accordingly began his march, levying contributions and plundering the country through which he passed. Having traversed the territory of Cassel, and the circle of the Upper Rhine, he advanced towards Frankfort upon the Maine, while Tilly and Gonçales waited for him at Hanau: but the duke, changing his route, marched to Urfel, where he employed his men in building a bridge over the river; and Tilly, passing it at Aschaffenburg, approached him in order of battle. Christiern was not backward to engage, and the fight was for a long time maintained with equal courage on both sides; but the issue was fatal to the duke, who was intirely defeated, and found great difficulty in escaping with five troops of horse to Bensfeld, whither the count of Mansfeld had advanced to join his forces<sup>e</sup>.

THIS defeat gave the finishing stroke to the party of Frederic, who, at the solicitation of the elector of Saxony and Maurice prince of Hesse, set at liberty the landgrave of Darmstadt. The marquis of Dourlach, disheartened at so many disasters, disbanded his troops and retired to Hocheberg; while the elector, Mansfeld, and Christiern, retreating into Lower Alsace, were hospitably received, and supplied with all necessaries, by the city of Strasbourg, which had been always attached to the Protestant cause.

ALL these successes could not dispel the disquiet of Ferdinand, who still dreaded a reverse of fortune while Mansfeld and Brunswick were in the service of the count palatine. As he suspected that several princes of Germany waited only for a favourable opportunity to espouse the cause of his antagonist, and that the kings of England and Denmark might at length engage heartily in the elector's interest, he durst not put in execution the design he had form-

- a ed of transferring the palatine electorate to the ducal house of Bavaria. In answer to the solicitations that were daily made in behalf of Frederic, he continually declared, that the palatine could expect no favour while he retained in his service proscribed partizans, who laid waste whole provinces, in contempt of the laws and constitutions of the empire; but that, if he would dismiss Christiern and Mansfeld, the emperor would pay proper regard to the mediation of England and Denmark. Trusting to this declaration, the unhappy elector complied with the advice of his father-in-law; and, in an evil hour, depriving himself of these two enterprising and indefatigable officers, retired to Sedan, the residence of his uncle the marechal de Bouillon. This was the most imprudent step he had ever taken, and diametrically opposite to the policy of all princes, who, in order to facilitate a peace, never fail to increase their preparations for war.

- b c WHILE Frederick in this manner contributed to the ruin of his own affairs, count Tilly finished the conquest of the Palatinate by the reduction of Heidelberg and Manheim, from whence the famous library of the elector was sent to the duke of Bavaria, who kept part of the books for his own use, and made a present of the rest to the vatican at Rome <sup>a</sup>. At the same time the archduke Leopold, having taken Brisac, passed the Rhine, made himself master of Hagenau, Landaw, and Weissenburg, re-established the bishop of Spire, took Germerheim, which he abandoned to plunder; then repassing the river, executed the sentence of the Aulic council in favour of William marquis of Bade-Baden; who was no sooner settled in his dominions, the possession of which had been disputed by George-Frederic, than he restored the Catholic religion in the marquisate of Baden, from whence it had been long exiled. Worms, Landaw, and the other cities which had favoured the elector-palatine, now received Imperial garrisons; the revolution became general, Frankendal alone being spared out of complaisance for the governors of the Low Countries, who thought such an instance of lenity might forward the peace.

- d e f DURING these transactions, Mansfeld and the duke of Brunswick marched towards Lorrain, at the head of an army consisting of ten thousand foot and eight thousand horse, with fourteen pieces of cannon, and passing the Moselle, encamped above Metz, in order to deliberate upon their next expedition. While they continued in this situation, Mansfeld was solicited to enter into the service of the king of France; but his terms were so high, that Lewis XIII. did not think proper to comply with them, and the negotiation being broke off, the count continued his route to the neighbourhood of Sedan, where the duke de Bouillon, chief of the French Calvinists, employed all his address in persuading him to take the command of that party, which was then upon the decline: the emperor dreading his return into Germany, attempted to buy his friendship with a pension and considerable presents; the archduchess fearing he would fall upon Luxemburg, sent very advantageous proposals to him, on the part of the king of Spain; the king of England made the most pressing instances to dissuade him from abandoning the elector-palatine; the states of Holland courted his assistance in raising the siege of Berg; and finally, the Venetians essayed to engage him in their interests, promising to invest him with the command of their army: so that this single man, without either country or habitation, money, or allies, was, at one time, equally feared and flattered by all the chief powers of Europe <sup>b</sup>. He resisted, however, all these tempting offers, and resolved to penetrate into France, in order to support the reformed of that kingdom; but Gonçales having passed the Rhine to protect Luxemburg, joined the duke de Nevers, who had raised some troops in order to oppose the count and the duke of Brunswick, and following them into Thierache, a battle ensued, in which Mansfeld was intirely defeated, after having left five thousand killed and wounded upon the field. The Spaniards pursued the fugitives, of whom they slew a great number, and took abundance of prisoners, with the whole baggage and artillery: yet notwithstanding this discomfiture, in which the duke of Brunswick lost an arm, Mansfeld, with the troops which he could rally, marched with great expedition to the assistance of the Dutch, and actually compelled Spinola to raise the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom.

Mansfeld is put to flight by Gonçales and the duke de Nevers.

MANSFELD being thus disabled from giving Ferdinand any further disturbance, the Imperialists made themselves masters of Glatz; which was the last place in Bohemia that held out for the elector-palatine; and that kingdom being wholly reduced, the emperor published a second edict for apprehending those who were proscribed, and for prosecuting such rebels as had not yet been tried: some of these having consulted their safety in flight, were found guilty of treason, outlawed, and their effects were confiscated for the use of the emperor. Others, who stood their trial, were condemned to death; but the emperor changed their punishment into perpetual imprisonment. These measures being taken, Ferdinand declared, that for the future there should be none but Catholic magistrates through all his hereditary dominions; and this resolution was signified to the governor of Prague by the prince de Liechtenstein, viceroy of Bohemia, who likewise, by the emperor's order, gave notice that all the ministers of the Augsburg confession should leave the city in four hours, and be for ever exiled from the hereditary countries. In consequence of this mandate the Protestant churches were shut up, and the administration of the university vested in the jesuits, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the elector of Saxony, protector of the Augsburg confession, who, in letters to the prince of Liechtenstein, and the elector of Mentz, complained of these alterations. Besides these, the emperor had resolved to make other regulations, about which he was desirous of consulting the electors and princes of the empire<sup>c</sup>; for which purpose he summoned a diet to meet at Ratisbon, where, however, he took care that a majority of his own friends should be present; for his chief design was to transfer the palatine electorate to the person of Maximilian duke of Bavaria. Accordingly the diet was no sooner opened, than the emperor made a long detail of Frederic's crimes and misconduct, for which he had been proscribed and deprived of the electoral dignity, which, by the law called Commissorial, having devolved to his Imperial majesty, he now, from the plenitude of his power, transferred it to the person of Maximilian duke of Bavaria, in consideration of that prince's great services during the late war<sup>d</sup>.

A. D. 1623.

Neuburg's remonstrances.

THIS proposal met with great opposition from the Spaniards, who were by no means inclined to aggrandize the house of Bavaria, the ancient rival of the Austrian family, or to disoblige the king of England, with whom they were at that time heartily disposed to enter into alliance, by concluding the marriage of the infanta with the prince of Wales. As for the electors and other princes, they were differently swayed by their different motives and views of interest. The archbishop of Mentz, who had been long an inveterate enemy of the palatine, eagerly wished for the Bergstræß: the elector of Cologne of course favoured his brother the duke of Bavaria: the archbishop of Triers being Frederic's professed enemy, desired nothing so much as to see him intirely deprived of his dominions, and to obtain some portion of the spoil: the archbishop of Saltzburg, whose country lay between the emperor and the duke of Bavaria, durst not disoblige such powerful neighbours: the landgrave of Darmstadt wanted an opportunity to secure the favour of Ferdinand, who was to judge in his dispute about Marpurg; and the elector of Saxony being incensed against the emperor, for having expelled the Protestants from Bohemia, would not be present at the diet; but he and the elector of Brandenburg sent thither deputies to declare, that they would never consent to the intended investiture of the duke of Bavaria. Wolfgang-William, duke of Neuburg, loudly complained, that, contrary to the disposition of the golden bull, a distant relation should succeed to the inheritance of a criminal, to the prejudice of the nearest kinsmen, who were innocent; and, in his answer to the emperor's proposal, observed, that although the elector-palatine might have deserved such punishment as Ferdinand meant to inflict, the manner of proceeding against him, appeared unlawful, as he had neither been legally summoned, tried, nor condemned; and, as in causes of the least importance, according to the capitulation which his Imperial majesty had sworn to observe, and which was deemed a fundamental law of the empire, the accused is always judged by his peers; it was highly reasonable, that in cases of great consequence, the same rule should be obeyed. Besides, to transfer the electorate to the duke of Bavaria, in prejudice of the palatine's children, brother, and nearest kinsmen, who had given no cause of offence to the emperor, would be an unjust violation of the laws of the empire, and the custom always observed on such occasions, and introduce an innovation destructive to the fundamentals of electoral succession (A).

As these arguments had no weight with the emperor, the duke composed a second remonstrance, in which he solemnly appealed to his Imperial majesty's paternal clemency and patriotism, and represented, that the intended translation would infallibly prove a source of jealousy and distrust between the chief and the members of the empire, and sow the seeds of another cruel war, as the kings and princes, allies and relations of the palatine house, would certainly use their utmost efforts in the maintenance of its rights and pretensions<sup>e</sup>.

THE emperor, notwithstanding such exhortations, continued inflexibly attached to his purpose and promise, and foreseeing that his proposal would be sanctioned by a majority of suffrages, he solemnly conferred the electoral dignity on Maximilian duke of Bavaria; but at the same time promised to convoke another diet, in which the rights and pretensions of the palatine's children and relations should be examined and regulated, either by accom-

(A) While Ferdinand was employed in answering this remonstrance, the ambassadors of the king of Denmark, the elector of Brandenburg, the dukes of Brunswick, Holftein, and Mecklenburg, with the deputies of the hanse-towns of Bremen, Hamburg, Lubeck, and Lunenburg, held an assembly in Lower Saxony, and engaged in an association for the defence of that province; and Christiern duke of Brunswick-Halberstadt, was created captain-general of the army of the confederates.

a modulation or form of law. Then the duke of Bavaria was brought into the assembly, and kneeling by the emperor, from whose hands having received the electoral cap and mantle, he took the usual oath upon the evangelists<sup>1</sup>; but the deputies of Saxony and Brandenburg, the duke of Neuburg, and the Spanish ambassador, refused to assist at this investiture. The new elector was put in possession of all the Upper Palatinate, except the bailiwicks of Barekstein and Weidem, which were reserved for the duke of Neuburg; and at that time these benefits were limited to the person of Maximilian, after whose death the natural succession should take place: but the prosperity of Ferdinand, upon whom fortune smiled from every quarter, soon inspired him with other ideas. Perceiving Frederic and his party utterly abased, he divided his spoils at pleasure. He gave to Maximilian that part of the Lower Palatinate, which

b is on the farther side of the Rhine, in exchange for Upper Austria, which had been mortgaged to him for one hundred and fifty thousand rix-dollars: to the king of Spain he abandoned the rest of the Lower-Palatinate, except the bailiage of Germerheim, with its dependencies, which he bestowed upon his son the archduke Leopold-William, bishop of Strasburg: the landgrave of Darmstadt was presented with the bailiwicks of Ursberg and Umstadt. The archbishop of Mentz regained possession of what the palatine held in the Bergstraß by mortgage from his bishopric; and the bishops of Worms and Spire, together with the grand master of the Teutonic order, as neighbours, were not forgotten in this general distribution.

and divides the spoils of Frederic among his favourites.

THE king of England, seeing his son-in-law stripped of his electorate, began to wake from his infatuation, and resume the negotiations which had been interrupted. The city

c of Frankendal had been last year invested by count Tilly, who was obliged to raise the siege on account of the rigorous season; but Gonçales intended to open the trenches before it in the beginning of the next campaign. James, therefore, concluded a truce for eighteen months with the king of Spain, and the archduchess's governess of Flanders, in whose hands Frankendal should be sequestered during that period, on condition, that if a reconciliation between the emperor and the palatine could not be effected before the expiration of the truce, the town should be restored in the same condition in which the Spaniards had received it.

ABOUT this time the Imperial court determined the dispute between Maurice landgrave of Hesse Cassel, and Lewis landgrave of Darmstadt, touching the succession of Lewis the Old, landgrave of Marpurg: by the decree Maurice was commanded to restore to Lewis the d whole inheritance in one and twenty days: and the vassals of the county of Marpurg were absolved of the oaths they had taken to the landgrave of Hesse Cassel. Immediately after this decision, Ferdinand being informed that the zeal with which the elector of Saxony had declared for the Protestants, was no other than a pretext to cover a grudge he had conceived against the emperor, who had not reimbursed him for the money he had expended during the war in Lusatia: Ferdinand, I say, being apprised of this motive, promised to indemnify him according to his own desire, provided he would abandon the party of the Evangelics, and unite himself to the house of Austria; and they concluded an agreement, in which it was stipulated that the elector should enjoy the revenues of Lusatia, until he should be entirely reimbursed for the expences of the war; for it was not till thirteen years after this

e agreement, that it was settled upon him intail male, by a treaty concluded at Gorlitz &c.

An accommodation is effected between the emperor and elector of Saxony.

IN the mean time the states of Lower Saxony being assembled at Lunenbourg, the Imperial commissaries repaired to that meeting, and demanded that the duke of Brunswick-Halberstadt, should either be obliged to accept of the amnesty which the emperor had offered, or quit the frontiers of that province. In compliance with this demand, the states, who dreaded that their circle should become the seat of war, ordered the duke to retire without delay, on pain of being treated as an enemy; and he accordingly decamped, in order to join Mansfeld, who was still in Friesland. Count Tilly being informed of his departure, and joined by the troops of Anbalt, began his march, in order to pursue Christian, whom he overtook between Abaus and Statlo, and defeated, after an obstinate engagement, in which

f four thousand of the Halberstadians were slain. The duke himself, and the young count de la Tour, though wounded in the battle, escaped to Besfort with the wreck of their army, which amounted to ten thousand effective men, six thousand of which were taken into the service of the states, and the rest disbanded<sup>2</sup>. Mansfeld having received the news of this overthrow, abandoned Meppen, in Westphalia, which was garrisoned by count Tilly, who having joined the Spanish army, advanced into the county of Embsen, and the states-general being alarmed at this march, ordered prince Henry of Nassau, and count Casimir to take the field. Mansfeld intrenched himself between the towns of Embsen and Meppen, where he resolved to wait for the Austrian army; but Tilly seeing him posted to great advantage, would not venture to attack his lines, and returned to Westphalia, leaving orders with the g count de Ridberg to besiege Lipstadt, which was obliged to surrender on capitulation, after Mansfeld had made several fruitless attempts to succour the besieged<sup>3</sup>.

The duke of Brunswick is again defeated by count Tilly.

Conditions of peace proposed by the emperor,
and rejected.

WHILE the partizans of each side exerted themselves in this manner, the emperor's commissaries invested with the power of treating of an accommodation, imparted to the king of England, the conditions on which Ferdinand was content to make peace with the palatine. Provided the count would comply with the submission which was proposed, the emperor promised a full and intire restitution of his dominions in the person of his eldest son, for whom Frederic should act as administrator during life: that after the death of the duke of Bavaria, the dignity of elector should be restored to the palatine house, and the young prince married to one of Ferdinand's daughters. James exhorted his son-in-law to accept of these offers; but Frederic, considering them as vague proposals, absolutely refused to submit, unless the emperor would give proper security for the performance.

concluded between the elector of Brandenburg
and duke of Neuburg.

ALL Europe was at that time attentive to the designs of the house of Austria. Spinola marched into Brabant, at the head of thirty thousand men, and the count de Berg commanded another body of ten thousand in the country of Cleves; while the states-general, being inferior in point of force, were obliged to act upon the defensive. Maurice prince of Orange observed Spinola's motions with an army of sixteen thousand men, and his brother prince Frederic-Henry covered the dutchy of Cleves with half that number. This province, together with the country of Juliers and Bergue being desolated by the war, sent deputies to the governor of Emeric, giving him to understand that they could no longer furnish provisions for the troops of the states-general; and, on the other hand, the elector of Brandenburg, and the prince of Neuburg, being moved with compassion for the miseries which these dominions suffered from foreign troops, resolved to take measures for redressing their grievances, and actually concluded a treaty on the subject of the succession; by which they agreed, that the dutchy of Cleves, with the counties of La Marck, Ravensburg, and Ravensstein, should fall to the share of the elector; and that the duke should enjoy the dutchies of Juliers and Bergue: but this transaction could not take effect without the approbation of the archdutchess governess of the Low Countries, and the confirmation of the states-general, who started so many difficulties as entirely frustrated the purpose of the whole<sup>k</sup>.

Imperialists.

By this time Hungary underwent fresh disturbances from the incursions of Bethleem Gabor, who having broke the treaty of peace which had been signed at Clausenburg, surprised several places in that kingdom, and began to commit devastations, when his progress was stopped by the Imperial general, who defeated him in an engagement, which was renewed three days successively, and compelled him to take refuge in Cassovia, where, schooled by his miscarriage, he proposed a truce, during which another treaty of peace was concluded at Vienna, importing, that Gabor should renounce all pretensions to the title of king of Hungary, deliver the seals into the hands of the emperor, and never afford the least assistance to the enemies of the Austrian house: in consideration of which concessions, Ferdinand should put him in possession of the lordships of Zatmar, Zabolar, Ugochi, Berochi, the dutchies of Ratibor and Oppelen in Silesia, with their jurisdictions, revenues, and domains, on condition that the judges and officers of these cities should take an oath to do nothing to the prejudice of his Imperial majesty and his successors<sup>l</sup>. The partizans of the elector-palatine loudly complained of this accommodation, by which Ferdinand bestowed upon the prince of Transylvania a tract of country fifty leagues in length, and five and twenty in breadth, while he stripped an elector of the empire of his dignity and dominions: but these complaints, though joined with menaces, could neither hinder the execution of the treaty, nor even retard the measures that were taken in favour of the elector of Bavaria; for the emperor, in an assembly of the states which he had convened at Stenningen, in the county of Henneberg, admitted the duke into the electoral college, with the consent of the members, notwithstanding the remonstrances that were made by the ambassadors of those princes who espoused the interests of Frederic, and the solicitations of his children, who protested against the destitution of their father<sup>m</sup>.

A. D. 1625.
Christian the fourth king of Denmark acts against the emperor.

THE king of England finding himself at length a dupe to the Spaniards, listened to the proposals of Mansfeld, who promised to make a diversion in the Spanish dominions, while the allies of Frederic might enter the Palatinate with a powerful army. He supplied the count with some money to levy troops, and solicited Christian the fourth, king of Denmark, to take arms against the emperor, in order to favour the project he had formed of re-establishing by force, the elector-palatine in his dignities and dominions. He likewise engaged in the same undertaking all the princes and states of Lower Saxony, except the duke of Luneburg; and they elected his Danish majesty captain-general of their circle, in the room of the duke of Brunswick, who had resigned. While this new general was employed in raising forces, on pretence of defending the country from the ravages committed by the soldiers and garrisons of count Tilly, the circle of Lower Saxony assembled at Brunswic, sent letters to the princes and states of Upper Saxony, in which, after having drawn a pathetic pica ture of the miseries attending the intestine troubles of the empire, they solicited their assistance, and proposed an union for their common defence, as well as for the preservation of their religion and tranquillity<sup>a</sup>.

b THIS address served as a manifesto to the ensuing war. The Wefer, which separates Lower Saxony from Westphalia, was the rendezvous of four great armies that marched thither from different parts. The king of Denmark fixed his quarters in the neighbourhood of Bremen, where he was joined by Mansfeld and the duke of Brunswick Halberstadt, who had come to him through Westphalia; while count Tilly hastened to the same place through Hesse, and the baron of Walstein, lately created duke of Fridland, took his route thro' Suabia, in order to reinforce that general, who, advancing to the banks of the Wefer, took several places depending upon the dutchy of Brunswick, which having garrisoned, he undertook the siege of Nienburg: but the king of Denmark found means to introduce colonel Limbac into the place, and that officer took such measures as disconcerted those of Tilly. The count employed all his address in bringing Christian to a battle; but that prince knowing how far he could depend upon his army, which was composed of new levies, resolved to be upon the defensive, and fortify his camp, until he should accustom his troops to service, by sending out detachments to intercept the convoys of the enemy. Mean while, he animated his soldiers by his own example; he worked in person at the intrenchments, and visited the lines twice a day, until he chanced to be thrown from his horse, and dangerously wounded in the head. Tilly, being informed of this accident, spread a report of his death, which encouraged his men to make new efforts at the siege of Nienburg; but they were soon undeceived in this particular by the recovery of his Danish majesty, who, in a little time, reappeared in the midst of his troops, and resumed his operations in order to retard their progress. Tilly finding his army in great want of provision, and foreseeing that he should not be able to continue long in his present situation, resolved to hazard one dangerous step by giving a general assault. Accordingly every circumstance was regulated for that purpose, and the attacks were carried on with great fury and perseverance; notwithstanding which, the Imperialists being repulsed with great loss, abandoned their enterprize, and retired into the county of Schawemburg, after having lost part of their rear, which was cut to pieces by the Danish horse<sup>b</sup>. Here, however, Tilly made himself master of Calemburg upon the river Glein; by which conquest he was enabled to extend himself into the bishopric of Hildesheim, and the duchy of Brunswick, which he laid under contribution.

Is joined by Mansfeld and the duke of Brunswick.

Tilly is obliged to desist from the siege of Nienburg.

c THESE two armies were not more eager in their operations of war, than the elector of Saxony in his negotiations for peace. In consequence of his interposition, conferences were held at Brunswick and at Ulm; but nothing was concluded at either of these assemblies, because they could not agree about the indemnification which the Imperialists demanded for the ravages committed by Frederic's allies; and neither side would be the first to lay down their arms. While they disputed upon these points at Brunswick, the king of Denmark repaired to an assembly which he had summoned to meet at Wessel, in Holstein, where he obtained a considerable subsidy for the maintenance of his troops; and by an ordinance prohibited all Spanish vessels, or such as belonged to the provinces subject to that crown, from entering the Sund.

d JAMES the first, king of England, being dead, and his son Charles too much involved in disputes with his own parliament to interest himself in the cause of his brother-in-law, all the hopes of this unfortunate prince now centered in the friendship of his Danish majesty, and the assistance of the states of Lower Saxony. The zeal of these last prompted them to recommence hostilities in his favour, even before the end of winter; for in the month of February, the administrator of Magdeburg, putting himself at the head of his troops, attacked Walstein, from whom he met with such a warm reception, that in less than a quarter of an hour his forces were entirely routed, and fled with such precipitation, that the victors found upon the field of battle five thousand and three hundred loaded musquets, which had never been discharged. This disgrace, however, was in some measure repaired by the duke of Brunswick-Halberstadt, who cut in pieces five hundred Imperial Croats, whom he surprised in their quarters.

e THE Austrian generals wished for nothing so much as for a general engagement, which was carefully avoided by the king of Denmark, who would not risque his best soldiers upon such a precarious issue; but divided his army into three bodies, in order to carry on the war in so many different places at the same time, and to oblige the Austrians in like manner to separate their forces. So far he succeeded; but the event did not answer his expectation<sup>c</sup>. Having marched with the bulk of his army through Brunswick, he entered the bishopric of Hildesheim, where he took and garrisoned several places: then he detached the duke of Weimar to make an attempt upon Osnabrug, which he carried by escalade, and exacted a considerable sum of the clergy : he afterwards reduced all the towns of that diocese, and might have opened to the king a road to the Palatinate through the bishopric of Munster, had not his progress been stopped by a large present from the inhabitants; in consequence of which he contented himself with the conquest he had already made, and his eldest son being elected coadjutor of Osnabrug, he returned as he came, and rejoined his Danish majesty. That monarch had set out from the banks of the Elbe, towards Wolfembutte, in order to check the progress of Tilly; but he amused himself by the way, in besieging Hottensleben, and some other places; so that Tilly had leisure to carry on his works before Gottingen, which accordingly surrendered upon capitulation.

Death of the duke of Brunswick Halberstadt.

AFTER this success he marched towards Northheim, which he intended to invest; but the place was supplied with a strong reinforcement of troops, provision, and ammunition, by the king of Denmark, who was now employed in the siege of Duderstadt; so that seeing it would be impracticable to reduce the place, he resolved to baffle the present purpose of his Danish majesty, whom he obliged to hazard a general action, in which that monarch was defeated (B), and compelled to fly into Holstein, with part of his cavalry. Perhaps this overthrow was not more fatal to the interests of Frederic, than the loss of two great officers, who died in the course of this year. On the sixth day of May, Christian duke of Brunswick-Halberstadt expired at Wolfembutte (C), leaving behind him the character of a very brave and enterprising commander; though the impetuosity of his temper very often deprived him of that reflection and forecast, which are requisite in forming plans of importance: in this particular, however, he might have been improved by age and experience. He was lavish of his fortune; but as he squandered his own without restraint, so he used that of other people without scruple.

Mansfeld marches into Hungary.

MANSFELD, with part of the army, had been defeated by Walstein at Dessau; but far from being disheartened by his misfortune, he, in his retreat towards Silesia, reassembled such a number of soldiers, that in a little time he took the field again with five and twenty thousand men; and after having surmounted a number of obstacles in his march, arrived in Hungary, with a view to join Bethleem Gabor, who had again broke with the emperor. Walstein duke of Fridland, had pursued and harrassed him all the way; and now that they were divided by the Wag, resolved to cross that river, and attack him before he should be reinforced; but this design was frustrated by the expedition of the Protestant army, and Gabor, who joined Mansfeld, with a good number of forces, while the pacha of Buda advanced with another body to favour their operations. While the two armies watched the motions of each other, they were daily diminished by the distempers produced from the autumn rains, which occasioned such a mortality, that both camps looked like burying places for the dead, and hospitals for the living. Mansfeld was extremely afflicted when he saw his army melt away in such a manner; and his chagrin was not a little augmented, when he understood that the Hungarian malcontents had accepted an amnesty from the emperor; that Gabor negotiated another treaty with the house of Austria; and that the pacha of Buda was on the eve of concluding an accommodation with the same power. Mortified by these articles of intelligence, and despairing of being able to retrieve the affairs of Frederic, he left the remains of his army with Gabor, and, accompanied by twelve officers, set out from Gran, though he was then afflicted with a slow fever. When he had crossed Servia and Bosnia, his malady increased to such a degree, that he was obliged to halt in a village near Zara in Dalmatia, where, perceiving his end approaching, he recollected his spirits, and having exhorted his followers in a pathetic harangue to spend their best blood in defending the liberty of their country, he died with the courage and sentiments of an ancient hero (D).

Nienburg is succoured by the king of Denmark.

HUNGARY being thus again reduced to obedience, the Imperialists under Tilly, returned to the siege of Nienburg; and the king of Denmark, dreading the loss of such an important

(B) Philip landgrave of Hesse, and many general officers, were slain in this action, which happened on the seventh of August 1626: a great number were taken prisoners, together with two thousand men, who had retired to the castle of Lutber; and above five thousand Danes were left dead upon the spot (1).

(C) He was first cousin to the electress-palatine by his mother, who was sister to the king of Denmark; and his consanguinity was one motive for his engaging in the cause of the count palatine (2).

(D) He was natural son of Peter Ernest de Mansfeld, governor of Luxemburg; and, being legitimated, was educated at the court of Brussels, under the eye of his godfather the archduke Ernest. In his youth he served the king of Spain in the Low Countries, and the emperor or in Hungary; but being refused a vacant government which he demanded, he quitted the court of Rodolphus, and espoused the Protestant cause. He was one of the greatest captains that Germany ever produced; intrepid, indefatigable, cool in the heat of action, prudent in deliberation, and a hero in misfortune: he could wonderfully accommodate himself to time, place, and circumstance, and find new resources when his friends were in despair. He had acquired such an empire over his passions, that being once informed of the treachery of Cazcl, his confidant, who disclosed his designs to the count de Buquoy, he gave him three hundred rix-dollars, with a recommendation to Buquoy in these terms: "Cazcl being more in your interest than in mine, I send him to you that you may profit by his service." - a portant place, exerted all his vigilance and address in supplying it with fresh succours, which infused new courage in the besieged, who defended themselves with the most obstinate valour. He not only provided for the safety of this town, but having received auxiliaries from France and Holland, formed an army of four and twenty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse. These he divided into three bodies, one of which he sent into the bishopric of Bremen, another he detached into the island of Stilborn, and the third was employed in fortifying the town of Arheim *. On the side of the Imperialists, George duke of Lunenbourg took Plaga, which was abandoned to plunder, while Tilly made preparations for prosecuting his victories, as soon as he should be joined by the troops of Rodolphus Maximilian, duke of Saxony. In order to defeat the designs of this general, the administrator of Magdeburg marched at the head of sixteen thousand men, and was followed by the bulk of the Danish army towards the bridge of Dessau, to hinder the count from passing the Elbe; but notwithstanding all his endeavours, the Austrians built a new bridge, and crossing that river took Brandenburg and several other places, while the king of Denmark intrenched himself near Wefer. Thus situated, both armies harrassed each other with frequent skirmishes, in which neither side gained any considerable advantage, until George duke of Lunenbourg, after having seized several posts in the electorate of Brandenburg, on pretence of hampering the Danes, at length entered the duchy of Holstein, in order to make a diversion in favour of count Tilly. Nor was this expedient ineffectual. The king of Denmark sent thither twelve thousand men, draughted from his army, to oppose the duke; so that Tilly was enabled to send one half of his troops to Hoja, while the other continued the siege of Northheim, under the command of the count de Furstemberg, who, at first refused to grant a capitulation; but after having lost abundance of men in three unsuccessful assaults, he, of his own accord, proposed favourable conditions, which were accepted by the garrison, which marched out with all the honours of war.

At the same time the town of Havelberg, and the fort near Ardenburg, were taken by count Tilly, whose conquests were so rapid, that the king of Denmark lost some place of importance every day; insomuch, that the duke of Holstein fearing his country would become the seat of war, proposed an accommodation to Tilly, who dictated the following articles: A. D. 1627. Conditions prescribed by Tilly to the duke of Holstein.

- d " The king of Denmark shall lay down his arms, resign his office of general of the circle of Lower Saxony, quit all pretensions to the duchy of Holstein, and the other fiefs of the empire, which he has forfeited, by rebelling against the emperor, into whose hands he shall deliver the fortresses of Gluckstadt, by way of security: he shall reimburse the emperor for the expence of the war, renounce all his claims to the principalities of Brunswick and Lunenbourg and all other pretensions he may have upon other states and cities of the empire; he shall indemnify the duchies of Brunswick and Lunenbourg and other states of Germany, for the damage they had sustained from his troops: he shall disengage himself from every confederacy against the house of Austria, open the navigation of the Sound in conformity with antient treaties, and give sufficient security for the performance of all these articles *."

- e THE king of Denmark having rejected these imperious proposals, Tilly pursued his conquests with such expedition, that the Danes, intimidated at his success, fortified themselves along the Elbe, in the neighbourhood of Wolfemburg: even there they were attacked by Tilly, and obliged to abandon their intrenchments in the night. Of these having taken possession, he threw a bridge of boats over the Elbe, and crossing into Holstein, pursued the Danish army, which was seized with such consternation, that it abandoned all its forts, and took refuge in the sea-ports of Holstein and Jutland, leaving Tilly at liberty to attack several places, of which he soon made himself master. The king of Denmark, who was pursued from place to place, and had retired for safety to Jutland, did not find himself secure even in that retreat. Thither he was followed by the Imperialists, who not only defeated a considerable body of his troops, but even compelled them to enter into the service of the emperor. Nor were the affairs of Lower Saxony in a more favourable situation. Nienburg had at last surrendered after the death of Limbac; upon which the states of the duchy of Brunswick renounced their confederacy, and had recourse to the clemency of the emperor. The elector of Brandenburg published an edict, enjoining all his subjects who were in the service of the king of Denmark, to return to their own country, on pain of confiscation and exemplary punishment; and the marquis of Baden-Dourlach had made his peace with the emperor, who nominated commissaries to terminate the difference that still subsisted between him and the marquis of Bade-Baden. The Danes fly before the Imperialists. Nienburg surrenders.

peace dictated
by the emperor
to the count-palatine.

WHILE the king of Denmark seemed thus overwhelmed by misfortune, Frederic, elector a palatine, tired of his exile, intreated the dukes of Lorrain and Wirttemberg to intercede in his behalf with the emperor; who, being accordingly solicited upon the subject, gave them to understand, that he would receive the count Palatine into favour, on these conditions only: that Frederic should ask his pardon, and renounce all pretensions to the crown of Bohemia; the duke of Bavaria should retain the electoral dignity; that the Catholic religion should be re-established through the whole Palatinate; and the count should indemnify the house of Austria for the expences of the war. On this occasion, conferences were held at Colmar by the ministers of the mediators and the envoys of the elector-palatine; who, being informed of the emperor's proposals, answered, that their master would ask pardon for what was past, and renounce the crown of Bohemia; that he and the duke of Bavaria should b alternately enjoy the electoral dignity, on condition, that after the duke's decease, it should be intirely vested in him and his heirs; that he could neither in honour or conscience make any change in the established religion of his country; but would permit the monks to remain in two or three monasteries, over which, however, he himself would reserve a jurisdiction; and as to the expence of the war, it would be impossible to defray it, the Palatinate being entirely ruined<sup>2</sup>.

The ambition of the house of
Austria.

THESE representations were so unsatisfactory to the emperor, that he renounced the negotiation, and resolved to continue the war, in which he was successful, even beyond his own expectation. His victorious arms kept all the princes of Germany in awe; and the court of Vienna no longer dissembled its design to suppress the Protestant religion, extinguish the liberties of the empire, and render the Imperial crown hereditary in the house of Austria. Walstein openly declared, that the electors would soon be reduced to the condition of Spanish grandees: he and Tilly quartered the troops indifferently upon Catholics and Protestants, allowing them to live at discretion, and levying immense contributions. Leopold of Austria, archduke of Inspruck, having resigned the bishoprics of Strasburg and Passau, together with several other benefices, in order to marry Claudia de Medicis, widow of duke Urbino, the emperor conferred them upon William, one of his own sons, who was afterwards elected bishop of Halberstadt, and obtained from the pope bulls for the abbey of Hereschfeld, which was possessed by the landgrave of Hesse; and, finally, Ferdinand, took measures for putting him in possession of the archbishoprics of Magdeburg and Bremen. These were d ecclesiastical appendages, which Ferdinand intended to establish in different parts of Germany, as provision for the younger sons of the Austrian house<sup>3</sup>.

ALL the princes equally trembled at the projects and power of this emperor, which, in order to circumscribe within proper bounds, the Protestants implored the assistance of France, and begged that the young electoral prince palatine might be received into one of the towns of that kingdom. The duke of Bavaria, though loaded with the favours of Ferdinand, dreaded the consequence of his growing greatness; and privately solicited cardinal Richelieu to engage Lewis the thirteenth, in defending the princes of the empire from oppression: and, lastly, the elector of Triers had well nigh put himself under the protection of France, in order to preserve the liberty of his states against the incroachments of the house of Austria. The cardinal was not a little embarrassed by these addresses; for the interior commotions of the kingdom, and the war with which it was threatened by England, would not permit him to grant powerful assistance to the German princes, especially as he had promised to furnish money for the king of Denmark, who was not yet disheartened by the misfortunes of his two last campaigns. He therefore contented himself with sending Marcheville into Germany, in order to dissuade the electors from chusing a king of the Romans; and to offer the mediation of France for concluding a peace, or at least a suspension of arms. As for the electoral prince palatine, he durst not receive him, lest he should give umbrage to the house of Austria, the pope, and the duke of Bavaria; though the reason he alledged for his refusal was, that the king could not admit the electoral prince into his dominions, without declaring himself his protector, and consequently traversing the proposals of peace, until he should be re-established in all his rights. All that Marcheville could obtain from the states of the empire was to delay the election of a king of the Romans; and as the emperor could not prevail upon them to raise his son Ernest (already king of Hungary) to that dignified station, he consoled himself for the disappointment by placing the crown of Bohemia upon his head. Not that there was any previous election by the states of that kingdom, which the house of Austria now considered as an indefeasible inheritance: the emperor, by his own authority, commanded them to proceed to the coronation of his son, by which means he strengthened his interest with another voice to be used at the election of a king of the Romans<sup>b</sup>.

of Bohemia.

MEAN while, the king of Denmark took the duke of Mecklenburg under his protection; g and demanded succours from the inhabitants of Bremen, and other hans-towns, who excused themselves from granting his request; and, being intimidated by the emperor's generals, expelled the consuls and agents of England and Holland, and furnished the Imperial troops

2 with provisions, ships, and ammunition : so that, while they proceeded in subduing Germany, the diet was opened at Mulhausen, whither the electors of Mentz and Saxony repaired in person, and the other princes sent their ministers.

In this assembly Marcheville, the French envoy, exhorted the members to restore peace A. D. 1628. and tranquility to the empire ; and the baron de Stralendorf made some specious proposals in the name of the emperor, who nevertheless plainly shewed his intention was to give law to all Germany ; and to shut the mouths of those who still talked of the liberty of their ancestors. By this suggestion the clergy demanded the restitution of the bishoprics and benefices which the Protestants had seized since the treaty of Passau. Ferdinand's aim in this requisition was to obtain a decree of the diet, in consequence of which he should be enabled to put the archduke William, his second son, in possession of other rich and powerful benefices : but this demand was warmly opposed by the two Protestant electors ; so that the execution of his project was deferred till a more favourable opportunity. Then the affair of the elector-palatine being brought upon the carpet, all the Catholic princes were of opinion, that Frederic, as author of the war, should humble himself before the emperor, and renounce the crown of Bohemia, together with the electoral dignity ; in consequence of which concessions, his imperial majesty would pardon and re-establish him in all or part of his dominions, according to his good pleasure : but, should the Palatine refuse to submit to these conditions, they unanimously declared they would join their forces with those of the emperor against him and all his adherents <sup>a</sup>.

d During these deliberations, the Danish senators assembled at Copenhagen, wrote a letter to the emperor, exhorting him to put an end to the war ; though, considering the situation of affairs, they could not expect great success from this remonstrance : and Christian, persuaded that no regard would be paid to it by the imperial court, employed himself in making all the necessary preparations for continuing the war <sup>e</sup>. Having received a considerable supply from his allies, he equipped a strong fleet ; and, setting sail in the beginning of the spring, made a descent upon the isle of Femeren, where he took the fort which had been built by the Imperialists. His next conquest was Eckelenfordt, which he abandoned to plunder, after having made the garrison prisoners of war, and exchanged them for a like number of Danes : this place, however, was in a little time retaken by the Imperialists, who cut in pieces, or put to flight, all who pretended to oppose them. Christian, with a fleet of forty-seven ships of war appeared before Kiel, the siege of which he undertook by sea and land : but meeting with a very obstinate resistance, and being unsuccessful in all his assaults, he quitted that enterprize, in order to relieve Sarden, which was hard pressed by count Tilly, who had taken such precautions, that he could not throw succours into the place, so that he retired to Gluckstadt : while colonel Morgan, who commanded the English garrison at Staden, being reduced to extremity, resolved to capitulate : and accordingly marched out, with his arms and baggage, at the head of sixty four companies, with whom he retired towards Bremen <sup>f</sup>. After the reduction of Staden, the imperial army invested Gluckstadt and Krempen, which were defended with extraordinary valour by the Danish garrisons, who made frequent sallies, and obliged the enemy to abandon their posts. Three of their ships surprised the town of Gripswald, and set fire to the Austrian houses. Two regiments of their cavalry entered Barmstaden, from whence they returned loaded with booty, after having killed and taken prisoners the imperial garrison : and they afterwards took Pirmenberg, where they found a body of Croats, whom they cut in pieces.

f ABOUT this time a general assembly of the hans-towns was held at Lubeck, in order to deliberate upon the proposals of the emperor and the king of Spain, touching a new company to be formed for carrying on the trade of the North ; and the result of their deliberations was, that, although they were always disposed to obey his imperial majesty, they could not grant what he demanded, concerning the navigation, without exposing themselves to the enmity of Sweden and Denmark, which would never allow the ships of that new company to pass the Sound. They therefore begged he would permit them to observe a neutrality ; but, foreseeing he would be incensed at their refusal, they resolved to levy troops, and prepare for their own defence <sup>g</sup>.

THE Imperialists and Danes, finding themselves exhausted by a long war, began at length to entertain serious thoughts of peace ; and the four Catholic electors having offered their mediation, the emperor consented to open a congress at Lubeck, whither the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg sent their deputies, after having prevailed upon the king of Denmark to appoint plenipotentiaries to treat of an accommodation. The articles proposed by these last were, that the principalities of the towns and other fiefs of his Danish majesty, occupied by the Imperialists, should be restored, together with all that had been forcibly taken from his subjects, and the prisoners on both sides discharged without ransom: that all the princes and states of Lower Saxony should peaceably enjoy the liberty of religion, and a general amnesty comprehend all those who had any share in the war: and lastly, that the sons of his Danish majesty should not be disturbed in the enjoyment of those postulations and elections, which had been made in their favour, within the empire<sup>a</sup>. These proposals were communicated to the emperor by the conveyance of Walstein, who was at Gustrow; and, in the mean time, the imperial commissaries made the following propositions to the assembly: "The king of Denmark shall not, for the future, intermeddle in the affairs of the empire: he shall renounce the duchies of Holstein, Sleswick, and Dytmarsie: together with all the pretensions which he and his sons might have upon the archbishoprics, bishoprics, duchies, and principalities in the circles of Lower Saxony and Westphalia: he shall make a cession of Jutland to the elector of Saxony, until such time as that prince shall be reimbursed for the expences due to him from his imperial majesty, or until he shall receive some other sort of indemnification from the king of Denmark: he shall likewise defray all the charges of the war, to which the emperor and his allies have been exposed; repair all the damage he has done to the territories of the dukes of Lunenbourg, Pomerania, and Holstein; and exclude all the enemies of the empire and house of Austria from the passage of the Sound, which shall be free to the friends and allies of these powers, on payment of a fixed toll, which shall not be in his power to augment: finally, the crowns of Spain and Poland, the archduchess-governess of the Low Countries, the elector of Bavaria, and other princes of the empire, shall be included in this treaty."

Danish ministers, and mitigated by means of Wal-
stein,

THESE conditions appeared so unreasonable to the Danish ministers, that they threatened to retire without coming to any conclusion, unless they should be moderated; and the emperor's commissaries being confounded at this menace, repaired to Gustrow in order to confer with Walstein. That general, upon whom the emperor had bestowed the revenues of Mecklenburg, the duke of which he had put to the ban of the empire, being desirous of acquiring the friendship of his Danish majesty, by which he thought he could the better secure himself in his new possession, facilitated the conclusion of the peace, by procuring more favourable conditions to the king, which, after a series of conferences, were accepted, and the treaty was at length concluded on these terms: "The king of Denmark shall not intermeddle in the affairs of the empire, except in those that relate to the duchy of Holstein; and the princes his sons shall absolutely renounce the possession of the archbishoprics and bishoprics of the empire: neither the emperor nor king shall make any demand on account of the expences of the war: the provinces and towns taken from the king of Denmark shall be restored to him, together with the artillery: the prisoners on both sides shall be released without ransom; and his Danish majesty shall cede to the houses of Sleswick and Holstein-Gottorp, the isle of Femeren, and part of the isles of Wardt and Suld, devolved to them by hereditary right, reserving still the right of superiority which the crown of Denmark enjoyed over these provinces."

prejudicial to
Mecklenburg and the elector-palatine.

THIS treaty was published on the seventh of June, to the inexpressible joy of the people, who had been so long and so severely harrassed by the war, but to the infinite mortification of the dukes of Mecklenburg, who now saw Walstein in quiet possession of their dominions. The duke of Bavaria was acknowledged elector of the holy empire, by the congress of Lubeck, as well as in this pacification; but no mention was made of the elector-palatine, who was supposed to be lawfully proscribed, and divested of his dignity and dominions. Although the emperor, by dint of repeated victories and conquests, compelled the king of Denmark, and other princes his allies, to accept of this peace, he committed a fatal oversight in refusing to admit the ambassadors of Sweden to the congress of Lubeck, at which the differences that began to arise between Ferdinand and Gustavus might have been extinguished in their infancy: but at that time the strength of the king of Sweden seemed too inconsiderable to alarm the court of Vienna, which little thought it would one day be sufficient to shake the throne of Ferdinand, and humble the pride of the house of Austria.

A new difficulty arises between Fer- dinand and
Christian.

THE conclusion of the treaty did not terminate the mutual resentment that glowed in the breasts of the emperor and king of Denmark. This last could not forgive the other for refusing to revoke the ban which was published against the dukes of Mecklenburg; and Ferdinand was offended at the conduct of Christian, in persisting to disturb the duke of Holstein, who had incurred the indignation of that king, by embracing the party of the emperor in the last war: for, instead of withdrawing his troops from Holstein at the peace, Christian sent a greater number in order to continue the ravages in that province. In consequence of these hostilities, the emperor sent monitorial letters to the king of Denmark, commanding him to evacuate that part of Holstein and Sleswick which belonged to duke Fre-

a deric; and Christian relying upon the hope of a strong reinforcement from the king of Sweden, who had promised to assist him with troops and money, at first refused to obey this injunction, affirming, that Sleswick was not a fief of the empire, but intirely depended upon Denmark<sup>k</sup>: but to this asseveration the court of Vienna replied, that Denmark itself was a fief of the empire, and that Sleswick, as part of Denmark, must necessarily be in the same predicament (D). Nevertheless, finding Christian deaf to these remonstrances, Ferdinand issued other letters, conceived in such strong terms as roused his apprehension, and induced him to withdraw his troops from that duchy, and leave the duke in quiet; so that Germany, in general, began to enjoy a little respite from war and disorder.

Not but that the house of Austria was still occupied by the commotions of Italy, occasioned b by the pretenders to the succession of Vincent the second, duke of Mantua and Montferrat, who was lately dead without lawful issue<sup>1</sup>. He had foreseen the troubles that might arise after his death; and in order to prevent them as much as lay in his power, given his niece, the princess Mary, in marriage to the duke de Retheleis, son of Charles de Gonzaga, duke de Nevers, whom he declared sole heir of all his fortune: but Cesar de Gonzaga, duke of Guaftalla, had already received from the emperor the eventual investiture of Mantua and Montferrat. On the other hand, the duke of Savoy looking upon this as a proper occasion for availing himself of some pretensions he had to a part of Montferrat joined the duke of Guaftalla against his competitor, and prevailed upon Ferdinand to refuse the investiture to the duke de Nevers<sup>m</sup>. Nevertheless he would not declare openly against him, because he was respected by the pope c and the Venetians, who were unwilling to give umbrage to France, which patronized him; but, like an able politician, he ordered the revenues of the duchies to be put in sequestration, until the rights of the competitors should be examined and discussed; and John count of Nassau was charged with the execution of this decree. But before he arrived at Mantua, the king of Spain and the duke of Savoy had taken the field, in order to share the Montferrat between them; and the duke of Mantua, with the few troops he could assemble, exerted himself like a brave officer in opposing their progress<sup>n</sup>. At length the count de Nassau arrived in Italy as imperial commissary, and the duke, seeing himself threatened from so many quarters, demanded assistance from the Venetians, who amused him with distant hopes until he was reduced to extremity: for Nassau pressed him to admit Austrian garrisons into his d capital and other towns, and he was fain to appeal from the proceedings of this commissary to the emperor better informed, or in case he should refuse to hear his remonstrances, to the electors of the empire. Mean while, he sent the prince his son to Vienna, to demand the investiture of the emperor, and offered to put Cazal and all the Montferrat into the hands of a neutral prince, until the differences about that principality should be terminated: but Ferdinand openly declared his intention was, that the German troops in the Spanish service should garrison Cazal in the name of the emperor; that the towns already taken by the governor of Milan should remain as a pledge for the pretensions of the prince of Guaftalla; and that the duke of Savoy should keep what he had seized, until his demands should be regulated by a treaty or decisive determination. It was not doubted, that the courts of e Vienna and Spain were resolved to share Cazal and the Montferrat between them; and accordingly Ferdinand sent troops into the Milanesse, who extended their quarters along the rivers Adda and Oglio, so as to alarm the republic of Venice, which immediately reinforced its troops by new levies, sent four thousand men to the assistance of the duke of Mantua, and supplied him with money to make preparations for a vigorous defence. The imperial generals seeing their soldiers desert in great numbers, and being apprehensive, that before the end of the approaching winter, their army would be too much diminished to undertake any thing of importance, resolved to besiege Mantua without delay, and, in the mean time, obtained an edict of the emperor, in which all those noblemen, who held fiefs of the empire, were forbid to assist the duke of Mantua, on pain of being declared rebels. This edict was followed by an invasion of the duchy of Mantua, in which several important places were carried by assault, and many ravages committed: at length the Germans marched towards the city of Mantua, into which Charles had retired with his best troops, in order to defend it to the last extremity; and there the progress of the Imperialists had well nigh been effectually stopped; for they were fatigued with continual rains, and reduced to such extremity by want of provisions and disease, that they were obliged to quit the siege, and must have returned to their own country, had not the court of Rome permitted them to draw

For that year the city of Mantua was saved by the vigilance and activity of the Venetians, who loudly complained of pope Urban the eighth, reproaching him with having done his endeavour to sell the liberty of Italy, for the paltry consideration of the money he got from the Imperialists for his corn. Next year, however, the Venetians were defeated near Villabona by the Germans, who, at length, made themselves masters of Mantua, which was abandoned to the avarice and insolence of their soldiers. The pillage lasted three days, during which the Austrians committed all manner of violence and brutality, while the duke retired into the ecclesiastical state, deprived of every other hope but that of seeing his affairs established by some favourable treaty.

In the midst of these transactions died the duke of Savoy; and his death was followed by that of the marquis de Spinola, to whom Mazarini had been sent from the pope to effect an accommodation between the Spaniards, who besieged Casal, and the French, by whom it had been for a long time defended. Accordingly these last consented to surrender the town and castle to the besiegers; who, on their side, obliged themselves to furnish the French with provisions, and even to evacuate the town again, in case the citadel should be relieved at a certain time.

publishes an edict for the restitution of ecclesiastical
benefices.

DURING the progress of this war in Italy, the emperor published an edict at Vienna, commanding the Protestants to restore, without loss of time, the ecclesiastical benefices in their possession; particularly the archbishoprics, bishoprics, prelacies, hospitals, and all the other effects of the church, occupied by them since the treaty of Passau. The execution of this new edict was opposed by the elector of Saxony, and other princes of the Augsburg confession, who affirmed, that the emperor had no power to ordain such a restitution, which ought to be the object of determination in a general diet. But Ferdinand, without paying any regard to their remonstrances, nominated commissaries for the execution of his edict; and ordered his own troops, together with those of the Catholic league, to take the field, and to subdue all those who should fail in their obedience. Although this ordinance occasioned great commotion and clamour among the Protestants, several cities submitted quietly; the duke of Wurtemberg, and some other princes, restored their former acquisitions; the bishops retook possession of their old dioceses, and the monks returned to the monasteries from which they had been formerly expelled. The sentence or decisions of the imperial commissaries were executed by Walstein, at the head of an army, who acted with such rigour, and allowed his troops to behave with such licence, that the Protestants were inflamed to a degree of rancour and virulence; and even the Catholics so incensed against him, as to join in demanding justice of the emperor.

The Protestants enter into a secret alliance with Gustavus

THOSE of the confession of Augsburg, with the elector of Saxony at their head, assembled at Heidelberg, from whence they sent a deputation, soliciting the emperor to revoke his edict of restitution, and complaining of the outrages which had been committed by his troops that were under the command of Walstein; and at the same time they engaged in an association for their mutual defence. The elector of Saxony, who had amassed great sums of money, and possessed a number of strong places, with garrisons sufficient for their defence, proposed to the Protestant states an alliance with Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, the professed enemy of the Austrian house; and accordingly this league was solicited and concluded with such industry, secrecy, and caution, that Ferdinand had not the least suspicion of their design until the war was ready to break out.

It was during these secret negotiations that the emperor convoked a diet at Ratisbon, where he was met by the three ecclesiastical electors and the duke of Bavaria; but the duke of Saxony and the marquis of Brandenburg excused themselves, on pretence of being so much impoverished by the imperial troops quartered in their towns, that they could not defray the expence of their journey. This, however, was no more than a pretext for avoiding a refusal to the emperor in person, provided he should propose his eldest son to be elected king of the Romans (E).

(E) The emperor was accompanied to Ratisbon by the empress, the king of Hungary, and the archduchess; and attended by the prince of Anhalt, count Tilly, and Walstein duke of Fridland, who surpassed Ferdinand himself in magnificence, for his train consisted of six hundred horsemen richly clothed; a circumstance which, together with his immense riches and the insolence of his manners, attracted the jealousy and hatred of almost all the other princes (1).

(1) Barre, t. ix. p. 590.

- a THE propositions made at the opening of the diet were, that the electors should deliberate upon some means for establishing the peace of the empire upon a solid foundation ; or, if this could not be effected, for continuing the war to advantage : that they should consider whether or not Frederic, count-palatine, who still obstinately refused to implore his imperial majesty's clemency, and renounce his pretensions to the electorate, should be excluded from all hope of favour ; and what measures were to be taken, in case the states-general of the United Provinces, or other powers, should persist in their endeavours to re-establish him in the Palatinate : that the king of Denmark having offered to terminate, in a friendly manner, the difference between the emperor and the king of Sweden, touching the affair of Stralsund, plenipotentiaries had been sent to Dantzick for that purpose ; but, in case the treaty should not succeed, proper measures ought to be taken for defeating the designs of Gustavus Adolphus : that the emperor's sole intention, in his conduct concerning the succession of Mantua, was to maintain the authority of the empire in Italy ; but, as the king of France persisted in his resolution to support the duke de Nevers in his disobedience, they would find it necessary to empower his imperial majesty to preserve the rights of the empire, which the French king seemed bent upon invading ; and, lastly, that the emperor being touched with the misfortunes of several provinces, they, the electors, should establish proper regulations for the quarters and passage of soldiers, in case the war should be continued ; and endeavour to re-establish a good correspondence among the members of the empire, which was so necessary to the preservation and prosperity of the Germanic body <sup>1</sup>.

- FERDINAND* found more opposition in this diet than he had expected to encounter. The Protestants and Catholics seemed to have conspired together for the diminution of his power. The ministers of Saxony pressed him to repeal the edict, restore the city of Augsburg to the fruition of its antient liberty, and compel his officers to refund the contributions they had levied in almost all the provinces of the empire. The elector of Bavaria, in consequence of his secret connexions with France, and with the consent of the ecclesiastic electors, declared, that their deliberations could not be free, while the emperor had an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men at his devotion in Germany : and the greatest part of the Catholic princes exhorted the emperor to divert the Protestants from an union with the king of Sweden, by granting to them, for a term of forty years, the enjoyment of the ecclesiastical benefices which they had possessed since the treaty of Passau. This advice, however, was vigorously opposed by the ecclesiastic electors, who used such arguments as were more agreeable to the ideas of Ferdinand ; tho' he endeavoured to soften his refusal by promising to the deputies of Saxony and Brandenburg, that nothing should be determined touching the restitution in this diet ; but that affair be entirely referred to another meeting at Frankfort, which he would convoke for the ensuing year. He temporized in this manner with a view to engage the votes of those two electors in favour of his eldest son ; and founded the dispositions of others on the same subject ; when he was given to understand, that, as a previous step towards the accomplishment of his design, it would be necessary to disband the greatest part of his troops, and take the command of his army from Walstein, who was universally hated in the empire. Ferdinand yielded, though unwillingly, to these remonstrances, dismissed the duke of Fridland from his service, and of all his army retained but forty thousand veteran troops <sup>2</sup>.

- MAXIMILIAN*, duke of Bavaria, by whose means chiefly Walstein was removed from the councils of the emperor, now solicited the command of the army ; and his behaviour on this occasion rendered him suspected to Ferdinand, or rather served to confirm his suspicions ; for he had already discovered that the duke was engaged in private intrigues against the interest of the house of Austria, and actually aspired at the title of king of the Romans, in order to succeed to the imperial throne : he, therefore, saw the danger of putting him at the head of the troops ; but as he found it convenient to keep measures with Maximilian, whose pretensions were supported by the electors of Saxony, Mentz, and Cologne, he would not refuse his demand, but stipulated certain conditions with which he would not comply ; and afterwards bestowed the command of his army upon the count de Tilly, with the consent of the duke, to whose house that officer had been a faithful servant. Nevertheless, Maximilian relented the refusal in such a manner, as to disconcert all the measures that were taken for securing the succession to the son of Ferdinand, who reaped no other benefit from the diet of Ratisbon but the coronation of his empress, Eleonora de Gonzaga <sup>3</sup>.

- CHARLES I.* king of Great Britain, had sent thither an ambassador, to treat of the re-establishment of the elector-palatine in his dominions ; and to hint, that, in case his remonstrances should be fruitless, he would assist his brother-in-law in a more effectual manner: but all he could obtain was abundance of personal respect, and an evasive promise, importing, that the palatine should be restored, and reconciled to the emperor, on certain conditions, to which he knew the elector would never submit <sup>y</sup>.

LEON BRULART, ambassador from France, had likewise a public audience at Ratisbon. He was ordered to explain to the electoral college, the reasons which had induced France to protect the duke of Mantua; and to propose a negotiation for terminating that affair. Ministers were accordingly appointed by the emperor for this purpose; and after much altercation and delay, a treaty was concluded on these terms: "The emperor and king of France shall give no assistance to the enemies of each other: the duke of Savoy shall possess in the Montferrat the town of Trino, and other lands, to the value of fifteen thousand crowns of yearly rent: the duke of Gustalla shall have six thousand crowns of landed rent, with all the rights of jurisdiction and superiority: the duke of Mantua shall be obliged to make a submission to his imperial majesty, according to a certain concerted form, in consideration of which Ferdinand shall bestow upon him the investiture of Mantua and Montferrat. These conditions being fulfilled, the French shall abandon Savoy, and the Imperialists and Spaniards shall evacuate the Mantuan, Montferrat, the country of the Grisons, the Valtelline, and restore to the Venetians what they had taken from that republic <sup>z</sup>."

Nor one of the powers concerned approved of these articles: the French generals, who commanded in Italy, were forbid to execute the treaty; and Leon Brulart was ordered to declare, in plain terms, to his imperial majesty, that the king of France would not ratify it, unless he should be at liberty to alter some of the articles, especially that which restricted him from assisting his allies, among whom the king of Sweden was the principal.

Substance of the manifesto published against the emperor by Gustavus Adolphus,

DURING the diet at Ratisbon, the emperor had received from Gustavus Adolphus a manifesto, explaining his reasons for declaring war against the house of Austria. He complained, that while he was at war with the Poles, Ferdinand had intercepted his letters to Bethleem Gabor, prince of Transylvania, and treated his courier as a criminal: that he had assisted the king of Poland, fomented the war against Sweden, stripped the dukes of Mecklenburg, the kinsmen of Gustavus, of their principality; seized upon several places of Lower-Saxony and Pomerania, and fitted out ships to make himself master of the Baltic, which had always belonged to the crown of Sweden; that he had taken and confiscated several Swedish vessels, besieged Stralsund, one of the hanse-towns, and affronted the Swedish ambassadors at Lubeck, when he was upon terms of peace with the king of Denmark; that he had declared Gustavus an enemy of the empire, and approved of injurious writings, tending to depreciate the Swedish government; and that when complaints were made of this outrage to the electors, no satisfaction was given, and the Catholic princes, in their answer, had even neglected to bestow upon him the title of king; and lastly, that when his Danish majesty employed his good offices to accommodate these differences, the emperor's deputies would not listen to any of the proposals that were made, but talked in the stile of sovereigns, being blinded by their master's prosperity <sup>a</sup>.

who secures the assistance of France and England,

SUCH were the motives that induced the king of Sweden to undertake a war against the house of Austria, which, by this time, had rendered itself formidable to all the Christian princes of Europe: nevertheless, he would not engage in such an important enterprize, until he had secured the alliance of England and France, which last power promised to defray one-third of the expence of the war; made peace with Poland, and obtained a declaration of neutrality from the king of Denmark, who could not, however, conceal his jealousy of the Swede, or see, without mortification, a garrison belonging to that prince, in possession of Stralsund. Indeed, his chagrin was not altogether without reason; for the king of Sweden having embarked in June, with an army of fifteen thousand men, in a few days arrived in the isle of Rugen, which colonel Lesley had already subjected to his power: then taking the isle of Usedom he returned to the continent, and made himself master of Camin, situated on the other side of the mouth of the Oder. These important posts facilitated the communication between Germany and Sweden; but as he still wanted a proper place, where he could form magazines of provision and ammunition, he fixed his eyes upon Stetin, a considerable town upon the Oder; and appeared unexpectedly before the place, notwithstanding the measures which were taken for preventing this enterprize, by count Torquato, who commanded the Imperial troops in Pomerania <sup>b</sup>.

makes himself master of the island of Rugen, and concludes an alliance with Bogislaus, duke of Pomerania.

BOGISLAUS, duke of Pomerania, alarmed at this progress, waited upon the king of Sweden, and excused himself from admitting that prince into his capital, on pretence of remaining neuter in the war; but Gustavus endeavoured to convince him that such neutrality was unreasonable, and finding him obstinate, declared in plain terms, that he would enter a Stetin at the head of his army, if he should pretend to oppose the march of his troops. This declaration, together with a reinforcement of five thousand men, which Gustavus received at that time, operated so powerfully upon the duke, that he allowed his German garrison in Stetin to take the oath of fidelity to the king of Sweden, with whom he afterwards engaged in a treaty of alliance; in which it was stipulated, that the sovereignty of Pomerania should be preserved to the duke, to whom also should be restored all the places of this province, which the king already possessed, or might occupy in the sequel (F)<sup>c</sup>. To this agreement the states of Pomerania assented the more willingly, as they hoped to be delivered from the oppression of the Imperialists, and maintained in the free exercise of their religion.

b THE emperor being deceived by the flattery of his courtiers, and the insinuations of others who were his secret enemies, took no effectual steps to hinder Gustavus from establishing and fortifying himself in Pomerania. Sturgart, Amelande, Ukermunde, and Wolgast, received Swedish garrisons, and the army of that prince was reinforced by six British regiments, commanded by the marquis of Hamilton. Ferdinand's eyes, however, being at length opened, he sent an expostulatory letter to the king of Sweden, complaining of his irruption into the territories of the empire, and his intermeddling in the affairs of the Germanic body, with which he had no concern; and threatening to send his whole forces against him, if he would not immediately return to his own dominions. Gustavus, in answer to this letter, told the gentleman who brought it, that he would seriously consider the contents: then assuming an air of raillery, "I shall not fail to send a proper answer, (said he) c "as soon as I am cured of a wound which I received in the arm from an eagle;" alluding to the injury which Ferdinand had done him, in assisting Sigismund, king of Poland, with a considerable body of troops to drive the Swedes from Prussia (G)<sup>d</sup>.

He receives an expostulatory letter from the emperor.

NOTWITHSTANDING the repeated assurances of assistance which Gustavus had received from France, the conclusion of his treaty with Lewis the thirteenth had been retarded by some demands of Charnace, the French minister, with which the king of Sweden did not think proper to comply: at length, however, it was agreed, that this last should receive from France a yearly pension of twelve hundred thousand livres, during the continuation of the league; and Gustavus, on his part, obliged himself to grant a neutrality to the duke of Bavaria, and all the princes of the Catholic league, on condition they should not join the emperor against the Swedes, and to leave the Roman religion as he should find it, without infringing the exercise of it in any town or province of Germany. To these proposals he gladly subscribed, because the interest of the Catholic princes being thus secured, they would have the fairer pretence for refusing to engage with the emperor in an alliance against Sweden. He likewise obliged himself to maintain, at his own expence, an army of thirty thousand infantry and six thousand horse and the league, to be continued for the space of five years, was signed on the twentieth and third day of January, at Berwald in Brandenburg<sup>e</sup>.

and engages in a league with the king of France.

THIS important affair being settled, Gustavus endeavoured to renew some negotiations with the Protestant princes of the empire, which had been suspended; but finding it a difficult task to succeed with individuals, he sent secret agents to Leipsick, where they were assembled in a body with the deputies of the towns, in order to engage them in his interests. Here too he was disappointed: the assembly did not think proper as yet to take any public resolution in consequence of his proposals; for each prince was afraid of being oppressed by the emperor, before he could have any chance of being supported by the Swedes, or the troops of the Protestant union<sup>f</sup> (H).

(F) George-William elector of Brandenburg, was presumptive heir to Bogislaus, who had no male issue: but if the duke should die before the elector had entered into this new alliance with the king of Sweden, Pomerania was to remain in sequestration in the hands of Gustavus, until he should be reimbursed in the expences of the war, which he undertook for the deliverance of that province: nay, he reserved to himself the right of keeping it in trust, in case the property of it should be contested with the elector after the death of Bogislaus (1).

(G) About this time Ferdinand, king of Hungary, the emperor's son, was contracted to the infanta Mary-Anne of Austria, sister of Philip the fourth, king of Spain. She embarked at Barcelona, and, the plague being at Genoa, landed at Naples, from whence the Spaniards sent to demand from the Venetians a passage for her through the Adriatic gulph: but this request was refused by the republic, which, however, offered to conduct the infanta to Trieste on board of their own galleys. This proposal was accepted, she arrived in safety at Vienna, and married prince Ferdinand on the twenty-first day of January, 1631 (2).

(H) This assembly was composed of the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, with the princes of these two electoral houses, one palatine, the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and the marquis of Baden, the ministers of the dukes of Brunswick, Lunenbourg, and Wurtemberg, the most considerable among the Protestant counts and barons of the empire, and deputies from the towns of Frankfort, Bremen, Strasburg, Lubeck, and many others (3).

or, touching his edict of restitution, though their real design was to contrive means for a moderating the authority of Ferdinand, in the general diet which he had summoned to meet at Frankfort. Accordingly their deliberations turned upon the maintenance of the laws and constitutions of the empire, the liberty of the Germanic body, the preservation of harmony between the Protestants and Roman Catholics, the relief of the people, who were overwhelmed with taxes, and finally, the assurance of a solid and lasting peace to the empire. After having duly considered the grievances under which they laboured, it was unanimously resolved to levy an army of forty thousand men, to form a kind of stable and permanent council; and a declaration was sent to the emperor, and Catholic league, importing, that notwithstanding their resolution to raise troops, they should be always perfectly well disposed to preserve the peace. Ferdinand, filled with indignation at these presumptuous steps, published a long manifesto, complaining of the Protestants, whom he accused of holding private intelligence with the king of Sweden. Nor was this conjecture void of foundation; inasmuch as they had not, in their remonstrance, mentioned the irruption of Gustavus into Lower Saxony, or promised the least assistance to the emperor in defeating the purposes of that invasion<sup>s</sup>; and, indeed, he had little reason to expect such a voluntary offer, from those whom he had been so long accustomed to mortify and oppress. Alarmed, however, at their proceedings, he condemned them as being contrary to the constitutions of the empire, and forbade the Catholic states to aid them in any shape, on pain of seeing their fiefs confiscated.

The progress of Gustavus
Adolphus.

MEAN while, Gustavus being well assured of the favourable dispositions of the Protestant princes, and strengthened by the succours he had received from England, France, and Holland, continued the war with surprising success. The severity of winter could not put a stop to his conquests: he made himself master of Colberg, Frankfort upon the Oder, and Dammin, which was so ill defended, and so shamefully given up by Savelli, that the conqueror could not help saying to him, in the most bitter strain of raillery, "Sir, I would advise you to serve the emperor henceforth in the cabinet rather than in the field<sup>b</sup>." Count Tilly advanced from the neighbourhood of Magdeburg, in order to oppose this formidable invader, and even retook Frankfort, and some other places; but finding himself unequal to the strength and vigilance of Gustavus, he was fain to return to Magdeburg, which he besieged in form; while the king of Sweden, being refused a passage for his troops by John-George, elector of Saxony, could not march to the relief of that place, and therefore returned to besiege Frankfort, which he took by assault, and abandoned to pillage.

Accommoda-

and France, on the sub-

tua.

THE affair of Mantua being still undetermined, and the Imperialists and French in possession of that dutchy and its dependencies, the pope sent the nuncio Pancirole and Mazarini to those two powers, in order to negotiate an accommodation, which should restore peace to Italy. These ministers acquitted themselves with such address, that the emperor and French king agreed to send plenipotentiaries to Quicrasque in Piedmont: Ferdinand, having occasion to withdraw his troops from Italy, for the service of the war against the king of Sweden, far from being difficult in his conditions, offered to confer the investiture upon the duke of Mantua, to restore his capital, and put the Grisons again in possession of the passage of the Valtelline. France, on the other hand, consented to redeliver to the duke of Savoy, Chamberry, Pignecrol, and all the other places she had wrested from him: and notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Spaniards, who opposed this accommodation, the treaty was signed by Galas, the emperor's plenipotentiary, and Thoiras, assisted by Servien, secretary of state and minister of France.

Gustavus
makes himself master of Potsdam, &c.

IN consequence of this treaty, the Austrian troops in Italy were ordered to return to the empire, under the command of Egon de Furstemberg, who compelled the Protestants of Suabia and Franconia to renounce the confederation of Leipsic, to disband their troops, and pay large contributions to the emperor. But, before these transactions, Gustavus seeing he could not march to the relief of Magdeburg, without giving umbrage to the elector of Saxony, whom he did not chuse to disoblige, he undertook the siege of Potsdam, which he carried, together with some other places which the Imperialists occupied upon the Elbe.

Magdeburg

MEAN while, count Tilly prosecuted the siege of Magdeburg with equal vigour and perseverance, and at length took it by assault; upon which occasion unheard of cruelties were perpetrated by the Imperialists, who reduced the whole city to ashes, except the cathedral, and about one hundred and fifty fishing-huts upon the bank of the Elbe. Here was Christian of Brandenburg taken prisoner; and when the dukes of Saxe-Lawemburg and Holstein reproached him with his rashness, in having defended the city against the emperor, he affirmed, that his enterprize was just, and that heaven would punish the Austrians for the innocent blood they had shed. Indeed, the carnage was almost unexampled; for above thirty thousand of the inhabitants perished by water, fire, and sword<sup>c</sup>.

- a THE fate of this unfortunate city having rendered the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg more timid and circumspect, Gustavus was tired of their irresolute conduct, and summoned the last to declare himself openly in three days; the elector's answer being ambiguous, he marched directly to Berlin, and by a trumpet demanded that the gates should be opened, otherwise he would enter the city by force. This menace had the desired effect upon George-William, who consented to the king's retaining Spandow while the war should continue, and allowed his army to pass through Custrin. The agreement had not been long concluded when the landgrave of Hesse, whose country had been threatened with destruction by count Tilly upon his refusing to declare against the Swedes, taking the advantage of the absence of that general, who was gone to oppose Gustavus; profiting, I say, by that opportunity, the landgrave put himself under the protection of his Swedish majesty, who promised to defend him, and procure restitution of the fiefs belonging to him, which the emperor had seized during the troubles of Bohemia. The landgrave, on his side, promised to enter heartily into the interests of Gustavus, and to engage in no treaty without his consent: but to admit the king's troops into his cities, without prejudice however to his right of sovereignty, and on condition that the places should be restored when the motives for retaining them should cease. It was likewise agreed, that the landgrave's troops should join the army of Sweden; that the king should have the chief command, which, in his absence, should be equally shared between William and one of his officers, to be named for that purpose; and, finally, that the Hessians should furnish a certain quantity of provisions to the Swedish troops; and that the king and the landgrave should have no after-demands upon each other for the succours which they should mutually give or take. This was the ordinary form of the treaties in which the king of Sweden engaged with the princes of the empire<sup>k</sup>.

engages in a treaty with the landgrave of Hesse.

- GUSTAVUS had by this time passed the Elbe; and Tilly, having in vain used all his efforts to oblige him to repass that river, resolved to detach the elector of Saxony from the league of Leipsick by dint of threats; and John-George, disturbed as well as incensed at his menaces, dispatched Arnheim his general to the king of Sweden, with an offer to admit Swedish garrisons into his electorate, and to come and fight at the head of his own troops under the auspices of his majesty. Nothing could be more agreeable to Gustavus than this proposal, in consequence of which a treaty was soon concluded, importing, that the king of Sweden should defend the elector, on condition of his having the command in chief, his being indulged with a free passage through all the places upon the Elbe, and his being furnished with provisions for his army, while it should be employed in the defence of the electorate. It was also stipulated, that neither party should treat with the emperor without the other's consent<sup>l</sup>.

- THIS treaty being signed, the elector assembled his troops at Torgau, to the number of fourteen or fifteen thousand, with eight and twenty pieces of cannon, and marched to Wittemberg; where being met by the king of Sweden and the marquis of Brandenburg, they began to concert measures for acting in concert against the emperor's general, who had taken Hall and Leipsick, where he was at that time encamped. Gustavus, unwilling to put the issue of the war upon the uncertain event of one battle, to be fought against an able and experienced enemy, was of opinion that no risque ought to be run; but the duke of Saxony, who longed to be rid of the Swedes as well as Austrians, represented, that his dominions were incapable of maintaining two great armies for any length of time, without being totally ruined; and protested, with great warmth, that he would march alone against the enemy, if the king of Sweden should refuse to second him in the enterprize. Gustavus was very well pleased with his spirit and disposition; and, in conformity with his remonstrance, agreed to prepare for their march towards Leipsick<sup>m</sup>.

- THE king of Sweden commanded the right wing, consisting of four thousand horse; and in his rear was general Bannier with nine thousand men, divided into six equal battalions, in one line: at the head of each were eight pieces of cannon, made of boiled leather, of a new invention; and at each flank were five and thirty troops of horse. The main body, conducted by colonel Tufeld, was of six battalions, with six field-pieces in the front of each, sustained in the rear by several troops of horse and some infantry. The left wing, commanded by marechal Horn, was composed of four battalions, supported on the right and left by several companies of foot and troops of horse; and the elector of Saxony was upon the left with his new levies, which had never stood fire<sup>n</sup>.

TILLY no sooner perceived their intention than he called a council of war, and represented the necessity he was under to keep within his intrenchments until he should receive a reinforcement, which he expected from Silesia: but the count of Papenheim espousing the contrary opinion, which was likewise adopted by the majority of the officers, the Imperial army decamped from Leipsick, and advanced about a mile into the plain of Breintensfeld, where it was drawn up in order of battle. Papenheim had the command of the left wing; that of the right was given to the count of Furstemburg, and Tilly commanded in the center. The whole disposition consisted in one long front, without any body of reserve; the cavalry being upon the right and left, and the infantry with the cannon between the two wings. This order of battle was disagreeable to some officers, who complained of it to count Tilly; and that general no sooner recollected himself from the perplexity and concern with which he had been overwhelmed ever since his opinion in council was contradicted, than he changed the disposition (I), in order to have the advantage of the sun, wind, and dust; supported his right by the village of Poldewitz, his left by a wood, and placed his center upon a rising-ground between them. Each army is computed to have amounted to forty thousand men.

The Imperialists are defeated at Leipzick.

THE action began by the discharge of artillery on both sides; and the cannon of the Imperialists produced some disorder in the left wing of the Swedes, because at that time count Hörn made a motion to gain the wind of the Austrians. Count Tilly perceiving his design, extended his front to the right, so that his left wing was no longer supported, but intirely detached from the main body. Gustavus taking the advantage of this circumstance, advanced at the head of his battalions, and poured in such a brisk fire upon the Imperialists, that they were immediately broke; nevertheless they rallied twice, and being as often repulsed, betook themselves to flight. Mean while count Tilly descended into the plain; and leaving the Swedes under Tufeld upon the left, attacked the troops of the elector of Saxony, who were routed in a moment before the Swedes could come to their assistance. Gustavus understanding that the disorder was equal among the pursuers and the conquered, joined his own victorious troops to the body of Tufeld, which had not yet engaged, and fell with such impetuosity upon the Austrian cavalry, that they were soon put to flight, while the foot retired in good order into the wood on the left, abandoning their cannon to the enemy. There they were surrounded by the Swedes, and defended themselves to the last extremity, being animated by the example of Tilly, who fought at their head with equal prudence and intrepidity; till at last the Swedes having turned their own cannon upon them, they were obliged to yield to the fortune of the day: their general having received three musket-shots in his body, would have been taken prisoner, had not the duke of Saxe-Lawenburg come to his rescue, and conveyed him to Hall more dead than alive.

The city of Leipzick falls into the hands of the conqueror,

making himself master of Mentz, and all the strong towns upon the Rhine.

In this battle, which was fought on the seventeenth day of September, seven thousand six hundred Austrians were left dead upon the spot, exclusive of those who fell in the route, and five thousand were made prisoners: their baggage and artillery, together with one hundred pair of colours and many standards, fell into the hands of the Swedes, who lost about seven hundred men, and remained all night upon the field. The immediate consequence of this victory was the taking of Leipzick, and other places, which the Imperialists had wrested from the elector of Saxony; while count Tilly, who had retired from Hall to Halberstadt, where he was joined by count Papenheim, marched towards the Wefer, and took the route to Franconia, with a view to join the troops commanded by Aldringen and Fugger, so as to form an army sufficient to check the progress of the king of Sweden, who, in person, entered Franconia, from whence he marched into the Palatinate, while the elector of Saxony, by his order, penetrated into Silesia and Bohemia. Count Tilly having passed the Wefer, marched into Westphalia, and from thence into Hesse, where he was joined by Aldringen and Fugger, and afterwards by the forces which the duke of Lorrain led to the assistance of the emperor, so that his army amounted to about forty thousand men; and altho' Gustavus had not much more than half that number, he would not venture to give him battle: on the contrary, he sat down quietly, and beheld that prince conquer cities and whole provinces, to the astonishment of the partizans of the house of Austria, a number of whom could not help thinking the emperor was betrayed. Indeed Gustavus, almost without opposition, made himself master of the whole country in his passage from the Elbe to the Rhine, comprehending a space of near one hundred leagues, full of fortified towns. Erfort in Thuringia, Wirtzburg, and all the strong places of Franconia, opened their gates to his victorious troops: the Imperial diet convened at Frankfort, in order to terminate the difference occasioned by the decree of Restitution, was dissolved: Mentz was surrendered to him in a few days: he extended his conquests into the Palatinate, then, in sight of a body of Spanish troops, crossed the Rhine, upon the banks of which he erected a pyramid, that posterity might know how far he had conducted his victorious army. The elector-palatine believing, that now the time approached that would see him restored to his dominions, followed Gustavus into the Palatinate, and solicited the assistance of his arms, which had already re-established the dukes of Mecklenburg, and several other noblemen; but whether a the king was doubtful of the elector's gratitude, or did not, as yet, think himself strong enough to engage in such an enterprize, he evaded his request with fair promises, on the strength of which Frederic resolved to follow in his train.

GUSTAVUS had no sooner passed the Rhine, than Worms was abandoned by Offelaufe, a colonel of Lorrain, who commanded in the place: Heilbron was surrendered to general Horn: Spire declared for the king of Sweden; and Gersnerstheim followed the example of that city: Landau and Weisssemburg, in submitting to his power, laid Alsace open to the Swedish army; and he sent Belingöen to Strasburg to manage his interest with the regency of that city, which he found zealously disposed in favour of a prince whom they regarded as the author of their freedom. His army being considerably reinforced by the troops of the b princes with whom he was in alliance, he detached a strong body to assist the dukes of Mecklenburg in the conquest of Lower Saxony, and in expelling the Austrians who were still in possession of Rostock and Wisnar: these two cities were subdued about the beginning of November; and in four months the king of Sweden saw himself possessed of the whole country extending from the Baltic to the frontiers of Switzerland and Lorrain. While the banks of the Rhine resounded with the success of Gustavus, the elector of Saxony conquered Lusace; and, penetrating into the heart of Bohemia, took Prague from the emperor. He might have extended his conquests a great deal farther, had not his troops, intoxicated with victory and enriched with booty, abandoned themselves to the most shameful excesses. These debauches were in some measure owing to the connivance of the elector, who began c to be jealous and afraid of the growing power of the Swedes, and, instead of prosecuting the war according to the repeated instances of Gustavus, allowed his soldiers to repose and divert themselves in Prague: a remissness of conduct that gave Galas, the Austrian general, time to assemble some troops, and throw himself into the strong town of Pilsen, which would have stopped the progress of the elector, even if he had been disposed to proceed in his military operations. However, the fate of Prague, and the conquests of Gustavus, produced a general revolution in the empire. The archbishop of Bremen, the states of Lower Saxony, the Protestant towns, the counts of Weteravia and Westerwald, together with the whole Leipsick confederation, now openly espoused the interest of the Swede®.

A general revolution in favour of Gustavus.

FERDINAND, humbled by so many disasters, to which he had been so little accustomed, now saw himself in danger of being besieged in his capital, or chased from his hereditary dominions: and in this unfortunate dilemma his ministers represented, that the most efficacious expedient for re-establishing his affairs would be to deprive Tilly of the command of his army, and bestow it upon a general of more experience, and less devoted to the duke of Bavaria, who was not very sorry to see the house of Austria in distress. In a word, they proposed that he should recal Walstein; and he complied with this advice, notwithstanding the opposition of the Spanish ministers, who were the inveterate enemies of that general. Walstein had retired to Znaim in Moravia, where he consoled himself for his disgrace by brewing the misfortunes of Germany; and there he was found by the emperor's deputies, who conjured him to sacrifice his private resentment to the safety of his country, and resume the command of the army, which he should enjoy upon his own terms. He was accordingly declared generalissimo, and invested with an absolute power, independent of the councils of Vienna, while count Tilly was sent with a body of troops to act in Franconia and the neighbouring provinces.

A. D 1632. Walstein is recalled by the emperor, and declared generalissimo of his troops.

At the same time the emperor sent Walstein's brother-in-law, the cardinal d'Harrach, to implore the assistance of the pope; and the baron Rabata to solicit succours from the Italian princes, either in money or troops: but both negotiations miscarried. In vain did the cardinal press the pope to assist his master with a sum of money, to employ his influence in detaching the king of France from his alliance with Gustavus, and to publish a crusade against the Swede, who (he alleged) had threatened to march into Italy and sack the city of Rome: f his holiness excused himself with regard to the money, on account of the poverty of the apostolic chamber; and, instead of a crusade, promised to publish a general jubilee.

While the emperor thus endeavoured to strengthen himself with new allies, the friends of Sweden tampered with some princes of the empire, who had hitherto supported his cause. Charnace the French ambassador at Munich, represented to the duke of Bavaria, that his interest was incompatible with the house of Austria, and exerted all his efforts to bring him over to the party of Gustavus; but all his art was ineffectual: the duke as well as his brother Ferdinand, elector of Cologne, were apprehensive that the Catholics would be oppressed, in consequence of the emperor's disaster; and they took umbrage at the reception which Frederic count-palatine had met with from the king of Sweden, who, doubtless, intended g to re-establish him in his dominions, provided he could compel Ferdinand to sue for peace. The same reasons weighed with the elector of Mentz, who, though he wished for nothing more than a neutrality, resolved to run all the risks of war rather than abandon the house of Austria. As for Philip Christopher, elector of Triers and bishop of Spire, he found himself in a very uncomfortable situation: the Spaniards were in possession of Coblentz, and the most considerable part of his dominions; and he had incurred the displeasure of Gustavus by the assassination of the count de Solms, who was said to have been murdered by the direction of this prelate (K). Finding himself therefore threatened by the Swedes, who was already at his gates, he sued for the protection of France, which he obtained on condition of detaching himself intirely from the emperor, and putting Hermenstein in the hands of the French, as a pledge of his fidelity<sup>a</sup>.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS having employed ministers every where to form new alliances, demand succours, remove the jealousies occasioned by his success, and traverse the negotiations of the emperor, he in person advanced to Franconia at the head of his army, which every day increated. Nuremberg received him with open arms; and after he had, by means of his secret emissaries, engaged in his interest the majority of the Franconian gentlemen and nobles, he marched towards Neumarck, in order to reduce Ingoldstadt, with design to pass the Danube, enter the Upper Palatinate, and from thence penetrate into Bavaria. Count Tilly, being informed of his motions, hastened towards that city, to oppose the approach of the Swedes; but Gustavus, turning suddenly to the right, appeared before Donawert, which was immediately abandoned by the Bavarian garrison; and by the favour of the conqueror retrieved its antient liberty, of which it had been deprived by the dukes of Bavaria. The Swedes now made excursions on both sides of the Danube without molestation; and their parties, extending themselves into Suabia, raised contributions on the towns and castles that depended upon the houses of Austria and Bavaria. b Takes Donawert, and makes excursions on both sides of the Danube.

Tilly disputes the passage of the Lech; is obliged to retreat, and is mortally wounded.

ALL that Tilly could do, in order to hinder the enemy from entering Bavaria, was to dispute the passage of the Lech, upon the bank of which he posted himself so advantageously, that, in a council of war assembled by his Swedish majesty, general Horn was of opinion, that they ought not to attack an army covered by a river, provided with every thing necessary for a vigorous defence, and commanded by a general of consummate experience and ability. But the king, being determined at all risques to open a passage into Bavaria, reconnoitred in person the enemy's camp, and formed a scheme of passing the river upon a bridge of rafts, to be constructed and used under the fire of cannon that he resolved to plant on the bank, which being high, favoured his design. c

Augsburg and other places are surrendered to the conqueror.

THIS project was actually executed on the fifth day of April with incredible diligence. Seventy-two pieces of cannon soon destroyed six imperial regiments that were posted in an opposite wood; and Gustavus fortified the head of his bridge with a work, which the Bavarians attacked three times without success. During these efforts the Swedish cavalry forded the river; and count Tilly, afraid of being surrounded, took advantage of the night to retire in good order, with his baggage and artillery, to Newburg and Ingoldstadt: but in this retreat he was wounded in the thigh by a cannon-shot, and in a few days died at Ingoldstadt, extremely regretted by the duke of Bavaria and the whole army<sup>d</sup> (L). After the passage of the Lech, and the defeat of the Bavarian troops, there was nothing to resist the arms of Gustavus, who soon convinced his enemies of their error in likening him to a king of snow, that would melt in the spring. This last victory was followed by the surrender of Augsburg, in which the king re-established the exercise of the Protestant religion, and exacted an oath of allegiance from the magistrates; a step which cooled the zeal of his allies, who now began to suspect that he extended his views farther than he at first pretended. e

IN the mean time, the duke of Bavaria complained to the Catholic states of their having broke their promises with him, inasmuch as he had demanded succours, and nobody came to his relief. He likewise represented at Vienna the danger to which he was exposed; and Walsstein, pleased to see his enemy's country on the verge of destruction, never wanted plausible excuses for withholding his assistance, when the emperor<sup>f</sup> pressed him to save Bavaria; so that the duke, despairing of succour, sent his most valuable effects to Saltzburg.

Gustavus undertakes the siege of Ingoldstadt without success.

AT that time the king of Sweden was employed in the siege of Ingoldstadt, which was so gallantly defended by the son of count Tilly, that after having suffered several repulses, he resolved to quit the enterprize; and entering Bavaria, where he found the gates of Landshut, Merspurg, and Frisinghen, laid open at his approach, he, on the seventh day of

(K) The elector sent an insolent letter to Gustavus, who said to the gentleman who brought it, "Your master talks big; but tell him to keep his purse well replenished, for he will have occasion for all his dollars to regale the guests that I shall send to him. If the elector will quit the party of my enemies, he shall not be molested; but if he continues to misbehave, I shall soon bring him to reason."

age, was a gentleman of Liege, who had raised himself to the rank of lieutenant-general of the Catholic league, under the duke of Bavaria, and after Walsstein's disgrace, he succeeded to the chief command of the imperial troops. He was always victorious until the battle of Leipsick, and might be compared to the most illustrious captains of antiquity, had not his glory been stained by the horrid cruelties which he permitted his troops to commit when he took the city of Magdeburg.

a May, appeared before Munich, and was met by St. Etienne, the French envoy at the Bavarian court, who intreated him to spare the city and the magnificent palace. Some Swedes, on the contrary, exhorted him to revenge upon Munich the cruelties which count Tilly's army had perpetrated at Magdeburg; but to this advice he replied, in a truly heroic strain: "Let us not imitate the barbarity of the Goths, our ancestors, who have rendered their memory detestable by destroying all the beauties of art." Fraught with such noble sentiments he entered the city, which was ransomed by the citizens for three hundred thousand rixdollars, and found above one hundred and forty pieces of cannon belonging to the duke, which he ordered to be transported to Augsburg <sup>2</sup>.

b DURING these transactions, Walstein duke of Fridland put himself at the head of the imperial army, and undertook the siege of Prague, which he took by assault. Egra, and other places of that kingdom, returned to their allegiance; and the emperor, in a very little time, retrieved the whole country of Bohemia, while the duke of Saxony was obliged to weaken his army, by sending several detachments to cover the frontiers of his dominions.

c THE success of Walstein, together with some vigorous actions performed by Papenheim, in Saxony and Thuringia, raised the drooping spirits of the Imperialists; and Ferdinand flattered himself with the hope of seeing his authority in a little time re-established through the whole empire. This, however, was a pleasure which the duke of Fridland had no intention to indulge him with; for the design of that general was to enter Saxony, and to force the duke to an accommodation with himself in particular; but the duke of Bavaria, and the Spaniards, made such pressing instances at the court of Vienna, that Walstein could not, with any decency, refuse to join Maximilian, and march against the king of Sweden. Nevertheless, he industriously thwarted him in all the operations of the campaign; permitted his troops to ravage the Upper Palatinate, as if it had been an enemy's country, and, instead of assenting to the duke's proposal of attacking Gustavus, who was at that time greatly inferior to them in numbers, he formed the resolution of starving the Swedes, and for that purpose took possession of the neighbouring villages, and ordered his cavalry to scour the country, with a view to cut off their convoys, and interrupt their foraging parties <sup>1</sup>.

d MEAN while, the king of Sweden having received a reinforcement under the chancellor Oxenstiern, the prince palatine of Berkenfeld, the dukes of Saxe-Weymar, the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and general Bannier, saw himself at the head of sixty thousand fighting men, and resolved to give battle to the enemy: but Walstein declining the engagement, and intrenching himself in the front of a wood, Gustavus advanced from Nuremberg to Furt, and drew up his forces in order of battle, to attack the Imperialists, who, on their side, made all the necessary dispositions for giving them a warm reception.

e THE attack was begun by the German troops, who being soon repulsed, Gustavus ordered the rear of his army to fire upon those who had turned their backs; and after having severely reproached the Germans for their dastardly behaviour, he commanded some Swedish regiments to renew the assault. While these were very roughly handled by the Imperialists in front, the Austrian cavalry sallied out from their intrenchments to the right and left, and taking the enemy in flank made great slaughter; notwithstanding which they were obliged to retreat, and the action continued with great obstinacy for the space of ten hours: every regiment in the Swedish army, not even excepting the body of reserve, having marched up to the attack in its turn. At length the king of Sweden despairing of being able to force the Imperial intrenchments, resolved to effectuate a retreat; and seeing no general officer near him, he addressed himself to an old Scottish colonel of the name of Hepburn, who had quitted his service upon some disgust, and protested he would never draw a sword again in his cause. Gustavus was not ignorant of his sentiments; but relying upon his known courage and generosity, he desired him to wave his resentment for once, and exert himself for the safety of the troops. The veteran, seeing such a favourable opportunity of acquiring fresh laurels, told the king, that this was the only occasion on which he would ever serve such an ungrateful prince, and rushing into the hottest part of the battle, delivered the orders of Gustavus to his army, and conducted the retreat with such order and ability, that the Imperialists durst not venture to give them the least disturbance. Having performed this glorious exploit he retired to his own country, in contempt of all the promises and efforts which the king of Sweden made, in order to retain him in his service <sup>2</sup>.

f THIS engagement cost the Austrians about eleven hundred men, who were killed upon the spot, including the counts Fugger, Aldobranden, and Caraffa; but the Swedes, who were more exposed, lost a much greater number, with several officers of distinction; and Gustavus himself narrowly escaped with his life, part of his boot being carried off by a cannon-ball <sup>3</sup>. This prince did not think proper to make any other attempt upon the Austrians; but leaving Oxenstiern with a body of troops in Nuremberg, he advanced into Franconia, and marched towards Bavaria, in order to encourage and support the peasants who had revolted in Upper Austria; while the elector of Saxony leaving his own country defenceless, sent his troops into Silesia, to make a powerful diversion in favour of his Swedish majesty.

WALSTEIN, taking advantage of this conjuncture, separated from the duke of Bavaria, and marched towards Misnia to join count Papenheim, general of the Catholic league, intending to make himself master of this province, where he meant to establish his winter-quarters: and this motion not a little concerted the duke of Saxony, who pressed Gustavus to hasten to his relief. Accordingly the Swede quitted Bavaria, where he left twelve thousand men, and traversing Thuringia, arrived at Naumburg, where he was received with great demonstrations of joy. Here he was informed that Papenheim was detached from the imperial army to conduct six regiments into the country of Cologne; and that Walstein, after having quitted Weissenfels, had retired to Lutzen, at the distance of two leagues from Leipsick<sup>b</sup>. He no sooner received this intelligence, than he resolved to march thither and engage the enemy, who had thus imprudently weakened himself. He accordingly set out on this expedition, contrary to the opinion of Bernard duke of Weymar, who advised him to grant some repose to his troops; and on the fifteenth of November he came in sight of the imperial army about two o'clock in the afternoon. The day being so far spent he passed the night in order of battle, and next morning was prevented from engaging by a thick fog, which did not vanish till eleven in the forenoon; then Gustavus advancing at the head of his guards, repulsed the enemy from the place where their cannon was mounted, and turned their artillery against themselves: but this post was retaken in half an hour by the Imperialists, who obliged the Swedes to give way in their turn. The king, perceiving the disorder of his troops alighted, and putting himself at the head of his regiments "If (said he) after having passed so many rivers, scaled so many walls, and reduced so many strong holds, you have not courage to defend me, at least make one effort to stand and see me fall." Penetrated by this reproach they exclaimed, that they had no fear but for his person, and returned to the charge with such resolution, as to gain the artillery, and force the intrenchments of Walstein's camp. Gustavus having so far carried his point, went to reconnoitre another post, attended only by two aids du camp, and falling among a party of cuirassiers, was unhappily slain. His death, however, did not depress the courage of the Swedes, or in any shape alter his plan of the attack; in consequence of which the duke of Saxe-Weymar pressed the Imperialists on all hands, with such vigour and intrepidity, that they were involved in universal disorder, which was increased by the accidental explosion of gunpowder. In this emergency they were relieved by the arrival of count Papenheim, with part of his cavalry, who renewed the fight with great fury, and bore down all before him, until he received a mortal wound, of which he died next day at Leipsick. This misfortune disheartened the Austrians to such a degree, that taking the advantage of the night, they retreated with great precipitation, leaving their cannon and the field of battle to the Swedes, who lost about three thousand men in this engagement; but it cost the Imperialists double that number. Next day, after a diligent search, the king's body was found stripped, mangled, and covered with gore, one of his attendants lying dead at his side, and the other just expiring, though he had strength enough left to relate the manner of his prince's death<sup>c</sup>. The body was carried to Naumburg, then to Wolgast, from whence it was conveyed to Stockholm, where it was interred with great funeral pomp (M).

Thus fell Gustavus Adolphus, surnamed the Great, in the thirty-eighth year of his age, than whom no prince was ever more esteemed, beloved, and regretted. All the world considered him as an hero; the Protestants of Germany revered him as their deliverer; and the elector palatine, whose sole hope of recovering his dominions depended upon the intention and power of his Swedish majesty, being indisposed at Mentz, no sooner heard of this monarch's death, than he relapsed into a fever, which, in a few days, deprived him of life. Nor was this prince devoid of good qualities, though they were tarnished by a spirit of vanity and ambition, to which all his misfortunes were owing. Charles-Lewis, his eldest son, being under age at his death, the administration of his affairs were undertaken by Philip-Lewis his uncle, until he should be of age according to the constitutions of the empire<sup>d</sup>. Both armies were so weakened by the battle of Lutzen, that the war languished all the rest of the campaign, especially on the side of the emperor; for Walstein being in no condition to undertake any other enterprize, retired into Bohemia, whither he was followed by the Swedes, with the body of their dead monarch. In a word, Ferdinand, whose troops were defeated, looked upon himself as a gainer by the death of his most formidable enemy, and the Swedes, though victorious, considered themselves as undone by the loss of their king. This misfortune fell still the heavier, as he left no son capable to assume the reins of government, his only daughter Christina being at that time in the sixth year of her age: nevertheless, under the command of duke Bernard, they drove the Imperialists out of Saxony, before the end of the year, contrary to the expectation of Ferdinand, who hoped that now the Swedish troops would separate of their own accord, and their allies be so much divided among themselves, that he should find no difficulty in subduing them one after another.

C H A P. XVIII.

Containing the Progress of the War to the Treaty of Prague.

WALSTEIN, indeed, advised him to publish a general amnesty, which he believed would have a great tendency towards an accommodation; but his imperial majesty, who had other designs, and wanted to render himself absolute in the empire, made new preparations for continuing the war. The same steps were taken by the duke of Bavaria; and the Spaniards sent considerable sums into Italy to levy troops for the emperor's service. On the other hand a general consternation prevailed among the Protestants, who had flattered themselves with the hope of seeing their religion and liberty secured by the arms of Gustavus Adolphus. Besides, distrust and misunderstanding began to arise among themselves, as well as between them and the Swedish nation, to which they were unwilling to yield the chief direction of such a capital confederacy, although, without their assistance, they foresaw the scheme must be ruined without resource.

The emperor resolves to continue the war.

CARDINAL de Richlieu, tho' he privately rejoiced at the death of the king, resolved to maintain the alliance with Sweden, lest that kingdom should make a separate accommodation with the emperor, who might, in such a case, pour in his whole force upon France: he was likewise apprehensive that the Swedes, if detached from their alliance with Lewis, would fall upon the Catholics in Germany, from whom they could have extorted a much greater sum than the subsidy they received from the French king: and lastly, his design was to profit by the troubles of the empire, in seizing the whole country on the other side of the Rhine, from Basil to the Moselle. Swayed by these motives, the king of France wrote to Oxenstiern, the Swedish chancellor, and all the generals of that army, exhorting them to prosecute the work they had so happily begun, and promising to assist them with all his power. They received the same assurances from the English and Dutch; and as for the king of Denmark, the jealousy which he had conceived of Gustavus, being now considerably diminished, he would no longer listen to the promises of the emperor, who would have engaged him to break with Sweden. He was far from wishing to contribute to the ruin of the German Protestants: he saw Sweden had so many affairs upon her hands, that he might one way or other take the advantage of her being involved; and he flattered himself with the expectation of a match, between his son prince Ulric and the young queen Christina.

THE education of this young princess was, by the states of the kingdom, committed to the chiefs of the five colleges (N); namely the grand bailie, the marechal, the admiral, the chancellor and the treasurer of the crown: but the principal direction of the affairs of Germany was conferred upon Oxenstiern, the chancellor of the kingdom, whom Gustavus before his death had sent to solicit the circles of High Germany to make preparations for maintaining the war<sup>f</sup>. In the execution of this office, bestowed upon him by the states of Sweden, he found great obstacles to surmount, in the pride and dignity of the electors, and other Protestant princes, who were very little disposed to obey the regulations of a stranger; and in the jealousy of the generals, who, for the most part, were originally Germans: and he foresaw the danger and disgrace that would attend the Swedes, should they abandon their conquests, without first having concluded a treaty with the emperor. He perceived, that, whatever might be the issue, it would be more creditable to stay until he should be expelled by force of arms, than to retreat without resistance; that the more vigorously he acted, he might expect the more honourable peace; that, should he entirely abandon the work which was begun, the affairs of the Protestants must in a little time be ruined beyond redemption, and Sweden itself, by necessary consequence, be exposed to the utmost hazard; and that, although he should not be able to perform his undertakings with that glory which would have attended their enterprizes had the king been alive, he might nevertheless hinder the enemy from approaching the frontiers of Sweden, until a favourable peace could be obtained.

SUCH were the reflections Oxenstiern suggested to the circles of Suabia, Franconia, the Upper and Lower Rhine. In order to deliberate upon the affairs of the common cause, he convoked an assembly, which was transferred from Ulm to Hailbron; and understanding that the elector of Saxony endeavoured to thwart his purpose, and obtain for himself the principal direction of affairs, he repaired to Dresden, with a view to engage that prince in a firm concurrence with the common interest. But being amused with general answers, and perceiving that several of the elector's counsellors inclined towards the cause of the emperor, he left this court, very little satisfied with the issue of his negotiation, and visited the elector of Brandenburg; who not only expressed the most hearty inclination to contribute towards the success of the common cause, but even went to Dresden, in order to reinforce the representations of the chancellor <sup>g</sup>.

ALL his remonstrances, however, made no impression upon the elector of Saxony, who complained that Oxenstiern arrogated to himself too much authority in the empire; and in particular inveighed against him, because he had hindered Frederic-Ulric, duke of Brunswick, from assembling the circle of Lower-Saxony, on pretence that the right of convoking belonged to the archbishop of Magdeburg, of which the crown of Sweden was then in possession. The ambassador of France, who arrived at Dresden in the midst of these transactions, employed his whole address to corroborate the arguments used by the elector of Brandenburg; but the Saxon remained inflexible, and, what aggravated the misfortune, George landgrave of Hesse communicated all that passed on this occasion to the emperor <sup>h</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING these obstacles, Oxenstiern neglected nothing to preserve the Swedish conquests: from the main army, which was then in Misnia, he detached fourteen thousand men, under the command of George duke of Lunenbourg, to drive the Imperialists from Lower Saxony and Westphalia: duke Bernard marched with the rest of the troops into Franconia, from whence he had orders to go and act in Oberland in concert with Gustavus Horn, who likewise had a considerable command; while the count de Thurn was sent to retrieve the Swedish affairs in Silesia, and to succour Pomerania, in case the Imperialists should make an irruption into that province. In consequence of this disposition, Gustavus Horn entered Suabia, where he defeated the Bavarian cavalry near Kimpten, and hindered them from taking up their quarters in the country of Wirtemberg. In Westphalia, George duke of Lunenbourg made himself master of several places; and after having beaten count de Mansfeld, near Rhintilem, laid siege to Hamel; and the landgrave William subdued great part of the country of Munster: but no progress was made in Silesia, because the Swedish and Saxon generals disagreed <sup>i</sup>.

Hailbron.

IN the mean time the four cities assembled at Hailbron (O), notwithstanding the endeavours of the Saxon, who attempted to frustrate the convention by letters importing, that, in consequence of the treaty of Leipsick, he was invested with the direction of the Protestant affairs: and here the chancellor exerted himself with such success, that a league was formed with the crown of Sweden; and he, as plenipotentiary of that crown, entrusted with the conduct of affairs relating to the common cause, though he was restricted by a council chosen by the consent of all the allies, under the appellation of consilium formatum <sup>k</sup>. It was not without infinite pains that he gained his point, on this occasion, against the intrigues of the emperor and the court of Saxony, and in the midst of so many jarring interests, which he was obliged to unite: after all, he was limited by several troublesome clauses, suggested in private by Feuquieres, the French ambassador; who, while he openly exhorted the members to join with Sweden, was afraid of seeing the power of that crown and the Protestant interest too much strengthened in the empire.

THE king of Denmark, at length dazzled by the magnificent promises of the emperor, employed all his address in drawing the Swedes from Germany; and with this view offered his mediation for a peace to the elector of Saxony. Oxenstiern, on the other hand, who would not openly refuse the proposal, desired that the mediation of France and Holland might be joined to the good offices of his Danish majesty, well knowing that the em-

(O) This assembly was composed of deputies from the circles of the Upper Rhine, Suabia, and Franconia, the minister of the elector of Brandenburg, two dukes of the house of Wirtemberg, Frederic marquis of Baden and his two sons, the rhingrave, Orto and Philip the counts Nassau, Selms, Hanau, and several other princes; the marquises of Anspach, Culmbach, and Branden- burg; the towns of Nuremberg, Frankfort, Ulm, and Strasbourg, sent deputies to this convention: the chancellor of Sweden was there with two counsellors, a secretary of state and several officers of the army: and finally, Feuquieres, Anstruther, and Paw, ambassadors from France, England, and Holland, attended at this assembly.

- a peror would never consent to such a conjunction, and that therefore the scheme must prove abortive. He had already observed, that a separate peace was on the carpet at Dresden, and opposed it with all his power; but, in order to provide for the worst, he, at the assembly of Hailbron, reinstated the children of Frederic count-palatine, in their territories and electoral dignity<sup>1</sup>; hoping by this measure to engage England, Brandenburg, and Holland, with the whole palatine house, to concur more seriously in the execution of his designs. At the same time he renewed the alliance between France and Sweden<sup>m</sup>, and took every step which he thought could induce the Dutch to act with vigour for the common cause. The duke of Bavaria, and other princes of the Catholic league, were left at liberty to remain neuter, on the conditions formerly proposed to them by Gustavus; and the confederates engaged to
- b guaranty one another in the articles which should be stipulated in any general peace.

FEUQUIERES, immediately after this assembly broke up, went to the courts of Dresden and Berlin, in order to persuade the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg to ratify the resolutions of Hailbron, and accept the mediation of the French king, as proposed by Oxenstiern; but the first rejected both these propositions, though he assured him he would never abandon his allies, or conclude a separate peace; and the other approved of the mediation, but declined ratifying the treaty of Hailbron, until he should confer with the elector of Saxony, whose assent to it he would endeavour to procure<sup>n</sup>.

- FERDINAND*, whose aim was to detach these electors from their alliance with Sweden, had, after the death of Gustavus, in a letter desired the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt to repair to Leutmeritz, where he would find the bishop of Vienna and Questenberg, who would communicate to him proposals for accommodation. He accordingly went to the place appointed, after having received directions from the electors, to whom he imparted the letter; but their demands seemed so extravagant to the emperor's ministers, that they refused to proceed in the negotiation.
- c The emperor tampers with the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg for a separate peace.

- MEAN while the war was carried on for some time with pretty equal success on both sides. Towns were taken and lost, the people ruined by large contributions, few provinces of the empire being exempted from pillage and destruction. George duke of Lunenbourg undertook the siege of Hamelen in Lower Saxony, which was defended by an Austrian garrison, in hope of being relieved by Gronfeldt and Merode, who actually advanced with design to
- d attack the enemy; but George, hearing of their approach, changed the siege into a blockade, and marched to meet them in the plain of Oldendorp, where they were utterly defeated, leaving three thousand dead on the field of battle, together with their cannon and baggage; whereas the Swedes did not lose above three hundred men. The count de Merode, to whom the vanquished attributed the loss of the day, died of the wounds he received in this battle, which was fought on the eighth of July; and in ten days after the engagement, the duke made himself master of Hamelen, where he found plenty of ammunition, with a numerous train of artillery<sup>o</sup>.
- George duke of Lunenbourg defeats the Imperialists at Oldendorp, and takes Hamelen.

- THE Austrians were not so unfortunate in Silesia, where Walstein surprised and defeated Duval, who commanded a body of Swedish troops in that province<sup>p</sup>: then he drove the Protestants from several posts, marched down along the Oder as far as Frankfort, which he took, and Landsberg surrendered without having made the least resistance. The Swedes were already under apprehensions of being totally expelled from Pomerania, when Walstein returned as he came, and gave duke Bernard an opportunity of joining his troops with those of marechal Horn, so as to render the Swedes stronger than the Imperialists. Indeed this general had no intention to retrieve the affairs of his master. Being intirely engrossed by the project of usurping the crown of Bohemia, he abandoned the dominions of the duke of Bavaria to the Swedes, and employed all his address to traverse the design of the duke of Feria, the Spanish general, who was in his passage from Italy into the empire, with a body of thirty thousand men, and in a fair way of eclipsing, or at least of rivalling, the power and

- f reputation of Walstein. Accordingly this officer being pressed by Ferdinand, to favour the march of the duke of Feria, sent a detachment under Aldringhen, who was entirely devoted to his interest, with private instructions to thwart the Spanish general, and take such measures for harrassing and starving his troops, as should compel them to desert and disperse: nor were his expectations frustrated in this particular, as we shall see in the sequel.

- IN the midst of these intrigues of Walstein, a difference happened in Switzerland between the Protestant and Roman Catholic cantons. Oxenstiern had ordered the rhingrave Otho, Swedish governor of the two circles of the Rhine, to make himself master of the forest towns belonging to the house of Austria (P); and the Protestants, far from opposing, seemed rather to assist in the execution of this enterprize. The Catholics, on the contrary, in a diet which at that time they held at Baden, declared against the Swedes, and threatened to repel them by force of arms. In these sentiments they were supported by the count de Furstemberg, the emperor's commissary, who represented, that by virtue of the alliance subsisting between the thirteen cantons and the house of Austria, the Swiss ought to compel the Swedes to relinquish their design upon the forest towns <sup>a</sup>. In consequence of this remonstrance, the diet of Baden required the rhingrave to remove from Suabia; but that general gave them to understand, that he could not dispense with the execution of the order he had received from Oxenstiern, who was director-general in the affairs of the Protestant union. This Swedish chancellor, and his assembly, hearing the great noise that was made by the Austrian ministers on this subject among the cantons, sent the count de Stulingen to the diet at Baden, to represent, that the hereditary alliance so loudly trumpeted by the Imperial commissary, far from obliging the cantons to defend the forest towns, did not even hinder them from engaging in the confederation of Hailbron, against the enemies of the empire. The speech that Stulingen made on this occasion perplexed the diet, and the Swiss afterwards assembling at Lucerne, came to a resolution of observing a perfect neutrality. <sup>b</sup>

BUT the taking of Stein, and siege of Constance, by marechal Horn, were matters much more interesting to the Swiss than the conquest of the forest towns. That general, with a body of twelve thousand men, directed his march, all of a sudden, towards Constance, which being pretty well fortified on the side of Germany, he resolved to attack it from the Switzerland quarter, where it was very weak and defenceless; but in order to achieve this enterprise, it was necessary to pass the Rhine over the bridge of Stein, a town under the dominion of the Swiss, which he therefore took by surprise. Nevertheless, he was baffled in his attempt upon Constance, which was gallantly defended by Wolfeg, who continually received fresh supplies of soldiers and provision, and bravely repulsed the besiegers in a general assault <sup>c</sup>. Not even a reinforcement sent by prince Christian of Birkenfeld, and the junction of Bernard duke of Saxe-Weymar, could enable the marechal to accomplish his aim. The garrison of the place increased every day; and he found himself obliged to retire, though he pretended that this retreat was the effect of his complaisance for his most Christian majesty, who interposed in behalf of his allies of Switzerland.

SOME time after this fruitless attempt, Bernard, in obedience to the chancellor's order, separated from Horn, and marching into Bavaria, appeared before Ratisbon, which he besieged with such industry and vigour, notwithstanding the brave opposition of Teubreze, who commanded in the place, that the inhabitants dreading an assault, obliged the governor to capitulate. From hence he marched towards Passau, with design to surprise that place, and afterwards to enter Austria on the side of the Ems, and favour the revolt of the peasants, who had promised to declare in favour of the Swedes. In his route he actually took Straubingen, and some other places; but the season being too far advanced for the execution of his scheme, he returned to Ratisbon, and put his troops in winter quarters <sup>d</sup>.

Aldringen.

DURING this progress of the duke of Saxe-Weymar, marechal Horn being joined by the duke of Wirtemberg, harrassed without ceasing the Spaniards commanded by the duke of Feria, who, after having passed the Rhine near Basil, marched with great diligence to the relief of Brisack, which was besieged by the rhingrave John-Philip; and this prince, finding himself unable to cope with such an antagonist, abandoned the siege, and retreated to Colmar, after having set his camp on fire. The duke of Feria having thus raised the siege of Brisack, resolved likewise to deliver Philipsburg, which was blockaded by Schmeidberg; and the rhingrave and the Swedes encamped near Colmar, were too weak to traverse the design of the Spanish general; when they were joined by marechal Horn and the prince of Birkenfeld, and enabled to meet the duke de Feria, to whose camp they forthwith marched in order of battle. The Spaniard, mortified to see himself defied in this manner, pressed Aldringen to give battle to the Swedes; but this officer, adhering to the private directions he had received from Walstein, would not consent to a general action, but repassed the Rhine at Brisack, on pretence of going to raise the blockade of Philipsburg; so that the duke of Feria seeing his troops greatly reduced by distempers, and this retreat, marched towards Thau, in order to meet a reinforcement from Franché-comté, which however was very inconsiderable. In the mean time, Horn and the prince of Birkenfeld pursued Aldringen, and several times defeated his rear with great slaughter; so that he was forced to retire as far as Brisack, where he was again joined by the duke of Feria, whom necessity compelled to forget the affront he had received <sup>e</sup>. This junction stopped the progress of the Swedes, until the rhingrave united his forces with those of marechal Horn, who then drove the enemy back to Bavaria, with the loss of five thousand men. The bad success of this campaign affected the Spanish general so deeply, that he died of grief; and Aldringen, who is accused of having been the cause of his misfortunes, was killed on his march to the relief of Landshut <sup>f</sup>.

OXENSTIERN had resolved to send Bannier into Silesia with the army which he commanded on the Elbe, while Arnheim, with his Saxons, should march towards Bohemia, and a oblige the Austrians to divide their forces; but this project was rendered ineffectual by the practices of the Saxon general, who attempted to stop the progress of the Swedes by all the means in his power; and instead of taking the route to Bohemia, turned towards La Marche, and consumed his time to no purpose in besieging Frankfort upon the Oder.

ALTHOUGH the arms of Sweden had hitherto been pretty successful, except in Silesia, the war became every day more and more burthensome and disagreeable to that nation. The four circles of Upper Germany were heartily tired of its continuance, by which they had been exposed to so many ravages; for, notwithstanding the utmost precautions, it was impossible to restrain the soldiers within the rules of exact discipline, because they could not be regularly paid. The landgrave acted for himself alone, and insisted upon keeping all the conquests he had made. The French pretended to claim all the country from Basil to the Moselle, and took umbrage at Oxenstiern, who refused to act in all things according to their pleasure. Holland beheld the conquests of Sweden with a jealous eye; and England, far from engaging heartily in the affairs of the empire, seemed rather to incline a little towards the interests of Spain: but the elector of Saxony did infinitely more mischief than service to the common cause. As he could not bear to see Oxenstiern at the head of affairs, he precipitately engaged in a negotiation for a peace, which could serve no other purpose than that of producing a new war; besides, by means of Arnheim, he did all that lay in his power to traverse the designs of Sweden. Dependence could no longer be placed upon the elector of Brandenburg, because there was no longer any prospect of concluding the match between his son and queen Christina; and finally, Pomerania was an enemy to Sweden.

The different views and dispositions among the confederates.

NOTWITHSTANDING these discouragements, Oxenstiern employed all his efforts in supporting the common cause. In an assembly of the circles of Lower Saxony, convened at Halberstadt, he exerted his whole address to retain the confederates in their union, and induce them to make vigorous preparations for war: he afterwards convoked an assembly at Frankfort upon the Maine, to which he invited all the Protestants, to deliberate, whether the war should be continued, or an accommodation effected*.

IN the midst of all these difficulties, the Swedes conceived great hopes when they learned that Wallstein was in disgrace with the emperor, and resolved to join the Protestants. We have already observed, that this general, when he was first divested of his command, thought himself extremely ill requited for the services he had done the emperor; and, during his retreat, laid plans for raising himself again to such a pitch of power, as would enable him not only to revenge, but repay himself to his own wish: for he aspired at nothing less than the kingdom of Bohemia, and the possession of Moravia, as the reward of his toils, and an equivalent for the duchy of Mecklenburg, which he had lost. His re-establishment in the rank of generalissimo of the emperor's forces seemed a favourable occasion for the execution of his projects; and since his elevation to this post, he had spared neither money nor caresses to conciliate the affection of the officers, so as that he might be formidable to the emperor, and obtain from his fear what he could never expect from his goodwill. He had likewise set on foot a secret correspondence with the Protestant party, and France, whom he promised to join with the army under his command, provided they would consent to his ascending the throne of Bohemia, and assist him to conquer that kingdom; and, lastly, he had exacted an oath of fidelity from his officers, in which the emperor's name was not mentioned. These however were steps, which, in all probability, he did not take, until he found his enemies had succeeded in ruining him with the emperor. The jesuits, and other priests, were his inveterate foes, because he had always declared them perturbators of the public repose, who had no title to intermeddle in affairs of state; the duke of Bavaria bore him an old grudge; and the Spaniards were extremely incensed against him, because he treated their schemes and advice with contempt, and affected to ridicule their nation. These therefore, joining together, let slip no opportunity of blackening his character at the court of Vienna; and, unhappily for him, their accusations were rendered plausible by his own insolence and misconduct. They taxed him with having spent the summer in vain negotiation, when he might have easily invaded Pomerania and Mecklenburg; with having lost Ratisbon by his negligence; and exhausted the hereditary provinces of the house of Austria, by making them winter quarters for his troops, which might have been subsisted elsewhere. In a word, they represented him in such a light, that the emperor no longer doubted his treachery; and, perhaps, it was not till after he understood this triumph of his enemies (Q), that he seriously thought of betraying his trust. Certain it is, he made over-

(Q) Puffendorf is of opinion, that Wallstein at first had no other view in his secret negotiation with the Swedes and Saxons, than that of amusing them to their own destruction: and that the freedoms he publicly took in speaking of the emperor, were in consequence of a secret permission he had from the court of Vienna, for the more effectual deception of the confederates. Certain it is, Bernard duke of Saxe-Weimar neglected his proposals, by the advice of Oxenstiern, who from the beginning believed he acted in concert with the emperor.

tures to the Swedes, who suspected his sincerity; and afterwards, assembling his principal officers at Pilsen, pretended that he would relinquish the command of the army, rather than be longer exposed to the venomous shafts of his private foes. Having made this declaration, he retired; and his confidants, Tertski, Illo, and Kinsky, took this opportunity to represent the prejudice which would result from his retreat, to religion, to the empire, and to the officers of the army, whose fortune was attached to the fate of their general: they therefore proposed, that he should be obliged to retain the command; but at the same time observed, it would be no more than justice in them to take effectual measures for protecting him from the malice of his enemies. The proposal was received with applause; and, in consequence of their insinuations, two and fifty officers subscribed an association upon oath, by which they engaged to follow his fortune, and defend his life.<sup>y</sup>

In consequence of this information, Ferdinand assembled the Imperial council, in which Walstein was declared a rebel, and, with three or four of his accomplices, put to the ban of the empire. Picolomini, being charged with the execution of this decree, put himself at the head of a body of troops, and advanced towards Pilsen, with intent to seize the duke of Fridland and his partizans; while Balthazar de Marades had orders to repair to Prague, and exact from the garrison and inhabitants a new oath of allegiance to the emperor, so as that the outlaw should find no shelter in that place.<sup>c</sup>

and retires to Egra,

WALSTEIN was not ignorant of these transactions, which gave him but little disturbance, because he thought he had made his party good among the Protestants, among whom he would be sure of finding protection, when every other resource should have failed: but in the mean time, as his scheme was not yet ripe, he resolved to try some expedients for removing the suspicion of the emperor; and, to shew that he was under no apprehension, he repaired to Egra, with no other attendants than the counts of Tertski and Kinsky, with two or three other officers. He looked upon this as the most secure and commodious place of retreat, because it was garrisoned by the Irish troops, who he imagined were intirely devoted to his interest, and at hand for carrying on his negotiation with the Swedes. Accordingly he was no sooner arrived in this place than he received a courier, with letters from the duke of Saxony, pressing him to a conference with the duke of Weymar, in order to settle the junction of their forces; and he was actually resolved to comply with his request. But Lesley, a Scotch officer, who admitted the courier, as captain of the guard, having dived into the substance of his dispatches, communicated his discovery to Gordon and Butler, who were colonels in the Imperial service; and, as Walstein was a proclaimed outlaw, they determined to prevent the execution of his purpose, by depriving him of life without loss of time: his followers were likewise destined to the same fate, lest they should excite some disturbance on the death of their general. It was therefore agreed, that Gordon should invite the counts of Tertski and Kinsky, together with the other three officers, to supper; and that, upon a certain signal, they should be assassinated by a number of soldiers, who were instructed to rush in and sacrifice the guests. This barbarous scene was accordingly acted, to the disgrace of hospitality and the infamy of the perpetrators; who afterwards went to the apartment of Walstein, and broke open the door. At the noise, occasioned by their entering, he had started up from bed, and run towards a window, where Butler thrust a portuisan into his body, and he fell dead upon the spot, without having uttered one word.<sup>d</sup> Thus died, at the age of fifty, the famous Walstein duke of Fridland, who had even shaken the fortune of the great Gustavus. Nothing could exceed his courage but his ambition; for the gratification of which he would have renounced all obligations, human and divine. His death was a loss to the Swedes, whose party he would certainly have embraced; and, for that reason, an advantage to the Imperialists, whom he was on the point of betraying.<sup>e</sup> where he and his friends are assassinated by Gordon, Lesley, and Butler.

The duke of Saxe-Lauemburg is arrested and sent prisoner to Vienna.

FRANCIS ALBERT, duke of Saxe-Lauemburg, who enjoyed the confidence of Walstein, having next day entered Egra, without knowing what had happened, was arrested, and sent prisoner to Vienna; and Bernard, duke of Saxe-Weymar, going to the same place, had well nigh shared the same fate: but he was advised upon the road to retire with all expedition, and he did not neglect the intimation. The colonels Spar and Ulefelt, together with sixteen other officers, lost their heads, for having engaged in Walstein's conspiracy.

It was believed that the death of this general would produce great disturbance in the Imperial army, because he was so much beloved by the soldiers; but the emperor had taken such precautions as prevented any consequence of this kind, except the revolt of the Silesians, who took up arms at the instigation of Freiberg, the lieutenant of Walstein; but they were soon reduced, and their chief sent prisoner to Vienna.<sup>b</sup> True it is, duke Bernard sur-

a prised and cut in pieces one regiment of Austrians; but the Imperialists, in revenge, drove part of his forces out of the Upper Palatinate, and another body was dislodged from Straubingen by the Bavarians. However, Gustavus Horn made considerable progress in Upper Suabia, where he took the towns of Kempten, Biberach, and Memmingen, and gained some other considerable advantages over the enemy. About the same time the rhingrave defeated a body of Imperialists and Lorrainers, in an obstinate battle fought near Watweiler, and made himself master of divers places in Upper Alsace, and in the Suntgaw: while Lewis Schmeidberg took Philipsburg by famine, and Alexander Lesly drove the Austrians from Landsherg c.

b THE elector of Saxony had been a long time amused by the house of Austria with the hope of giving peace to the empire; but was at length undeceived, and ordered his troops to enter Lusace. In obedience to this order, Frederic-William of Saxony, duke of Altemburg, being joined by Arnheim, invested Bauzen, the garrison of which was commanded by colonel Goltz, who, finding himself besieged, ordered the suburbs to be set on fire. This proved a very unhappy step; for the flames being by an high wind conveyed to the town, it was reduced to ashes, seven hundred men lost their lives, and all the wealth and provisions of the place were consumed: so that the governor was obliged to capitulate d.

Bauzen is reduced to ashes

c THEN Arnheim undertook the siege of Sittau on the river Neiss; and, hearing the Imperialists were in full march to attack him in his lines, he resolved to be before-hand with them, and meet them half-way: their van being defeated, they were obliged to retreat, and re-join the main body of their army, commanded by general Colorado, which, though advantageously posted and intrenched, Arnheim determined to attack. His success was equal to the boldness of the enterprize: after an action that lasted five hours, they were forced on all hands, and betook themselves to flight, some to Lignitz, and others towards Glatz in Bohemia, leaving six and thirty pair of colours, seven and twenty standards, nine pieces of cannon, two mortars, all their baggage and ammunition, and four thousand men upon the field, besides fourteen hundred who were taken prisoners; while the loss of the Saxons was altogether inconsiderable e.

Arnheim forces the intrenchments of the Imperialists.

d ARNHEIM, having obtained this victory, passed the Oder, took Stenau, and made himself master of Glogaw, after a siege of fifteen days. Mean while, the Swedes proceeded with their operations in Pomerania and Mecklenburg. General Bannier invested Frankfort upon the Oder, which was surrendered, after a gallant defence, and put into the hands of the elector of Brandenburg. Then he advanced, at the head of seventeen thousand men, through Silesia, towards Bohemia; defeated a body of Croats, conquered Fridland, took possession of Leutmeritz, made himself master of Melnick, crossed the Elbe on a bridge of boats, and encamped at the foot of the White Mountain before Prague: here he was joined by the elector of Saxony and Arnheim, who had marched through Misnia, in order to make a diversion in favour of Ratisbon, at that time besieged by the Austrians. In their way they had taken Sittau by assault, and abandoned it to pillage. The Austrians having possessed themselves of the rising-grounds in the neighbourhood of the Saxon army, nothing passed on either e side but smart skirmishes for several days; when the elector, seeing it was impracticable to force the enemy from their post, and beginning to be in want of provision, thought proper to retire towards Melnick, near which place he fixed his camp.

f THE affairs of the Swedes declined daily in Bavaria, where the siege of Ratisbon was still carried on by the king of Hungary, whom the emperor had declared generalissimo of his troops: here he was reinforced by the duke of Bavaria, and battered the place with one hundred pieces of cannon. In a word, this being the first enterprize of the new general, every step was taken to render it successful. On the other hand, the city was defended with incredible bravery and resolution by the Swedish commandant Larsz Kogge, who repulsed the Imperialists in divers desperate assaults, and at last obtained a very honourable capitulation. Bernard duke of Weymar and Gustavus Horn had actually joined their forces, and were marching to the relief of the place, when they heard the disagreeable news of its being surrendered: they, at the same time, had the mortification to see their army harrassed by the bad roads, without being able to indulge it with proper refreshment and repose; because the Austrians were posted before Nordlingen, and had received a powerful reinforcement of Spanish troops from Italy, so that they threatened to strike some stroke of importance before they should be obliged to part; for these troops of Spain were destined for the Low Countries, and could only act in their passage thither.

The city of Ratisbon is taken by the king of Hungary.

g THE Swedes took post near Ropfingen in a very commodious situation, having behind them the whole country of Wirtemberg, from whence they could be supplied with necessaries and refreshments. Here they might have securely waited until the Spaniards should have proceeded on their march, and then ventured a battle with the Imperialists, thus weakened; the worst consequence of this step would have been the loss of Nordlingen, which could not have been a matter of great consequence, especially as their affairs were in a prosperous condition in other countries. They had the upper hand in Westphalia: Hildesheim had surrendered to George duke of Lunenburg, after he had defeated the enemy at Sarsfeldt. We have already mentioned the success of Arnheim and Bannier; and the rhingrave had reduced Brisac and Rbinsfeld to the last extremity. Horn was therefore of opinion, that no unnecessary risque ought to be run, at least until the arrival of Cratz and the rhingrave, who were actually on the march to join them with ten thousand men: but he was over-ruled by the other generals, who proposed that they should approach nearer to Nordlingen, and occupy the mountain Arensberg, from whence they might with more convenience succour the besieged<sup>f</sup>. While this motion was agreed upon in the Swedish council of war, the Imperialists eagerly waited for an opportunity to engage; for their army was very numerous, and they were inspired with uncommon courage and alacrity by the presence of four princes; namely, the king of Hungary, the cardinal-infant, governor of the Low Countries, and the dukes of Bavaria and Lorraine.

On the fifteenth day of September, about five in the evening, the Swedes began the action, by charging eight squadrons of the Imperial cavalry, who, after their general Aldobrandin was slain, retreated to a hill, where they were supported by the Spanish infantry. As this was an advantageous post, the duke of Weymar ordered it to be attacked; and, after a dispute which lasted till midnight, it was carried by the impetuosity of the Swedes, before whom the Spaniards retired to another hill, on which the Imperial army was encamped. At break of day the Swedish army marched in order of battle, to force the intrenchments of the Imperialists, which they charged with such fury, that the Austrians were put into disorder, and would, in all probability, have been routed, had not they been sustained by the Spaniards under Martin D'Itraques, who attacked the Swedes in their turn, and regained the ground which the Germans had lost. The duke of Weymar, who could not bear to see the victory so long in suspense, charged at the head of the left wing, a post defended by Galas, and the marquis de Leganez, who were driven backwards as far as the station of the king of Hungary, where they were supported by Gambacorta, with his Neapolitan and Hungarian horse, and rallying their troops, retrieved their loss, and broke that wing of the Swedish army. But the hottest of the battle was upon an hill, where Charles duke of Lorraine, and John de Wert, signalized themselves in very extraordinary acts of valour. Nor did the Swedes belie the reputation they had formerly acquired. Bernard de Weymar came to their assistance; and his presence inspired them with fresh courage; they redoubled their efforts, and though fatigued by the long duration of the battle, fought with incredible fury and perseverance, until, at length, they were obliged to yield to the number and fortune of the foe. The duke of Lorraine had the glory to win the duke of Weymar's standard with his own hand, and to break the hitherto invincible troops of that general. His cavalry pursued those who fled; and the generals Horn, Cratz, Hoffkirk, Rostock, and several other officers of distinction, were taken prisoners: but the duke de Weymar had the good fortune to escape to Wirtemberg, with the greatest part of the Swedish cavalry; for the rhingrave, who was within three miles of the field, put himself in motion, and checked the pursuit of the Imperialists. Nevertheless, the Swedes lost eight thousand men, who were slain on the field; nine thousand were killed in their flight, and four thousand were taken prisoners; and they left behind them about fourscore pieces of cannon, all their ammunition and baggage, and an infinite number of standards and colours, while the loss of the victors did not exceed two thousand men who fell in battle<sup>g</sup> (R).

which surrenders to the victors, who reduce Suabia and Franconia.

NEXT day the garrison of Nordlingen surrendered at discretion; and the Imperialists profiting by their good fortune, subdued the greatest part of Franconia, and the whole circle of Suabia. Hailbron and Heidelberg opened their gates to the conquerors; the whole country of Wirtemberg was ravaged, and the duke obliged to take refuge in Strasburg, while Charles of Lorraine entered the Brissgaw, in conjunction with the Bavarian troops<sup>h</sup>.

THE news of this defeat overwhelmed Oxenstiern with chagrin, especially as the league of Hailbron had, in a manner, vanished in smoke. The confederates were now reduced to despair, and loudly exclaimed against the Swedes, as the authors of those calamities they were destined to undergo. The chancellor, however, would not suffer himself to be totally dejected, but resolved to repair this misfortune by all the means in his power: for this purpose he endeavoured to gain time, and engage the French in the war; foreseeing, that should he be so lucky as to accomplish this aim, he might be able to obtain a tolerable peace from the emperor. For this reason he would not retire and abandon Upper Germany a to the Imperialists, according to the advice of some who pretended to be his friends; nor indeed was he as yet without resource. The troops commanded by George duke of Lunenburg, William landgrave of Hesse, as well as those under the conduct of Bannier, and the rhingrave, had hitherto received no check, and were sufficient to cope with the enemy; had the confederates been firmly united: besides, the cavalry, which did not suffer much in the last battle, had rallied in the neighbourhood of Frankfort upon the Maine.

NOTWITHSTANDING these sources of encouragement, it must be owned their affairs were in a very melancholy situation. The elector of Saxony, far from bestirring himself for the common interest, employed his whole attention in obtaining an exclusive peace. The other confederates acted so coldly and so slowly, as to allow the Imperialists to penetrate into the heart of Germany, and hinder the junction of the allies; and those members of the league who were more remote, gave but little heed to the exhortations of the chancellor. To crown the misfortune, the troops began to clamour for their pay, which could not be raised; and the Austrians, passing the Rhine at Mentz, cantoned themselves in that neighbourhood, where they soon consumed all the forage and provisions.

IN this emergency their only support was the king of France, whose interest was certainly concerned in this affair: for had the Swedes been oppressed, the Imperialists would not have failed to invade that kingdom with all their forces. With a view therefore to render that monarch the more propitious, the Swedish chancellor put him in possession of Philipsburg, and earnestly solicited the marechal de la Force, to advance with his army, in order to facilitate the re-union and disposition of the Swedish troops which had been defeated and dispersed. At the same time ambassadors were sent into France, to induce the king, by the most pressing instances, to declare war against the emperor <sup>1</sup>.

THE rhingrave, who knew the condition of Alsace, proposed that Colmar and Schelestadt should likewise be ceded to the French, that he might draw from these places sixteen companies of infantry, and two troops of horse, which, when joined to his little army, would enable him to keep the field; and this scheme was actually put in execution, by an agreement between the Swedes and de la Force <sup>2</sup>; but death surprised the rhingrave, while he was employed in measures for putting Alsace in a posture of defence, and in him the Protestant party lost a very brave and fortunate general.

d IMMEDIATELY after this event, a treaty was concluded at Paris between France and Sweden; in consequence of which the whole province of Alsace was put as a deposit under the protection of his most Christian majesty, who engaged to maintain a considerable army on that side the Rhine, to advance money for the pay and accoutrements of the Swedish cavalry, and to break with the emperor, as soon as he should be assured that the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, with the princes and states of the Protestant league, would not conclude either treaty or truce with the common enemy, except in concert with him and his confederates <sup>3</sup>.

THIS convention being made, the king of France sent fresh troops into Alsace, with the marechal de Breze, to act in concert with de la Force; and these two generals posted ten thousand men in the mountains of Voge, to line the skirts of that province: but notwithstanding this precaution, the Lorrainers surprised the Swedish garrison at Tbau, though the marquis de la Force soon obliged them to retreat with the loss of their cannon. But this small dawn of success did not indemnify the French for the loss of Philipsburg, which Galas, general of the Imperial troops, took by surprise, and found in it a well-furnished magazine of cannon and ammunition, a prize of such importance, as even equalled a victory in the field <sup>m</sup>. He afterwards made himself master of Spire, in which he placed a strong garrison, under the command of the baron de Metternich: but notwithstanding the rigour of the winter season, the French marechals, with a reinforcement of the duke of Weymar's troops, invested the place, which was surrendered upon capitulation. The governor and principal officers were made prisoners, and the garrison enlisted under the banners of the duke of Weymar, who was created governor of the place, and, for his greater convenience, allowed to quarter his troops in Landau, Weissemburg, and Germerheim.

g By these precautions, Lower Alsace was secured, though the upper part of that province was very much harassed by the duke of Lorraine, who had passed the Rhine at Brisack, and threatened to take Strasbourg and Rhinfeld by surprise or assault. His schemes, however, were baffled by the vigilance and activity of the duke de Rohan, who compelled him three times to repass the Rhine, and took such measures as absolutely secured Upper Alsace from all his attempts. Hitherto France had only employed her arms for the defence of her allies, without having directly committed any acts of hostility upon the house of Austria: but now she had interested herself so far in the concerns of the Swedes and Protestants, that she waited for nothing but a pretence to declare openly against the emperor, and at this period a favourable opportunity occurred. This was no other than the violent seizure of Philip-Christopher de Soetern, elector of Triers, who was by the emperor and the infant Ferdinand committed prisoner to the castle of Teuves near Brussels, after they had taken possession of his city". Lewis loudly complained of this outrage offered to his ally, and ordered his resident at Brussels to demand of the infant-cardinal, the elector's liberty, and the restitution of his dominions: when he received for answer, that the cardinal could not comply with his desire, until he should have first of all consulted the court of Vienna. The king of France considered this as a refusal; and having other reasons to be disgusted at the Spaniards, who had in several articles infringed the peace of Verwins, he took the present opportunity of declaring war against Spain, by an herald sent to Brussels for that purpose. Yet he did not involve himself in such an important quarrel, before he had concluded an offensive and defensive league with the states-general of the United Provinces<sup>o</sup>; and sent Feuquieres to treat with the deputies of the circles of Suabia, Franconia, the Upper and Lower Rhine, who were assembled at Worms; where, after mature deliberation, they engaged to the most Christian king to act with all possible vigour for the interest of the common cause; and they intreated his majesty to take into his pay the army of the circles, consisting of seven thousand foot and four thousand horse, under the command of the duke of Weymar. b

ON the other hand, the court of Vienna still continued to negotiate with the elector of Saxony, who had some time ago resolved to effect an accommodation with the house of Austria. The deputies were actually assembled at Pirn in Misnia, together with those of George landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt; and the conferences spun out to a considerable length of time, by disputes touching the restitution of ecclesiastical effects and dignities, which had been seized by the Protestants. At length, after much altercation, they agreed to assemble at Prague, where the treaty was concluded, and signed on the thirtieth day of May; and the articles were to this effect: "That the mediate ecclesiastical benefices, or those which did not immediately depend upon the empire, and were seized before the pacification of Passau, should continue for ever the property of those Protestants who at present enjoyed them; and that for the space of forty years the Protestants should remain possessed of the immediate ecclesiastical benefices, of which they had made themselves masters before or after the said transaction at Passau, and actually enjoyed before the twelfth day of November, in the year one thousand six hundred and twenty-seven. That the exercise of the Catholic and Protestant religion should be freely permitted in all the dominions of the empire, except the kingdom of Bohemia and the provinces subject to the house of Austria. That the duke of Bavaria should be maintained in possession of the Palatinate, on condition of paying the jointure of Frederic's widow, and a proper subsistence for his son, whenever he should return to his duty. That there should be between the emperor and the confederates of the Augsburg confession, who would sign this treaty, a mutual restitution of every thing which had been taken on both sides since the irruption of Gustavus into the empire. That the duke of Lorraine should retrieve what he had lost; and if the king of France, or any other prince, should persist in retaining his fiefs, the house of Austria and the princes acceding to this treaty should join their forces to do him justice. That the fortres of Philipsburg should remain in the hands of the emperor, for the service of the Germanic body. And, finally, that the states subscribing the present treaty should enjoy a general amnesty<sup>p</sup>." c d

THIS is the substance of the peace of Prague, which was proposed as a sure expedient for re-uniting all the states of Germany, and was actually signed by William duke of Saxe-Weymar, the dukes of Lunenburg and Mecklenburg, the princes of Anhalt, the cities of Nuremberg, Ulm, Donawert, Frankfort upon the Maine, and some other states of the empire, won by the insinuations of the court of Vienna. In consequence of this accommodation, the archbishopric of Magdeburg, with the domains of Juesfurt, Guttembock, Trama, and Borgium, were restored to Augustus, son of the elector of Saxony, on condition that he should pay annually a certain sum to John-William marquis of Brandenburg. The dukes of Mecklenburg were re-established in their dominions: Wolfembuttel, Nienburg, and their dependencies, were given back to the duke of Lunenburg: Donawert had the promise of being reinstated in the enjoyment of its former liberty, as soon as it should have paid to the elector of Bavaria the expences of the war, as stipulated in the treaty. The hereditary pacts subsisting between the houses of Saxony, Brandenburg, and Hesse, were confirmed: his Imperial majesty engaged to withdraw his troops from the places belonging to those who should sign the treaty, and by a particular deed, ceded to the duke of Saxony the sovereignty of Upper and Lower Lusace. e f

<sup>a</sup> BY these measures the emperor thought he had placed such bounds to the power of the states in Germany, that they would never be able to oppose his authority for the future; but as this act was no other than a compulsive submission, which necessity obliged them to make, they did not think themselves bound to observe it when they recovered their strength; and accordingly in the treaties of Westphalia, concluded in the reign of Ferdinand the third, we find them insisting upon an alteration in several articles, and obtaining privileges which this emperor would never have granted.

THE town of Strasburg, dreading the resentment of France, excused itself from submitting to the peace of Prague; and, notwithstanding the menaces of the king of Hungary, determined to observe a neutrality until it should see to what side fortune would incline: but <sup>Strasburg refuses to sign the treaty, and Colmar receives a French garrison.</sup> <sup>b</sup> the regency of Colmar openly espoused the articles of Hailbron, and admitted a French garrison, after Lewis had obliged himself by treaty to maintain its privileges, on condition that the Catholics should enjoy the free exercise of their religion.

THE treaty of Prague would have certainly completed the destruction of the Swedish forces in Germany, if France had not made great efforts to support them. Lewis the thirteenth began to levy forces with great diligence, so as to compose several considerable armies; the first and greatest of which he sent into the Low Countries, under the marshals de Chatillon and Breze; the second marched into Lorraine with la Force; the third took the route of the Milanese, under the command of the marshal de Crequy; the duke de Rohan led the fourth into the Valtelline; and the fifth acted upon the Rhine, under the orders of the duke de Weymar. <sup>c</sup> mar, until the king should appoint another general (S).

THE emperor, in order to oppose the operations of the French, sent thither general Galas, at the head of a powerful army, with orders to join the duke of Lorraine, who intended to besiege Colmar, and had already made himself master of almost all the towns in the neighbourhood of that place; but the severity of the season, and the orders which John de Wert and Merci received to act on the other side of the Rhine, defeated the duke's projects, and obliged him to repass that river. In the month of May, however, he appeared at the head of twelve thousand men, with design to enter Burgundy, and march to Montbelliard, which he invested; but he was obliged to raise the siege on the approach of the duke de la Force, who fell upon him in his retreat, and defeated his rear: so that this check, and the fatigues <sup>d</sup> he underwent in retiring towards Besfort, reduced his army to four thousand men, and disabled him from attempting any new enterprize.

MEAN while Galas, the imperial general, fixed his head quarters at Worms, from whence he sent detachments to ravage the country, and surprise the towns that were garrisoned by the Swedes. Mentz was blocked up by the count de Mansfeld; and though the preservation of this place was of the utmost importance to the Swedes, by securing their communication with both sides of the Rhine, Bernard was in no condition to raise the blockade. He was still more interested in preserving Kaiser-Louter, where he had deposited all the booty he had taken since the beginning of the war; but this place, though defended with great obstinacy in several assaults, until the greatest part of the garrison fell in the breach, was at length taken by storm by the Imperialists, who put every soul to the sword, and indemnified themselves for the loss they had sustained, with the riches of the duke de Weymar. <sup>e</sup>

GALAS afterwards undertook the siege of Deux-ponts; but in the month of August, the cardinal de Valette, at the head of eighteen thousand French, entered Germany, and joining the duke of Weymar near Binghen, these two generals made themselves masters of this place, then marched to the relief of Mentz, which they revictualled, after having forced the lines of the count de Mansfeld (T); and lastly, compelled Galas to abandon the siege of Deux-ponts.

<sup>f</sup> THE French having no other obstacles to surmount, marched towards Frankfort, in order to prevent the regency from acceding to the treaty of Prague; but, failing in their attempt, they put a strong garrison in Saxenhausen, and returning encamped under the cannon of Mentz. While they remained in this situation, Galas having assembled an army of thirty thousand men in the neighbourhood of Worms, ordered the marquis de Gonzague to occupy Sarbruck, and several other places, so as to hinder all convoys from arriving in the camp of the allies; by which means they were reduced to such extremity, and provisions sold at such an excessive price, that the imperial soldiers went thither to sell bread, though at the hazard of their lives<sup>1</sup>. In this emergency the generals resolved to decamp, and leaving four thousand men in Mentz, repassed the Rhine at Binghen on a bridge of boats, as if their route had been to Coblentz. This step, however, was not taken until the duke de Weymar had ordered his cannon to be buried, and all his superfluous baggage to be burnt. As the intention of the confederates was to retire into the three bishoprics of Lorraine, they marched night and day without refreshment or repose, with a view to reach Vaudervange, where there was a French garrison. Galas, who had crossed the river at Worms, in order to pursue them in their retreat, overtook them with his cavalry on the river Glann, between Odernheim and Messenheim, where the French and Swedes facing about, repulsed the Imperialists. Galas, not at all discouraged by this check, put himself at the head of nine thousand horse, traversed the duchy of Deux-ponts, passed the Sarre, entered Lorraine, and waited for the allies in a defile between Vaudervange and Boulai, where a very obstinate engagement ensued, in which the imperial cavalry was routed. The French retired to Pont-a-Mousson, and the Swedes to Vie and Moyenvie, with the wreck of their armies, which were now greatly reduced. Mean while Galas, who was still at the head of a strong body, made himself master of Vaudervange, and encamped near Zagermunde, between the Sarre and the Wilde, that he might be at hand to join the duke of Lorraine.

DURING these transactions, the marquis de Saint Chaumont, who had been sent by the king of France into Germany, exerted himself with such address, as prevented several states of the empire from signing the peace of Prague. He made an agreement with the circles of Suabia, Franconia, and the Rhine, importing, that his most Christian majesty, over and above the sums payable to the confederates, should maintain on this side of the Rhine an army of twelve thousand men, to be joined by the troops belonging to the Protestant states, in order to subdue the cities on the other side of the Rhine as far as Constance, and reduce Alsace, with all the towns of that province, under the protection of France<sup>2</sup>.

IN the month of October the duke de Weymar, by his agent at Paris, concluded a treaty with cardinal Richelieu, in which it was stipulated, that, in consideration of a certain yearly sum, the duke should maintain an army of eighteen thousand men, which he should command in person, as general of the troops belonging to the German princes in alliance with the French king, to whom he should take the oath of allegiance: that Lewis should cede in his favour all his pretensions upon Alsace; and, in case of a treaty with the emperor, use all his influence to obtain for the duke the title of landgrave of that province, or some equivalent, and engage to indulge him for life with a pension of fifty thousand crowns, payable at the commencement of the peace<sup>3</sup>. This convention being ratified by the duke, who went to Paris for that purpose, and measures being taken with cardinal Richelieu for the ensuing campaign, he, in the beginning of summer, repaired to Lorraine, where his army was; and having surprised the castle of Hohenbaar, joined La Valette, in order to besiege Saverne, which the marquis de Grana had taken towards the end of the last year. They accordingly invested the place, which made a gallant defence, in hope of being relieved by Galas, who promised to march against the besiegers; but he halted at Drusenheim, perceiving that it would be impracticable to succour the town, which surrendered about the beginning of July<sup>4</sup>. Immediately after this conquest, the duke and the cardinal took measures for preventing an irruption into Franche-compte, which was threatened by the duke of Lorraine, the imperial general, and the Spaniards, who were already joined for that purpose, to the number of forty thousand men. The cardinal and the duke omitted nothing that could obstruct and harass them in their march; and their efforts were so successful, that Galas lost above seven thousand men before he entered Burgundy: nevertheless, he arrived at Mirabeau, and about the end of October undertook the siege of St. Jean de Laone, which he was fain to abandon, in consequence of the overflowing of the waters, and continual rains, which rendered the approaches to the place quite inaccessible. He therefore retired into Franche-compte, whither he was close followed by the viscount de Turenne and the count de Rantzau; and towards the end of November arrived at Besançon, after having lost above five thousand men, and the greatest part of his baggage, in this retreat.

WHILE the duke of Weymar carried on his operations in Franche-compte, general Bannier, whose army was augmented by twelve thousand Prussians, being ordered by Oxenstiern to attack the Saxons, surprised their quarters near Parkein in Mecklenburg, cut in pieces five regiments of horse, and took a number of officers, together with a great quantity of bag-

- a gage; so that the elector was fain to relinquish his camp, and go and join Maracini, who commanded the imperial troops in Pomerania<sup>2</sup>. He was, however, close pursued by the Swedes, who took Laubelsberg in sight of both armies, and gained several other considerable advantages over them while he encamped in their neighbourhood; but these small checks did not hinder the elector from besieging Magdeburg, after he was reinforced by a body of Austrian troops, commanded by Hasfeld. The place was defended with great resolution until the breach was practicable, and the horn-work actually taken by assault; when the garrison, despairing of relief, obtained an honourable capitulation, and were escorted to Werden, where Bannier lay encamped; while the regency took the oath of allegiance to the elector, who promised to maintain them in the enjoyment of their antient privileges<sup>3</sup>.
- b Elated with this success, the Saxon resolved to attack the Swedish army; but receiving intelligence that it was reinforced, he changed his design, and detached general Hasfeld, with a body of troops, to surprise Tangermunde, the territory of which was plundered with great barbarity.

and surprise & plunder Tangermunde.

- Being afterwards joined by Maracini, and a reinforcement under George duke of Lunenburg, he approached the Swedish camp, in order to provoke Bannier to a general action; but the two armies having faced one another for a long time, that general retired to the duchy of Mecklenburg, and encamped at Parkeim, whither he was followed by the Saxons, who intrenched themselves in a forest within a league of the enemy. While they continued in this situation, Maracini returned to the siege of Stargard, which he had before undertaken without success, and took it by assault, notwithstanding the vigorous defence of the Swedes, who lost a number of soldiers and officers on this occasion.

- The war between this nation and the house of Austria was likewise maintained with great spirit and obstinacy in Gerawerlend. The Swedes, under general Lesly, over-ran the country of Darmstadt; from whence, however, they were obliged to retire on the arrival of the marquis de Grana and general Goentz. Nevertheless, with the help of the Hessians their allies, they took Anneburg, belonging to the elector of Mentz, and besieged Stadberg, in the dominions of the archbishop of Cologne. On the other hand, the Austrian generals made themselves masters of Homburg, though they in vain attempted to subdue the citadel; and ravaged the whole country of Hesse-Cassel, except Zegenheim and the capital; while the landgrave, to revenge these outrages, joined Lesly, and, entering Westphalia, subdued Paderborn<sup>b</sup>.

- The Imperialists, commanded by the elector of Saxony and Hasfeld, and the Swedes under Bannier, were not long in the neighbourhood of each other, without coming to a general action. After having watched the motions of one another for some time, they halted at length in the plain of Wislock, where both were drawn up in order of battle. The imperial camp was upon an hill, fortified with fourteen redoubts, under which the army stood in battalia; and Bannier, being desirous of drawing them from this advantageous post, ordered part of his cavalry to advance and skirmish. At the approach of the Swedes, the Austrians changed their order; their infantry retiring upon the hill, being flanked on both sides by their cavalry, while the rear was closed up with waggons. Then Bannier ordered colonel Gun, who commanded the right wing, to march and attack the enemy; and he himself, at the head of five brigades, advanced to support him; while general Stalans with the left wing wheeled round the hill, in order to charge the Imperialists in flank. These attacks were performed with such fury, that almost all the Austrian and Saxon infantry were either slain or taken; and Stalans, who pursued their cavalry for three days, returned with a considerable number of prisoners: so that of twenty thousand men, that composed the imperial army, scarce three thousand escaped to Magdeburg. Five or six thousand men fell in the field, or in the flight; seven thousand were taken; and three or four thousand, having dispersed themselves, would never engage again in the service: as for the elector of Saxony, he escaped by the way of Mecklenburg to Leipsick. In this battle, which was fought on the fourth day of October, the Swedes gained a considerable booty, over and above thirty pieces of cannon and eighteen thousand waggons, the greatest part of which were loaded with provision, ammunition, and baggage. The fortress of Werben opened its gates to the conquerors, and the garrison, consisting of two thousand men, enlisted in the service of Sweden<sup>c</sup>.

The elector of Saxony and general Hasfeld are defeated by the Swedes in the plain of Wislock.

While the Austrian generals thus prosecuted the war in Saxony, Westphalia, Hesse, and Alsace, the emperor, in person, held a diet in Ratisbon, which was opened on the fifteenth day of August, and at which were present the electors of Mentz, Cologne, and Bavaria, with the deputies of Saxony and Brandenburg: as for the elector of Triers, he was still detained a prisoner. Ferdinand's chief aim in this assembly being to secure the imperial throne to his son, he sent four articles to the diet, as the subject of its deliberations, importing, that as he was now well stricken in years, and felt his strength sensibly decay, he wished they <sup>a</sup> would proceed to the election of a new king of the Romans; that they would determine the fate of the elector of Triers; that they would take measures for a vigorous continuation of the war, in order to re-establish the peace of the empire; and that, as the states of Germany were not present at this meeting, they would consider whether or not it would be necessary to convoke a general diet next year at Nuremberg.

ALTHOUGH the emperor had secured the suffrages of Bavaria, Saxony, Brandenburg, Bohemia, and Mentz, and signified that they should begin with the election, and postpone the pacification of the empire to another assembly, the deputies of the Protestant electors refused to proceed to the election, until the emperor should promise to give peace to Germany, as soon as it should be in his power: and they even wanted to stipulate, that, notwithstanding Ferdinand's being chosen king of the Romans, he should not be crowned before that desirable event. <sup>b</sup> It was in consequence of these remonstrances that the emperor summoned an assembly at Cologne, in order to deliberate upon the preliminaries; and actually nominated his commissaries for that purpose, while the Catholic electors, princes, and states, promised to send thither their deputies to facilitate the work. At the same time he called another assembly at Hamburg, where the Protestants and their allies might freely revolve and debate upon the same subject; on condition that neither convention should come to any conclusion, without having first communicated their resolution to the other: for, should this correspondence fail, he would not ratify their transactions <sup>d</sup>.

THESE points being settled, Ferdinand king of Hungary was elected king of the Romans <sup>c</sup> on the twelfth day of December, and crowned on the twentieth of the same month, together with his wife Maria, the infanta of Spain<sup>e</sup>. But this new dignity was not immediately acknowledged by all the princes of Germany and foreign powers: the king of France, in particular, maintained, that an election performed without the concurrence of the elector of Triers, against whom no criminal process had been instituted, was contrary to the Golden Bull and the fundamental laws of the empire. Nevertheless, it was in a little time received and held as good and lawful through every part of Germany.

king of England demands the re-establishment of the count-palatine, who publishes a manifesto against the emperor.

CHARLES the first, king of England, had sent the earl of Arundel as his ambassador to the emperor, with pressing solicitations in favour of his nephew, Lewis count palatine; but this affair being referred to the future assembly at Cologne, the earl returned to London, <sup>d</sup> and Charles resolved to go more politically to work. He was persuaded, that the house of Austria eagerly longed to wrest Lorraine from the king of France, and was extremely apprehensive of England's engaging in a league with his most Christian majesty and the states-general of the United Provinces. In this conviction, he sent the earl of Leicester to the court of Vienna, with orders to threaten the emperor with this projected alliance, in case he should still refuse to do justice to the young count-palatine; but he was still amused with general promises, because indeed Ferdinand saw it would be impracticable to satisfy both the palatine and the duke of Bavaria. Charles-Lewis published a manifesto and protestation dated at London; the first containing an ample refutation of the proceedings against Frederic king of Bohemia; and the other implying a juridical act and protest against every <sup>e</sup> step which had been taken to the prejudice of that prince and his family, as well as against the election of the king of the Romans, to which he ought to have been called as an elector <sup>f</sup>.

The death of Ferdinand II.

IN all probability these papers were never seen by Ferdinand the second, who, after a troublesome reign of eighteen years, died at Vienna on the fifteenth day of February, in the fiftieth and ninth year of his age <sup>g</sup>. Notwithstanding the eulogiums which have been so lavishly bestowed upon this prince by Roman Catholic historians, he seems to have been born for the misfortune of his country; as it cannot be denied that the empire was involved in all the calamities of civil war by his pride, ambition, and bigotted attachment to the religion of Rome, which indeed seems to have been the only distinguishing part of his character (U). <sup>f</sup> In other respects his personal talents were mean and contemptible; and all

(U) At the age of twenty, Ferdinand made a vow before the image of the Virgin at Loretto, to drive the Protestants from Styria, Carinthia, and Carniola, at the hazard of his life. He afterwards, when turned of forty, repeated this vow at Marienzell, against the Protestants of Bohemia and the depending provinces. About eight years before his death, he took a solemn oath to protect the Roman Catholic religion, and invited his prime minister to lay himself under the same obligation. All these vows he performed with the utmost zeal, by which he acquired the appellation of the apostolic emperor. He married first Anne-Maria, daughter of William duke of Bavaria; and afterwards Leonora, daughter of Vincent duke of Mantua, by whom he had no children. By the first, however, he had six, four of whom survived him; namely, Ferdinand the third, his successor; Leopold William, who was bishop of Passau, Strasbourg, Halberstadt, Olmütz, and Breslau, grand-master of the Teutonic order, and afterwards governor of the Low-Countries; Mary-Ann, wife of Maximilian duke of Bavaria; and Cecilia-Renée, married to Uladislaus king of Poland.

THE death of Ferdinand was soon followed by that of George Bogislaus, duke of Pomerania, the last prince of that family, which had subsisted about seven hundred years successively in the male line; so that the duchy devolved to the elector of Brandenburg, by virtue of a treaty in force between the two houses: but the Swedes having, before the duke's decease, made themselves masters of the greatest part of Pomerania, he could not enjoy it on account of the war, and his pretensions were not regulated until the treaties of Westphalia took place<sup>h</sup>.

b F E R D I N A N D III.

WAR had desolated Germany during the whole reign of Ferdinand the second, whereas that of his successor was mostly consumed in intrigue and negotiation.

Ferdinand III. ascends the imperial throne.

THE conferences at Hamburg were productive of no solid consequence, as neither the French, Swedes, nor Dutch, would send deputies thither; for they firmly believed that nothing could be determined without the consent of the Catholic league; and, in the mean time, both sides made vigorous preparations for continuing the war.

c AT the solicitation of the archbishops of Mentz and Cologne, who were incommoded by the neighbourhood of a French garrison, John de Wert invested Hermenstein, upon which the Imperialists had more than once made fruitless attempts; and Saludie, who commanded in the place, took all the necessary precautions of holding out as long as possible, that the duke of Saxe-Weymar might have time to march to his relief: but this general being otherwise employed by cardinal Richelieu, who was this year obliged to neglect the affairs of Germany, in some measure, in order to oppose the Spaniards; and William landgrave of Hesse-Cassel being kept in awe by the marquis de Grana, so that he durst not abandon his own dominions; for these reasons, I say, Saludie, despairing of succour, and being reduced to great extremity, demanded a capitulation. It was agreed, that the elector of Cologne should be put in possession of the place, and keep it until the archbishop of Triers should be set at liberty; and that the French garrison should be conducted to Orsoy, a town belonging to the states-general.

d DURING this transaction, the duke of Weymar advanced into Franche-compte: and the passage of the Saone being disputed by the duke of Lorraine, who had detached Merci with his whole cavalry on that service, Weymar gave him battle on the thirteenth day of June, put him to flight, after having slain eight hundred of his men, and took one thousand prisoners, with twice the number of horses, and the whole baggage and standards of the detachment. Merci, having rallied his troops, was resolved to retrieve his honour in another action; when the rhingrave John-Philip falling upon him, cut in pieces one half of his forces, and pursued the rest as far as Vezoul<sup>i</sup>.

e AFTER this action, duke Bernard reduced the castle of Leure, entered Alsace, and, building a bridge of boats, passed the Rhine about six leagues above Straßburg. Then he ordered Schoembeck to take possession of a large island in that river, opposite to Rhinaw, and raise a kind of fort for the security of his men: there he was attacked by general de Wert, who nevertheless abandoned his enterprize, finding that this body had received a considerable reinforcement. Though the duke was now master of the banks of the Rhine, which he passed on a bridge of boats, and encamped between that river and the Eltz, a whole month elapsed without his being able to make any considerable progress, because de Wert would never risque a general action; and then, understanding that the duke of Lorraine had entered Alsace, and that the Bavarian army was reinforced by the duke de Savelli, he resolved to repass the Rhine: but, in order to preserve his bridge, he raised several forts in the island of Weittenweyer, where he left colonel Manicamp and the French troops, whom, after his departure, de Wert intirely defeated, and compelled to surrender at discretion. This check, however, was not of consequence enough to disconcert the duke of Weymar, who was about this time much more embarrassed by the death of his friend William landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, who had actually formed the design of re-establishing the Palatine family, by means of the league between France, Sweden, and the United Provinces: he had repaired to Holland, in order to engage the states-general in the interests of the young elector; and, having finished his negotiation, set out from the Hague for Vesel, where he signed a treaty of confederation with Saint Chaumont, minister of France. But he was seized with a fever at Leer near Embsen, where he died, to the infinite regret of the Protestants, who in him lost their firmest support and most zealous defender<sup>k</sup>.

Weymar defeats the Im-

THE duke of Weymar was sensibly afflicted by his death, which he was afraid would discourage the Protestants that were attached to the family of Hesse; but by his singular address he soon confirmed those that began to waver; and, without staying till the winter should be past, quitted his quarters about the latter end of January, in order to take advantage of the enemy's inaction. Having loaded a waggon with two fishing-boats, he marched to Stein, a little town at a league's distance from Basil, and, crossing the Rhine with some troops, attacked and reduced Seckingen, one of the forest-towns: then he detached colonel Schoembech with a part of the army towards Lauffemburg, which made no resistance: Waldshut submitted; and Rhinfeld being now the only forest-town that remained untaken<sup>1</sup>, the duke resolved to besiege it in form. It was accordingly invested; and the trenches being opened on the seventh day of February, the works were carried on with such vigour, that it was supposed the place could not long hold out: nevertheless, it was so resolutely defended by the governor, that the Imperialists had time to come to its relief. Savelli quitted Besançon, and, being joined by John de Wert, appeared before Rhinfeld on the twenty-eighth day of February, with nine regiments of cavalry, two of Croats, and about four thousand infantry. Both armies were immediately ranged in order of battle, when the duke de Weymar's right wing fell with such fury upon the left of the enemy, commanded by de Wert, that it was broke in a very little time, the general being wounded in the cheek, and colonel Wolf, with some imperial officers, taken prisoners. Weymar's left wing did not meet with the same success; but, on the contrary, was at first repulsed: however, he rallied his cavalry, and returned to the charge; but the enemy retired in good order by favour of the night. The rhingrave Philip was slain in the action, and the duke de Roban died in a little time of the wounds he received upon this occasion. Weymar retreated to Lauffemburg, where he passed the night; and next day, having joined Tapadel, he put his army in order of battle, and advanced to attack the duke de Savelli and John de Wert, whose troops, being dispersed among the villages in search of provision, were with great difficulty re-assembled: they could not withstand the shock of this second engagement, but were intirely defeated, the two generals themselves being taken, together with a great number of officers<sup>m</sup>.

AFTER this victory, Hunningen submitted to Tapadel, and the duke returned to the siege of Rhinfeld, which, after having made a gallant defence, surrendered upon a very honourable capitulation; and the conqueror found a great quantity of provision and ammunition in the place. This conquest was followed by that of Newburg and Rottelen; immediately after which the duke advanced towards Friburg, the capital of Brisgaw, garrisoned by nine hundred men, under the command of colonel Escher, who defended the town until a breach was made, and an assault given, and then evacuated the place upon very favourable terms<sup>n</sup>.

renders, after an obstinate defence.

THE next siege he undertook was that of Brisack, in which the duke of Lorrain and general Goetz attempted to interrupt him by attacking his intrenchments, but they always found him upon his guard; and the town was at last obliged to surrender, after having been reduced to such extremity of famine, that the governor was obliged to set a guard upon the burying places, to prevent the inhabitants from digging up and devouring the dead. The news of this important success no sooner arrived at Paris, than Lewis XIII. dispatched one of his gentlemen, on pretence of congratulating Weymar, but in reality, to communicate private instructions to Guébriant, who was ordered to employ his whole address, in order to induce the duke to cede Brisack to the crown of France. This could not but be a very difficult negotiation, as Weymar had set his heart upon the county of Brisgaw, which he meant to keep in his own possession, as a thorn in the side of the house of Austria, which had divested John-Frederic, his great grandfather, of his dominions and dignity. He thought the conquest of Brisack would secure Brisgaw, of which he intended to make a settlement that should not be easily shaken, Brisack being situated between Strasburg, Benfeld, and Basil, in the neighbourhood of France, and the princes of Germany, who were his allies; so that he could not be attacked from behind, and would, with the assistance of his friends, be able to counteract the designs of the emperor in Germany. In a word, he had now re-established his family, and believed himself equal to the elector of Saxony, against whom he entertained such resentment, that he resolved to strip him of his dominions, and with that view had, for a long time, formed a scheme upon Thuringia.

ON the other hand, Lewis wished to be master of Brisack, the possession of which would secure to him a passage to the other side of the Rhine, and at the same time exclude the Imperialists from Alsace and Lorrain. He therefore spared no pains to obtain it from the duke de Weymar, to whom Guébriant made very advantageous proposals on the a subject : to which he answered, that, after he should have put his troops in good winter quarters in Franché-compte, he would go, and, in person, pay his respects to the king, whose orders he should receive touching Brisack, as well as the operations of the ensuing campaign. This, however, was a mere evasion ; for when he was afterwards pressed by Guébriant to explain his intentions on this head, he replied, “ To part with my conquest “ would be to sacrifice my honour.” Nevertheless, in order to amuse the court of France, he sent thither Erlach with a limited power of negotiation, who managed his master’s interest with such dexterity, that Lewis promised to furnish the duke with a reinforcement of eight thousand men, although nothing was concluded in the affair of Brisack <sup>a</sup> (X).

b WHILE the duke de Weymar triumphed over the Austrians in Alsace, the Swedish general Bannier carried on his conquests in Pomerania. After the victory obtained at Wistock, he reduced Gartz, Loßz, Demmin, and Wolgast ; and, understanding that Galas had extended his army, sent Stalans and *Torsten*son to reconnoitre with a detachment, that surprised and cut in pieces two regiments of their horse. Bannier reduces several places in Pomerania.

c CHARLES-LEWIS, prince palatine, and his brother Robert, were not so fortunate in Westphalia : they had several times attacked the Spanish garrison of Gueldre with various success ; and all their motions were narrowly watched by the count de Hasfeld, the emperor’s lieutenant-general in Westphalia, who having discovered that Charles Lewis had abandoned the village of Embsburen, in order to besiege Lemgau, the capital of the county of Lippe, assembled all his troops, with a view to frustrate his design. Accordingly prince Lewis, finding himself in no condition to defend his lines against such an army, retreated towards Minden ; but the count having overtaken his rear in the valley of Aßheim, brought him to an action, which continued very obstinate on both sides for the space of two hours, and then victory declared in favour of the Imperialists, who made themselves masters of the palatine’s artillery. Prince Robert, and the count de Ferents, were made prisoners, with a great number of officers, and Charles-Lewis escaped with great difficulty to Minden <sup>c</sup>.

d IN the beginning of the year, Thau was invested by Guébriant ; but as the siege did not advance to the satisfaction of the duke de Weymar, he went thither in person, and ordered it to be battered with red-hot balls, which threw the inhabitants into such consternation, that they surrendered without further opposition, and the duke’s character became so formidable to the emperor, that about this time he made some underhand attempts to engage him in his interest. Sigismund Huesner was the person intrusted with this negotiation ; but the duke would not listen to the proposals of Ferdinand, persuaded that he neither could with safety or honour depend upon the bare promises of his greatest enemy : he, therefore, far from allowing himself to be intrapped in the snare, or slackening in his operations, redoubled his industry in making preparations for passing the Rhine : however, in the midst of these occupations, he fell sick at Hunningen, from whence he was transported by water to Newburg, where, his distemper gaining ground, he made his will, which was put into the hands of his secretary Relingen, and died on the eighteenth day of July, in the thirty and fifth year of his age <sup>d</sup> (Y). By his will he ordained, that his conquests should be enjoyed by the eldest of his brothers ; but in case none of them should chuse to take possession, they should devolve to Lewis XIII. on condition that the garrison should consist of an equal number of French and Germans, and that the places of strength should be restored to the empire at the general peace. He bequeathed the command of his army to major-general d’Erlach, and in his default, to colonel Obem and count Nassau, or the eldest colonel in succession : and he left legacies to his officers and domestics, to the amount of three hundred thousand crowns <sup>e</sup>.

f THE duke’s death was no sooner known, than the Swedish agent at Bensfeld endeavoured to engage the soldiers and officers to go and join Bannier : the emperor took every measure in his power to draw them into his service, and regain possession of the places they had conquered : the dukes of Bavaria, Lauenburg, and Lunenbourg, pretended to the succession ; and William of Saxony demanded, by virtue of his brother’s will, that he should possess the conquered places till the peace ; but Lewis XIII. prevailed over all these pretenders, by concluding, at Brisack, a treaty with the Weymarian officers on the following terms : That the troops of the duke de Weymar should constitute a separate body, under the direction <sup>f</sup> A treaty is concluded between the king of France and the Weymarian forces.

(X) It was believed in France and Germany, that cardinal de Richelieu had, by means of a round sum, obtained a promise of Erlach, that in case the duke de Weymar should die, he would deliver up Brisack to France (1).

(Y) The death of this gallant prince is said to have been hastened by the French, who longed to be in possession of Brisack, to such a degree, that by their agents they administered a certain soup to the duke, in consequence of which he expired (2).

of the officers named in the will for that purpose; that the king of France should keep a this body always effective, by the payment of a certain yearly sum for raising recruits; that he should continue to the general officers the same appointments which they had received from the duke, furnish them with bread, ammunition, and all other necessaries of war, and ratify all the donations which the duke had made to his officers and soldiers: that the troops should receive their orders from the duke de Longueville, by the medium of their own directors, who should be summoned to all councils held for the service of the common cause: that the conquered places should be put into the hands of his most Christian majesty, who might at pleasure appoint governors for Brisack and Friburg, to command the garrisons which should consist equally of French and Germans; but with regard to other places, the governors should be chosen from the Weymarian army, and b all the officers and garrisons bind themselves by oath, to preserve the places for the service of the king, without whose express order they should not be delivered to any person or power whatever *.

IN consequence of this treaty the duke de Longueville was acknowledged general, and a resolution taken to march towards the Lower Palatinate. The count de Guébriant put Brisack, Friburg, and the forest towns, in a proper posture of defence. John-Lewis d'Erlach was continued in the government of Brisack; colonel Kanoski, a Pole, had that of Friburg; and Philip Bernold, a gentleman of Alsace, was invested with the command of Rhinfeld. Thus ended this important negotiation, which rendered the king of France sovereign of almost all Alsace, and a great part of Brisgau. c

MEAN while conferences were held at Hamburg, to pave the way for a general peace; but the powers who sent their ministers thither seemed to despise and distrust one another. France fell out with the count-palatine about the ceremonial of addressing letters to each other; or, rather, Lewis made a pretence of the young count's having failed in some expression of respect, to act coldly in his interest. There was likewise a grudge between the French and English nations, which rendered them averse to the conclusion of a treaty; and the Dutch, who were ill effected to both, openly refused to renounce the neutrality which they had agreed with the emperor to observe v.

BESIDES the contending parties in the empire, there was a third which remained neuter, composed of the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, some princes and free cities, the hanse-towns, d and other states, which had some grievance to be redressed. William landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, had left the administration of his dominions, and the tutorage of his children, to his widow Amelia, whom, in his will, he recommended to the kings of France and England, and the states-general, in full persuasion that George, landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, who was his declared enemy, as well as a zealous partizan of the emperor, would take advantage of the troubles that distracted Germany, in order to enrich himself with the spoils of his children. Nor was he mistaken in this conjecture, inasmuch as George did not fail to avail himself of an act, by which Ferdinand II. had put William to the ban of the empire; and although this decree had never been published, he obtained of the present emperor letters patent, establishing him administrator of Lower Hesse. Nevertheless, the discreet e princess managed the inhabitants of Cassel, and the other towns, with such prudence, that they excused themselves from obeying the repeated orders of the emperor. Though she was not in a condition to withstand the Imperialists and Bavarians, she gained time by a truce, and afterwards by a treaty of peace, effected by the mediation of the elector of Mentz; which treaty, however, she refused to ratify, unless the emperor would grant the free exercise of the Protestant religion through all the dominions of the empire. This demand being, according to her expectation, refused, she renounced the other articles, and threw herself into the arms of France, by which she could be enabled to support the war to advantage z. By her agreement with France, concluded at Dorsten, she engaged to maintain a body of horse and foot to act against the common enemies of the empire; f to cede no part of the conquests she should make, or come to any accommodation with the king of Hungary, or his allies, without the consent and approbation of his most Christian majesty, who, in consideration of these engagements, promised to supply her with the yearly sum of two hundred thousand rixdollars; to make no truce or treaty with the king of Hungary, or his allies, without comprehending the landgrave and his interests; to engage the states-general to admit her into their alliance; to continue to her son the pension which had been granted to his father; and finally, to guarantee, for the space of ten years after the re-establishment of peace, all the dominions of the landgrave.

THESE different negotiations did not disturb the house of Austria so much as did the progress of Bannier in Saxony and Bohemia. In the beginning of February this general had g passed the Elbe with eighteen thousand men, though his military chest was quite empty:

a nevertheless he was cheerfully followed by his soldiers, who knew he would provide for all their necessities. Accordingly he obliged the duke of Lunenburg to furnish the troops with every thing they wanted. Colonel Ulric Wrangle, who had quitted the Swedish service, and entered that of the emperor, now surrendered the town of Carlsben, rejoined his own countrymen with eight hundred horse and three hundred musketeers, and supplied them with plenty of provisions: Halberstadt purchased their forbearance with a large sum of money; and Augustus of Saxony, archbishop of Magdeburg, expected to buy the same favour at the same price: but Bannier gave his deputies to understand, that the archbishop's father, the elector of Saxony, having abandoned the party of the Swedes, he could not help looking upon him as an enemy; he therefore would order his vanguard to march towards Thuringia, in order to lay that country under contribution, and open their route to Magdeburg and Leipsick. His army being now considerably augmented by recruits, he detached general King into Westphalia with five thousand men, to interrupt the levies of the Imperialists in that province, and carry off the provisions which were amassed for the use of the Austrian troops, who possessed part of the duchies of Juliers and Cleves. Bannier himself, entering Misnia at the head of five and twenty thousand men, reduced Kemnitz, Scheneberg, Hanneberg, and Marienberg, without having met with the smallest opposition; but the siege of Frieberg in some measure checked the rapidity of his conquests. Colonel Hungar, who commanded the garrison, made several successful sallies; and at length Bannier, having received information that the Saxons were coming to the relief of the place, quitted the siege, and advanced to give them battle.

MARACINI, the Saxon general, no sooner perceived his design than he crossed the river Wezevita, and divided his cavalry into squadrons, with which he charged, routed, and pursued Bannier's vanguard, even to the main body of their army. However, the Swedish troops were soon rallied, so as to repulse Maracini; and, advancing into a plain, attacked the Saxons, who had by this time retired into a very advantageous situation, flanked by a wood, in which they planted their artillery: after a very obstinate and bloody engagement they were put in disorder, routed, and pursued to the very gates of Dresden, which the victorious Swedes would certainly have entered, had not they been prevented by the approach of night. They therefore contented themselves with the honour, and other advantages they had acquired by the battle, in which four thousand Saxons were slain, and almost all their officers killed or taken. This defeat, however, did not so much discourage Maracini but that he assembled a fresh army, in order to make another effort in favour of Frieberg; to the siege of which Bannier had returned after his victory, and even given an assault, in which he sustained great loss. Hearing of Maracini's second approach, he sent major-general Pfuehl to reconnoitre; but he chancing to take the wrong road, the Saxons suddenly appeared, to the number of eighteen thousand; so that Bannier had scarce time to retire to an eminence, where he intrenched himself, while the enemy threw into Frieberg a reinforcement of men, provisions, and ammunition. The Swedish general sent orders to Torstenfon to join him with all possible dispatch; and being informed that Maracini waited for a reinforcement of six thousand Croats, and that general Hasfeld was upon his march to hem in the Swedes on all hands, he resolved to try the fortune of another battle, and attack Maracini in his lines. With this design he departed from Zeitz on the thirteenth day of April; and receiving intimation that the Saxons had abandoned their lines, he followed them with great expedition, and pursued their rear to the main body of their army, which being inaccessible, except by a narrow passage between two morasses, he ordered Pfuehl to dismount his dragoons, and attack it on foot. This service being performed, the Swedes were drawn up in order of battle as they arrived; and Bannier, at the head of his own regiment, charging the left wing of the enemy, a furious contest ensued, and the issue continued long doubtful, until Torstenfon arriving with his horse, determined the victory in favour of the Swedes; for the left wing of the Saxons giving way, the right was overwhelmed with such consternation, that the greatest part of it laid down their arms without fighting, and their whole army was pursued with great slaughter. Above two thousand were slain in the action; by which Bannier, whose loss did not exceed four hundred, made himself master of five and forty pair of colours, sixty standards, together with all their cannon, baggage, and ammunition.

By this victory Thuringia, Weteravia, Saxony, Misnia, and the neighbouring provinces, were left under the dominion of the Swedes: for the wreck of the Saxon army was destroyed by major-general Pfuehl, who, falling suddenly upon a body of troops rallied by Maracini near Kemnitz, cut them in pieces, and took their general prisoner. Torstenfon was ordered to renew the siege of Frieberg; but, perceiving the breaches were well repaired, he contented himself with blocking up the place, and went to join the Swedish army, which by this time had reduced Pirna.

WHILE Bannier and his generals thus filled Saxony and Bohemia with terror and dismay, a general Koningsmarck acted the same part in Franconia; and Axel-Cili made great progress in Mecklenburg and Brandenburg, where many places surrendered without opposition, and a good number secured themselves from the tempest by demanding a neutrality. As for the circle of Lower Saxony, and the hans-towns, they promised to the regency of Sweden, that they would neither furnish the emperor or his allies with troops or money.

Hasfeld surprised Marienberg, but is obliged to retire by Bannier,

HASFELD, the imperial general, taking the advantage of Bannier's being at a distance, surprised Marienberg, blocked up Kemnitz, and marched towards Pirna, in order to make himself master of that place. Bannier, being apprised of these motions, quitted Brandeck, where he was encamped, and passing the Elbe, seemed to have a design upon Prague; but all of a sudden he turned towards Misnia, in order to meet Hasfeld, and relieve the towns b that were threatened by that general. He accordingly drove the Creats, who blocked up Kemnitz, under the cannon of Dresden: then marched towards Pirn, in quest of the elector of Brandenburg, who had joined Hasfeld; but they did not think proper to hazard a battle against such victorious troops; so that all he could do was to harass them in their retreat. He afterwards re-entered Bohemia, with intent to attack the Imperialists, who were encamped upon the White Mountain, at some distance from Prague; but they wisely retired into the town, and the Swedes undertook the siege of Konigsaal, in which they succeeded without much difficulty b.

THE emperor, finding his arms ineffectual to stop the progress of Bannier, had recourse to other arts, by which that general had like to have been amused to his own destruction. c His wife, who had a great ascendancy over him, was tampered with by the count de Schlitt, president of the council of war in Bohemia, to whom she was allied; and she listened to his instigations so far as to dispose her husband to a pacification with the house of Austria, in whose name the count promised, that Bannier should be created a prince of the empire, and be gratified with the possession of two duchies in Silesia. These splendid offers actually began to dazzle the eyes of the Swede, who could not think of neglecting so glorious an opportunity of putting an end to his fatigues: the negotiation was begun by a physician of Prague, whom Schlitt sent on pretence of visiting the marechal's lady, who was indisposed; and proceeded so far, that Beauregard, the French minister, who attended Bannier, got an inkling of the design, which he immediately communicated to the count d'Avaux at Ham- d burgh, who exerted himself with such address on this occasion, that the council of Stockholm would not invest Bannier with the full powers which he demanded.

FRANCE was very much alarmed at this secret correspondence between the Imperialists and the Swedish general, and took every measure she could devise to break off the negotiation, which was no other than a political stratagem of the imperial court to amuse Bannier until the arrival of Picolomini, who was ordered to march from the Low Countries with an army to retrieve the Austrian affairs in Bohemia. The scheme succeeded to their wish; for the marechal was not undeceived until he saw the archduke Leopold arrive in Prague, with a body of five thousand men, which were soon followed by general Picolomini at the head of another, consisting of twelve thousand. e

THE departure of this officer left the duke de Longueville at liberty to advance along the Rhine, and reduce Altzey, Oppenheim, Bingen, and Creutznach. Indeed the Bavarian army, which had thrown itself into the Rhinegau, hindered him at first from extending his quarters; but, for want of provisions, it was soon constrained to retire into Wurtemberg, so that all this side of the Rhine was left to the discretion of the Weymarian troops. However, as this country could not long furnish them with subsistence, the duke assembled the chiefs at Creutznach, in order to deliberate upon their next motion. Here it was determined to cross the Rhine; and this enterprize being effected by the conduct and invention of the count f de Guébriant, they found very good quarters in Weteravia, and High Hesse.

A. D. 1640. Charles-Lewis, count-palatine, pretends to the succession of the duke de Weymar.

AMONG the other pretenders to the succession of the duke de Weymar, Charles-Lewis, prince-palatine, was strongly recommended by the prince of Orange, the states-general, and the king of England; and this last was so impolitic as to suppose, that France would concur in supporting his pretensions. With this opinion he spoke to Bellievre, the French ambassador at the British court, in order to procure a safe-conduct for the Palatine, that he might pass through France, and wait upon Lewis in person, before he should set out for the Rhine a. But this project was not at all relished by cardinal Richelieu, who deferred the grant of this passport so long, that Charles-Lewis, in the impatience of youth, resolved to go incognito; and actually arrived at Paris, from whence he set out for the Weymarian army. The cardinal, being perfectly aware of all his motions, allowed him to advance into the heart of the kingdom: then he was arrested at Moulins in the Bourbonnois, and carried prisoner to the castle of Vincennes; and his two brothers, who learned their exercises at Paris, were secured g a at the same time. The count, for some time, refused to own his rank and quality; and this refusal furnished the cardinal with a pretence for saying, that France had good reason to suspect he was engaged in some enterprize to her prejudice; while Lewis XIII. who was at that time absent from his capital, gave out, that this arrest was executed without his order; in consequence of the sage precaution of the ministers whom he had left at Paris.

His detention was no sooner known, than the kings of England and Denmark, together with the young queen of Sweden, interested themselves in his cause, and solicited his release in the most pressing terms; and, in consequence of their repeated requests and remonstrances, he was set at liberty, though not before he had entered into an engagement, by which he was restricted from making any attempt to put himself at the head of the Weymarian troops, and from embarking in any enterprize to the prejudice of France.

b GENERAL Bannier having received a reinforcement of troops from Thuringia, marched towards Picolomini, in order to give him battle; but he avoided an encounter, and abandoning the passages of the Elb which he occupied, retired to Heneberg; where he learned, that the Imperialists were on their march to Egra, that they might be at hand to succour the Bavarians, in case of necessity. Bannier took the opportunity of this conjuncture to demand of the duke de Longueville the junction of the two armies, threatening, in case of a refusal, to consult his own safety for the future, and to think no more of acting in concert with the French.<sup>c</sup> Understanding that the Bavarians were advanced to the frontiers of Franconia and Voigtland, in their approach to the Imperialists, he resolved to compel the c dukes of Brunswick and Lunenburg to renounce their neutrality, and detached a colonel, with orders to declare to them, that the only expedient for removing the Imperialists from their neighbourhood, would be to follow the example of the landgraves of Hesse, and join the crowns of Sweden and France. This remonstrance had weight with duke George, who, in the name of the whole Brunswick house, concluded a treaty with the Swedish general, by which he obliged himself to furnish three thousand foot, and five hundred horse<sup>e</sup>; which, with the troops of Hesse, marched to the duke of Longueville: and these three bodies having joined the Swedish army, Bannier advanced to Saltzfed, where Picolomini was posted; but the Imperialists were so advantageously encamped, that it was impossible to attack them with any prospect of success: so that, after the two armies had remained in sight of one another for the space of six weeks, the confederates began to be in want of provisions, and decamped.

d Having passed through Franconia, they marched to Neustadt, and chose a situation near the river Virra, in the country of Hesse-Cassel, whither they were followed by Picolomini. Here they were strengthened by a reinforcement from the duke of Lunenburg; in consequence of which they marched up to the Imperialists, but found them so strongly intrenched, that they would not venture to attack them<sup>e</sup>. Then they retired to Hoker upon the Weser, with a view to put their troops into winter-quarters in Franconia, and upon the Danube. Picolomini likewise decamped, and took the road to Westphalia, with design to throw a bridge over the Weser, and enter the dominions of Brunswick; but this project was disconcerted by the diligence of Bannier. This was the fourth time that the confederates had been in fight e of the whole imperial forces, without engaging in a general battle: nevertheless both armies were miserably reduced; for the scarcity of provisions, and the fatigue of marches and encampments, produced such mortality, that the number of the Imperialists was diminished by nine thousand; and the Swedes, who died, were pretty much in the same proportion to their army: but whatever the loss might be on either side this campaign, it was certainly very glorious to Picolomini, who not only obliged Bannier to quit the hereditary countries of the house of Austria, but also drove the confederates from Franconia, and reduced them to the necessity of defending the dominions of their allies, instead of forming enterprizes, as usual, against the army of the emperor<sup>h</sup> (Z).

f MEAN while the electors had assembled at Nuremberg, in order to deliberate upon the means for restoring peace to the empire, or for continuing the war, in case they should not be able to reconcile the interests of the princes. Here the deputies of Lunenburg complained of the injustice that was done to their master, in obliging him to withdraw the protection he had granted to the town of Hildesheim; and this grievance, together with the pretensions of the elector of Brandenburg to Pomerania, were examined, and referred to the diet of Ratisbon, which the emperor had convoked for the month of September. As no effectual steps could be taken towards a general peace, without the consent of the powers which were at war, a proposal was made to invite their plenipotentiaries to this diet; and tho' the emperor and his allies did not much relish this proposal, because they were afraid that the treaty of Prague would be abolished by the intrigues and remonstrances of the French and Swedish ministers; yet, in order to avoid the suspicion of an intention to perpetuate the war, they consented to expedite safe-conducts for the ambassadors of foreign princes, to come into the empire to treat of the preliminaries of the peace. Cologne was the place assigned to the French, and Lubeck or Hamburg to the Swedes, whither the emperor engaged to send his ministers. This article being discussed, they proceeded to consider that of winter-quarters for the troops of the empire; and these were left to the choice of the emperor, who was likewise enabled to recruit and augment his army by a subsidy of one hundred and fifty Roman months, granted by the circles of Austria and Bavaria, another of sixty by the rest, which pleaded poverty in consequence of the war<sup>1</sup>.

A. D. 1641.

Negotiations
at Hamburg, where an agreement is

THE diet made these concessions, in hope of obtaining with more facility of the emperor a general amnesty in favour of those places that were enemies to the house of Austria: but the Catholics and Protestants could not agree upon the year from which it should take effect; the last desiring that it should commence from the time when Frederic was crowned king of Bohemia; and the others insisting on its being dated from the year in which Gustavus Adolphus undertook the war against the emperor.

DURING these deliberations at Ratisbon, Lutzow, one of Ferdinand's aulic counsellors, was employed in negotiating the preliminaries at Hamburg with the count d'Avaux and Salvius, the plenipotentiaries of France and Sweden, though he at first made some scruple of treating with the former, because, in the safe-conduct granted to that minister, Cologne was the place assigned for his negotiation: however, the king of Denmark, who acted as mediator in the treaty, prevailed upon Ferdinand to overlook that objection. This difficulty, and some others, being removed, the conferences began, and an agreement was concluded to this effect:

THAT a congress for a general peace should be held at Munster and Osnabrug, the garrisons of which should march out, the inhabitants be released from their oath to either party, and observe a neutrality during the time of negotiation: that both cities should, for that time, be guarded by their own burghers and soldiers, commanded by the magistrates, who should be accountable for the effects, persons, and followers of the negotiators: that the two congresses should be considered as one only; and the roads between the two cities be safe for all goers and comers, together with the intermediate places where the negotiators might think proper to confer with each other: that in case the neighbours should be interrupted before a treaty could be concluded, Munster and Osnabrug should return to the same situation in which they were before the congress; but that the neutrality should be observed six weeks after the rupture of the negotiations: that all the safe-conducts on each side should be exchanged at Hamburg, by the mediation of the Danish ambassadors, in the space of two months, reckoning from the date of this agreement: that the emperor and king of Spain should grant safe-conducts to the ministers of France and Sweden, and their allies in Germany and elsewhere, and receive the same security from his most Christian majesty; and that Sweden should give safe-conducts to the emperor's plenipotentiaries, and to those of the electors of Mentz and Brandenburg. It was afterwards agreed, that France should treat at Munster, and Sweden at Osnabrug; and that each crown should have a resident where the other's plenipotentiary was, in order to communicate their mutual resolutions<sup>2</sup>.

refuses to ratify these preliminaries.

THE emperor refused to ratify this previous treaty or convention, which he said was prejudicial to his honour, as well as to the interest of the Germanick body; for these could never suffer the towns of Munster and Osnabrug to be released from the oath they had taken; or consider the treaties with France and Sweden as one, inasmuch as he had never approved of the alliance between these crowns. He therefore recalled Lutzow, and sent in his room the count d'Aversberg, with orders to make these objections, and propose the negotiation of a new treaty; but his proposal was not accepted, and the plenipotentiaries of the two crowns would no longer confer with his minister<sup>3</sup>.

BESIDES the subjects we have already mentioned to have employed the deliberations of the diet, it was agreed that the war against France and Sweden should be considered as a war of the empire; that fifteen commissaries should be appointed to examine the grievances of the Protestants; and that the affair of the palatine princes should be discussed at Vienna in an amicable manner (A).

(A) Towards the end of this assembly, the emperor created three princes of the empire; namely, Frederic of Hohenzollern, John-Anthony d'Eggemberg, and Winceslaus de Lobkowitz, who were admitted in that quality in the register of the Germanic body (1).

(1) Barre, t. ix. p. 736.

<sup>a</sup> WHILE the diet thus seemed to conspire with the house of Austria, in order to prolong the war, Bannier formed the design of dispersing the assembly, and even of surprising the town. Having joined the French under Guébriant at Erfort, he arrived at Hoff on the sixth day of January, and sending five régiments of cavalry to Egra, under the command of major-general Wittenberg, who had orders to rejoin the army at Porcu, he advanced to Awerback. On the nineteenth the confederates marched to Schwendorf; and next day the count of Nassau and Wittenberg, being detached with six régiments of cavalry to reconnoitre the country between Ratisbon and Straubingen, crossed the Danube upon the ice, and took above fifteen hundred of the enemy's horse. The emperor himself ran a very great risque of being surprised; for that very day he intended to hunt, thinking himself secure in an advanced guard, which was actually carried off by the Swedes, who likewise took his litter, hawks, and equipage. The approach of these armies filled Ratisbon with consternation: the bridge was immediately burned; but the country was covered with enemies, the villages set on fire, and the town defenceless, unprovided, full of strangers, malcontents, and suspected persons <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> THE design of the allies was to take the advantage of the frost, to block up and starve the town; but the weather becoming more mild, the count de Nassau and Wittenberg were obliged to repass the river before it should be thawed, and rejoin the army, which had arrived at Regenstauff, about two leagues from Ratisbon. Nevertheless, Bannier, who would not retire until he should have made another attempt to dissolve the diet, approached that city on the twenty-sixth day of February; and Guébriant, who commanded the van, placing his artillery on the banks of the Regen, which was between the town and the confederates, saluted the emperor and diet with five hundred shot; an affront that stung Ferdinand so severely, that he seemed bereft of his usual constancy and fortitude <sup>n</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> AFTER this ineffectual expedition, the French troops separated themselves from the army of Sweden, and marched towards Bamberg, while Bannier took the route to Chamb, to penetrate into Misnia through Bohemia. As for the emperor, he was no sooner rid of such troublesome neighbours, than he issued out orders for assembling a body of troops with all possible dispatch, in order to revenge the insult he had undergone. His army being soon formed by the activity of the archduke Leopold and Picolomini, one part of it under <sup>d</sup> marechal Gleen, went in pursuit of Bannier, while the other, commanded by Picolomini, besieged Newmarck, which was defended by a Swedish officer called Schlang, who, after having sustained five assaults, was obliged to surrender prisoner of war. Immediately after the reduction of this place, the imperial general rejoined Gleen, in order to pursue Bannier, who retreated across the forest of Bohemia; on the other side of which, finding himself impeded by the river Pleiss, he collected a number of boats with such expedition, that he had transported his men when Picolomini appeared upon the bank. This obstruction, however, did not retard the progress of the enemy; the Austrian cavalry swam across the river, and the Swedes being now hemmed in between the Pleiss and the Moldaw, Bannier's ruin seemed inevitable, when he extricated himself by one of those efforts of military genius, which redound more to the honour of a general, than does the acquisition of a victory, because fortune has no share in the success. Finding himself thus severely pressed, he posted some troops in a mill below Presnitz, which made such a long and gallant resistance, when attacked by Picolomini, that his army had time to retire to Zuickaw on the Moldaw, whither his baggage and artillery were conveyed in the night: here likewise he was joined by Guébriant, who, after the siege of Newmarck, had put himself in motion, and by surprising marches arrived at this place, without having been attacked by the Austrians. All Germany admired this march, and Bannier's retreat, which indeed were scarce credible. Gleen and Picolomini accused one another of neglect, and were ordered to repair to Ratisbon to give an account of their conduct, which satisfied the emperor's son, <sup>e</sup> Ferdinand king of Hungary, who sent them back to their posts. Gleen, at the head of nine Bavarian régiments, advanced towards the Rhine; and Picolomini, with the rest of the army, followed the Swedes towards Zeitz <sup>o</sup>. Mean while Bannier, in consequence of the fatigues he had undergone, fell sick at Zuickaw, and ordered himself to be conveyed to Halberstadt, where he died on the twentieth day of May, in the forty-first year of his age, to the infinite loss and inexpressible regret of his party. This great officer had learned the art of war under Gustavus Adolphus, whom he had well nigh rivalled in reputation and success. He was remarkable for his moderation and humanity towards those whom he conquered: he always avoided the effusion of blood, as much as the nature of his occupation would permit: he was robust, patient, laborious, and active; adored by his soldiers, who cheerfully underwent all sorts of toil and danger under his command; and all Europe acknowledged him to be the most able general of his time, especially in the knowledge of encampment, of drawing up an army in order of battle, and of making a retreat in the face of an enemy of superior strength <sup>p</sup>.

Christian duke of Brunswick renews the alliance with France and Sweden.

FRANCE and Sweden had been alarmed at the death of George duke of Brunswick-Lunenburg, which happened in April, because they apprehended that the elector of Saxony would induce Christian, his successor, to make an accommodation with the house of Austria; but, in spite of the intrigues of the court of Dresden, and the menaces of Piccolomini, the dutchess-dowager and her son concluded at Hildesheim, a new treaty with the two crowns, and engaged to join her forces to those of France and Sweden. Nevertheless, this alliance was not of consequence enough to prevent the disquiet of Sweden, which was overwhelmed with grief and consternation at the death of Bannier, seemingly productive of such troublesome consequences; for his army was almost wholly composed of Germans, who were retained in the service by the single authority of the general; and now he was dead, they would be exposed to the arts and temptations of those princes, who were lying in wait for such an opportunity of inveigling them into their own services. Accordingly they were tampered with by the elector of Saxony, and even by Christian duke of Lunenburg, whose aim was to be at the head of an independent army, that would act against the emperor for his interest only: but the young prince was dissuaded by Guébriant from the execution of his scheme, which was altogether extravagant; and the army, which at first seemed inclinable to mutiny, laid aside all thoughts of declaring for themselves, and resolved to receive any general that the Swedish regency should think proper to appoint <sup>q</sup>.

The elector of Saxony retakes Zuickaw.

THE elector of Saxony seeing the Swedish army without a general, resolved to seize this opportunity of retaking Zuickaw, which was invested by general Borri, and, after a siege of five weeks, surrendered upon capitulation, though he did not keep his word with the garrison, which he disarmed on pretence of their having used iron and tin balls, contrary to the laws of war; and, in order to avoid captivity, they were constrained to enlist in the elector's service <sup>r</sup>.

The Imperialists are defeated near Wolfembuttel.

THE reduction of Zuickaw, and the death of Bannier, elevated the hopes of the emperor and duke of Bavaria to such a degree, that they breathed nothing but total destruction to the army of the confederates. The archduke Leopold joined Piccolomini in Saxony, when, trusting to the superiority of their numbers, they resolved to compel the forces of George duke of Lunenburg to abandon the blockade of Wolfembuttel, and to reduce the princes of Brunswick, and the landgrave of Hesse, to the necessity of suing for an accommodation. But these projects were soon frustrated by the Swedes and French, who, under the command of Guébriant, met and defeated them near Wolfembuttel. Four thousand Imperialists were slain upon the spot, and a great number taken prisoners, who received quarter, contrary to the resolutions taken on both sides before the battle began. The greatest part of those who survived, being favoured by the night, fled for refuge under the cannon of Wolfembuttel, and the rest reached the forest of Fimelsen. No other event of any consequence happened in the course of this year; and the winter approaching, the Hessian troops and those of Lunenburg went into winter-quarters near the Rhine; while the French and Swedes remained in their camp near Sastadt, waiting the arrival of general *Torsten*son, who had begun his march with eight thousand Swedes, and was the person whom the regency had chosen as the successor of Bannier. This officer, upon his junction with Guébriant, proposed to go together and take winter-quarters in Bohemia; but in this proposal the count could not acquiesce, because cardinal de Richelieu, who was bent upon the conquest of Roussillon, had ordered him to lead the French troops back to the Rhine, on pretence of making a powerful diversion next year, or of defending that frontier against any attempts of the Imperialists. In consequence of this scheme the armies were parted, Guébriant entered Westphalia, and *Torsten*son penetrated into Bohemia, in order to try their fortunes separately, as soon as the season should permit <sup>s</sup>.

The king of England solicits the emperor in favour of the young count-palatine.

THE princes of Germany, whose country had been so long ravaged by so many different armies, longed eagerly for peace; but no one expressed more impatience than the young count-palatine, in whose favour the English resident at Vienna had orders to repeat the most pressing solicitations. The duke of Bavaria consented to restore the Lower Palatinate to the count, and even to quit the Upper, as soon as he should be reimbursed of the thirteen millions that were due to him <sup>t</sup>: but the Spaniards could not be prevailed upon to relinquish the places which they possessed in the Lower Palatinate; and the archdutchess Claudia affirmed, that the prefecture of Germerheim made no part of it, but belonged to her children the archdukes of Austria: to support this assertion, she alledged, that the palatine princes had never possessed it in any other way than as a mortgage; that the

a emperor had made a grant of it to the archduke Leopold, to whom the subjects of it had taken the oath of allegiance; and that it was but a very slight recompence for the services which her husband had done the emperor and common cause of Germany.

FERDINAND, that he might not seem averse to peace, which was so eagerly desired by the whole empire, promised to restore the Lower Palatinate to the Palatine princes, and reimburse them of the sums which their ancestors had lent upon the mortgage of this prefecture, provided they would renounce all the alliances in which they had engaged against the house of Austria; but this offer, which was not made till next year, they rejected, because he refused to re-establish the count in the electorate, and the dominions thereto annexed.

b ABOUT this time the ministers of France and Sweden were employed at Hamburg, in renewing the treaty of alliance between these crowns, which was on the point of expiring. The count d'Avaux, and Adler Salvius, who were the two negotiators, exerted all their dexterity in obtaining their separate aims. The former affirmed, that the duration of the treaty was not limited to a certain number of years, so as that they should be put to the trouble of renewing it from time to time, while the Swedes were loth to tie up their own hands, and deprive themselves of the liberty of concluding a separate peace with the emperor, in case favourable conditions should be offered. However, the regency reflecting that they could never be secure in a separate peace, without the guarantee of France, gave up that point, and restricted themselves to the demand of an augmentation of the sub-

c sidy from France, together with a powerful diversion upon the Rhine, and in the hereditary countries of the house of Austria, or at least in Bavaria. They disputed a long time on these two articles: the count d'Avaux alledged, that France was too much exhausted to bear so great an expence: that in the course of four or five years she had given immense sums to the Swedes and Dutch, from which she had reaped no advantage; for the allies had converted their money to their own private occasions. With regard to the diversion he observed, that it would be impolitic in the French to send their troops into remote provinces, without any prospect of emolument, while, by acting upon the Rhine, they might extend the conquests, and aggrandize the power of their country. Notwithstanding these objections, it was agreed, that in case of a truce the treaty should be in force d until a peace could be concluded; but during that interval, France should not pay to Sweden more than seven hundred and fifty thousand livres yearly: that the landgrave of Hesse, the dukes of Brunswick, and other allies of the two crowns, should be comprehended in the treaty; and that if a truce could not be effected with the enemy, France should grant a yearly subsidy to Sweden of twelve hundred thousand livres during the continuation of the war.

Continuation of the War to the Peace of Munster and Osnabrug.

GEORGE-WILLIAM, elector of Brandenburg, having died in the month of November of the preceding year, his son and successor Frederic-William sent Wintersfeld to Hamburg, to negotiate a truce with Salvius; and at the same time dispatched another minister to Stockholm, in order to forward the treaty, which he desired to conclude rather from a motive of private interest, than an inclination to give peace to his dominions. This was no other than the view of securing to himself the dutchy of Jagendorf, after the death of the present duke Ernest, who had no children. Though this appenage of right belonged to the elector, he foresaw a difficulty in obtaining it from the house of Austria by fair means; and therefore he had recourse to the alliance of France and Sweden, by which his claim might be supported. But his conduct on this occasion was influenced by another consideration. By an article of the treaty of truce, concluded between Sweden and Poland, it was stipulated, that the fort of Puילau should remain in the hands of the elector of Brandenburg: nevertheless, Ladislaus king of Poland pretended that this was nothing but an incidental article, upon the execution of which the treaty did not at all depend, and therefore he refused to grant the investiture of Prussia to the elector, unless he would restore the fort. In order to preserve the possession of Puילau, Frederick had now recourse to the authority of the French king, who had been mediator in the treaty of Stumsdorf, and for that reason ought to interest himself in the execution of its articles. The count d'Avaux, to whom the elector wrote upon this subject, promised that Lewis XIII. should employ employ his good offices with Ladislaus in his behalf; but in the mean time gave him <sup>a</sup> to understand, that he ought to merit the king's protection by taking some step that would be advantageous to the party of the allies. Over and above these considerations, he had other reasons to cultivate the friendship of the Swedes. Under pretence of treating with them concerning the interests of his aunt, who was dowager of Sweden, he endeavoured to pave the way to the throne of that kingdom, which he was ambitious of mounting, by marrying the young queen, who was now in the fifteenth year of her age. This match, which had been projected by her father Gustavus, with a view of uniting Pomerania and Prussia to the kingdom of Sweden, was now countenanced by England and Holland, as an event that would tend to the support of the Protestant religion, and the balance of power in Germany, where the house of Austria preponderated to such a formidable <sup>b</sup> degree: but the Swedish regency had other views, and took such measures as effectually disappointed the aim of the elector, though the negotiation was serviceable to the allies; for, while it remained upon the carpet, he made but very feeble efforts in favour of the contrary party <sup>c</sup>.

A. D. 1642.
The dukes of Lunenbourg negotiate with
the emperor.

THE disposition of the dukes of Lunenbourg with regard to the allies, became every day more and more equivocal. They demanded of France the same subsidy of money which that crown granted to the landgrave of Hesse; and of the Swedes, the restitution of some places which they had possessed for many years. Being disappointed in this quarter, they attempted to effect an accommodation with the emperor, who had long solicited them to re-unite with his interests: but they would not enter into any negotiation with his imperial majesty, until he should put them in possession of Wolfenbüttele; and the conferences which were held at Goslar upon this affair, being protracted to a great length of time, the allies reaped the advantage of their uncertainty and suspense, for they still continued to treat the Imperialists as enemies, and at last the convention proved ineffectual.

NOR was the emperor more successful with the thirteen Swiss cantons, which the diet of Ratisbon had required to recal the troops of their nation, that were in the service of France, and to hinder the forces of that kingdom from passing through the Helvetic territory into the empire; but neither the letters of the diet, nor the promises of the Catholic cantons, produced any effects in favour of Ferdinand, who did not much consult his dignity in trying such feeble resources, and who now sustained an irreparable loss, by the reconciliation of France with Charles duke of Lorraine, the first step towards which was his relinquishing his correspondence with the house of Austria; yet even this misfortune was not of such consequence to the emperor, as the progress made by the arms of France and Sweden.

rialists near Kempen.

THE count de Guébriant having crossed the Rhine in January, upon a bridge which he built at Wesel, marched to Ordinguen, which surrendered at discretion; and understanding that Hasfeld was on his march to join Lamboy, whose quarters were near Kempen, he resolved to hinder this junction by attacking the last in his intrenchments. With this view he left his baggage at Ordinguen, advanced towards the enemy, drew up his army in order of battle, and proceeded to the attack. After an obstinate opposition, the Austrian infantry was forced and put to flight: Lamboy, who rallied his troops, and returned to the charge, was, together with Merci, surrounded and taken; and of the whole imperial army, not above six hundred escaped. This victory, obtained upon the seventeenth day of January, was followed by the conquest of Nints, Bever, Berchem, Caster, and Guessembruck; so that the count de Guébriant saw himself master of almost the whole electorate of Cologne<sup>a</sup>. His next step was to besiege Kempen, which Groensfeld defended with great gallantry and skill; but a large breach being made, he knew it would be impossible to sustain the assault, and therefore capitulated upon honourable terms <sup>b</sup>.

Saxe-Lawem-

Silesia,

THE defeat of Lamboy, and success of the French general, did not hinder the archduke Leopold and Picolomini, who commanded the Imperialists in Moravia, from marching against Torfsen, whom they intended to surprise; but finding the Swedish general always upon his guard, Picolomini resolved to substitute artifice in the room of valour, and tampered with one Seckendorf, a Swedish colonel, so successfully, that he promised to admit the Imperialists into the camp by night: this design, however, was discovered, and the traitor being convicted of the crime, was beheaded at Salzuedel. In the mean time the duke of Saxe-Lawembourg, with a detachment of Austrians, entering Silesia attacked Beuthen, which was defended by three forts. The first was abandoned by the Swedes, who took refuge in the second, where they were forced and put to the sword; and the garrison which was in the third, capitulated, in order to avoid the same fate. The duke having razed these three forts, reduced the castle of Carloth, and marched against Bunzlau, which he besieged <sup>c</sup>.

a and took. Naumburg surrendered almost without resistance; and all Silesia being thus subjected to the house of Austria, he joined the archduke and Picolomini c.

SILESIA was no sooner abandoned by the Imperialists, than *Torsten*son marched thither to recover the places which had been lost, and proceeded in his conquests with surprising rapidity, which, in order to check, the duke of Saxe-Lawemburg marched towards Schwentz with great expedition. He found the Swedes in order of battle, and having no desire to engage in a general action, thought proper to retire; when *Torsten*son pursued him at the head of his cavalry, and found means to decoy him into an ambuscade of his musqueteers, who charging the Austrian squadrons in flank, soon put them in disorder, and produced a panic among the infantry, in consequence of which they fled with great precipitation. The duke b made many efforts to rally his troops; but the Swedish horse, far from giving him time, fell upon his men with such impetuosity, that three thousand were killed upon the spot: the duke himself, being dangerously wounded, was obliged to surrender, with the greatest part of his officers, and was conveyed to the next town, where he died without issue by his duchess Christina, daughter, of John Albert, duke of Mecklenburg a.

TORSTENSON, having now no enemy near to oppose him, invested Brieg, and, in all probability, would have taken the place, had not the king of Hungary ordered Picolomini to assemble all the forces he could collect, and succour the place, even at the expence of a battle. The archduke Leopold, foreseeing that the reduction of Brieg would be followed by the loss of all Silesia, joined this body, which being greatly superior in number to Torsten- c son, obliged him to relinquish his enterprize, tho' he retired in good order, and intrenched himself in an advantageous situation between Grave and Gros-Glogau, the siege of which last place the archduke immediately undertook; but the besieged made such a vigorous defence, that he despaired of reducing the place, and retired to Luben, where he established his head quarters. The Austrians were not more successful in the siege of Olmütz, from which they were recalled by the archduke, in order to act to greater advantage against *Torsten*son.

THIS general being strengthened by a reinforcement from Sweden, had passed the Elbe; with an intent to besiege Leipsick; and having seized two posts, the possession of which might facilitate that enterprize, ordered general Koningsmarck to invest the place, in hope of making himself master of it, or of obliging the Imperialists to fight, should they come to d its relief. Accordingly, while he was employed in the operations of the siege, he received intelligence that the Austrians had crossed the Elbe; and, in consequence of this intimation, he converted the siege into a blockade, and made preparations for receiving the enemy. On the thirty-first day of October, the count de Bouchain, who commanded a body of Croats and Hungarians, advancing within two leagues of the Swedish camp, *Torsten*son marched out to meet them at the head of his cavalry; but understanding that the archduke had drawn up his army in order of battle, he returned to his camp, to deliberate upon the next step he should take. Mean while Leopold approached Leipsick in such a manner, as that the Swedes were between his army and the town; and *Torsten*son finding himself between two fires, filed off his troops into a plain at the distance of a league from Leipsick. The Austri- e ans, imagining his design was to avoid an action, followed him in his march, with a view to harass his rear; but the Swedish general having put his army in order, faced about to the enemy, and a mutual cannonading ensued. Major-general Wittemberg, who commanded the right wing of the Swedes, charged the left of the Imperialists with such impetuosity, that they were routed, after having made a slight resistance: however, their right wing behaved with more valour, and the emperor's cuirassiers had well nigh broke the Swedish cavalry, which was rallied by Koningsmark, and at length put the Austrians to flight. While the cavalry of both armies thus disputed the victory, the infantry in the center fought with inexpressible rage and resolution, until the Swedish foot, animated by the example of their horse, and supported by a body of reserve, which advanced in the heat of the action, obliged f the Imperialists to leave the field, and retreat into a wood, after having abandoned their cannon.

TORSTENSON pursued the left wing as far as Leipsick; Koningsmarck gave no quarter to the right; and the Austrian infantry being driven from the wood to which they had retired, were surrounded by the enemy, and cut in pieces. In this battle, which was fought in the plain of Breitenfeld, on the second day of November, the Imperialists lost above eight thousand men, including three hundred officers that were found among the slain (B.) conquerors, they took a great number of prisoners, together with forty-six pieces of cannon, a one hundred and sixteen pair of colours, seventy-five standards, the chancery and plate of the archduke and Picolomini, a great many coaches, and six thousand waggons; and their whole loss did not amount to one thousand men, including some officers of distinction. With regard to Picolomini, he escaped to Leipsick with twelve thousand horse; but as he did not doubt that Torstenfon would renew the siege, he would not shut himself up in that place, but retired with the archduke into Bohemia, to re-assemble the wreck of their army.

THIS total defeat of the Austrians overwhelmed the court of Vienna with consternation. General Enkenford was ordered to make new levies with all expedition; Hasfeld and Wahl were sent for to court; Goltaker and Galtz exerted their utmost diligence to join the archduke, and all the troops in the service of the house of Austria were assembled to stop the progress of the victorious Torstenfon.

THIS general had returned to the siege of Leipsick, which he carried on with unabating ardour, by means of sixty pieces of battering cannon; but the valour of the garrison was equal to that of the besiegers. They made a number of successful sallies, in which they damaged the Swedish works; but, being destitute of all hope from the elector of Saxony, they sent deputies to Torstenfon to demand a sum of money, in consideration of which they would give security, that the electoral troops in the citadel should live on good terms with the Swedes, and the burghers should observe an exact neutrality during the present war. These proposals were rejected by the Swedish general, who proceeded in his attacks with incredible vigour, until he had advanced to the very bastions of the place. Notwithstanding this progress, the garrison defended themselves with great obstinacy until the French troops arrived in the Swedish camp, when the town and citadel surrendered upon these conditions: that fifteen hundred Imperialists, who were in the town, should engage in the service of Sweden; that the Saxons, who composed part of the garrison, should be conducted to Dresden, with their arms and baggage; that the town should redeem itself from pillage by the sum of seven hundred thousand rixdollars, and receive a Swedish governor, without a garrison, though the Swedish troops should take possession of the citadel.

THE articles of capitulation being executed, Torstenfon proposed an interview with the count de Guébriant at Rudstadt, in order to deliberate upon the march of the troops, and winter-quarters for both armies. His design being to pursue the interest of Sweden only, he would have persuaded the French general to march into Bohemia; but Guébriant representing, that such a motion might disappoint them of the fruit which they might expect from their victories and success, another plan of operations was settled, in consequence of which the French should pass the Maine and the Neckar, in order to oppose the designs of Hasfeld and Wahl, the Bavarian generals, while the Swedes should besiege Hoff in the marquisate of Culmbach, in Franconia, and, after the reduction of that place, advance to the Upper Palatinate; and the march of both armies was regulated in such a manner, that in two days they could join one another. This was certainly a very feasible project, and the most advantageous enterprize that could have been undertaken in favour of the common cause. The armies of the emperor and duke of Bavaria were not strong enough to make head against those belonging to the two crowns; and the small body which Guébriant proposed to detach into Germany by Brisack, would have made a very useful diversion: they would have made themselves masters of towns, and excellent posts for winter quarters, and there was nothing to obstruct their success. But this scheme was defeated by Torstenfon, who after two days march returned, and, instead of besieging Hoff, took the road to Friberg upon the Elbe. As for Guébriant, he passed the Maine at Gemund, established quarters of refreshment on the Tauber, and afterwards marched towards the Neckar.

THE archduke and imperial generals being assembled at Pilsen, to concert measures for stopping the current of the enemy's success, it was resolved to march to the relief of Friberg, which was by this time blocked up by Torstenfon; who, being apprised of their design, left one half of his infantry to continue the blockade, and marched out to meet them with the rest of his army. After having scoured the country for three days, without finding the Imperialists, he returned to the siege, in which he proceeded with indefatigable industry: considerable breaches were made, and an assault actually given; but the garrison sustained obeyed this command, their ensigns were torn in pieces; and the prevot, having mentioned the causes of their degradation, and razed them from the register of the imperial troops, pronounced the sentence which had been agreed upon in the council of war, condemning the colonel, captains, and lieutenants, to be beheaded, the ensigns to be hanged, and the soldiers to be decimated. This sentence, however, was partly mitigated, at the intercession of many persons of distinction, though the colonel actually lost his head (1).

a it with such courage, that he was fain to recal his troops for that time. However, he was employed in making preparations for another attack, when he understood that Picolomini, at the head of fourteen thousand men, approached to the relief of the place. He no sooner received this intimation, than, ranging his army in order of battle, he put himself in motion to meet them half-way; when Picolomini, foreseeing his design, took another road, by which he threw supplies into the town, and then retired with the utmost expedition; so that the Swedish general, now despairing of being able to reduce Frieberg, marched into Lusatia, in order to wait for the reinforcements which he expected, with Stalbans and Koningfmark, from Pomerania and Lower Saxony.

b THE conferences were still continued at Hamburg, though in a cold and ineffectual manner. After the battle of Breitenfeld, the allies expected that the house of Austria Proceedings at Hamburg. would appear sincerely disposed to an accommodation: but as the courts of Vienna and Madrid foresaw that France and Sweden would set an high price on the peace at that conjuncture, they seemed very indifferent about renewing the negotiations. The king of Denmark had, the preceding year, sent to Langerman, his minister at Hamburg, a model of ratification of the preliminary treaty, touching the safe-conducts, which model was approved by Salvius and St. Romain, the Swedish and French envoys. But the emperor's minister, the count d'Aversperg, cavilled about the title of ambassador, which it bestowed upon Salvius; and the term assigned for the commencement of the congress, and these two articles, produced long debates: at length, however, the emperor finding the allies c determined against any alteration, was obliged to acquiesce in this model, and the negotiators communicated to one another copies of the safe-conducts and ratifications. These being examined and exchanged, and all the formalities adjusted, they agreed to open the conferences for a general peace in the month of July; and, the preliminaries being published, all the nations which had been so long exposed to the calamities of war, congratulated themselves upon the near approach of peace, plenty, and security. Nevertheless, this agreeable prospect was suddenly overcast by the death of Lewis XIII. king of France (C), which happened on the fourteenth day of May, and induced the Swedes, who were dubious of the politics of the new government, to think of a separate peace with the emperor. But their doubts were soon removed by a victory obtained near Ardennes by d the duke d'Enguien, over the Spaniards commanded by the count de Mello, which convinced them of the intention of the French ministry to act in concert with their allies. Death of Lewis XIII. of France, and victory obtained over the Spaniards near Ardennes.

THE arms of France were not so fortunate in Germany. The duke of Lorrain renounced his treaty with that kingdom, and took upon himself the command of the Bavarian troops; and Guébriant being mortally wounded at the siege of Rotweil, which however was taken, a misunderstanding prevailed among the chief officers of the army, and produced a relaxation in their discipline, which was the cause of their total defeat. The count de Rantzau, who succeeded Guébriant in the command, marched to the neighbourhood of Dutlingen in Suabia, upon the Danube, where the count de Merci, the Bavarian general, surprised, defeated, and took him prisoner, with the greatest part of the general officers, and about e four thousand men; and the remains of the army retreated to Alsace, where they were collected and re-assembled by the count de Turenne, who was sent thither for that purpose.<sup>k</sup> Guébriant dies of a wound, and his army is defeated by the count de Merci.

THE eyes of all Europe were now fixed upon the assemblies at Munster and Osnabrug. The plenipotentiaries nominated by the emperor were the count d'Aversperg and the baron de Krane, with Henry of Saxe-Lawemburg, who was chief of the embassy: France appointed the count d'Arvaux, and Abel Servieu, counsellor of state: the marquis de Castel Roderigo, and Diego de Saavedra, were chosen by the king of Spain; and deputies were also named by the other European courts which were interested in the negotiations. The Swedish garrison quitted Osnabrug, which, together with Munster, was by the baron de Krane released of the oath they had taken to the empire: the regencies of both cities swore to f observe an exact neutrality, and to protect the persons and effects of the negotiators. Plenipotentiaries appointed for the negotiations at Munster and Osnabrug.

In the midst of these transactions, Torstenfson was ordered by the court of Sweden to march towards Holstein, the regency being incensed against the king of Denmark, whom they accused of harbouring all the sentiments of an enemy, under the mask of mediator. He had indeed taken several Swedish vessels that traded in the Sound, and neglected to give satisfaction to the regency, who complained of these acts of hostility, which, in a general assembly of the states of Sweden, they resolved to retort; and this resolution was not known till the moment in which Torstenfson invaded Holstein, where he reduced Oldisloe, Kiel, Christian-pries, and several other places of importance.<sup>l</sup> Cause of the war between Sweden and Denmark.

(C) Cardinal Richelieu died on the fourth day of December, in the preceding year (1).

(1) Barre, tom. ix. pag. 762.

CHRISTIAN, king of Denmark, alarmed at this irruption, complained of it to Torstenſon <sup>a</sup> as a palpable infringement of the treaty which he had lately concluded with Sweden; but finding that, instead of paying any regard to this remonſtrance, he penetrated into Jutland, and made himſelf maſter of almoſt all the towns in that province, his Daniſh ma- jeſty had recourſe to the aſſiſtance of the emperor, who ordered Galas to march imme- diately to his relief, though the winter was by this time pretty far advanced. Though their march was very much retarded by the ſnow, which rendered the roads almoſt im- paſſable, theſe auxiliaries at length appeared on the frontiers of Holſtein, and their gene- ral reſolved to ſuſtain the Swedes who were in Jutland, by occupying the defiles between Stapelholm and Sleſwick. This enterprize was defeated by the vigilance of Torſtenſon, who marched towards Rensburg, with intent to give Galas battle, in caſe he ſhould diſpute the <sup>b</sup> paſſage; but the Auſtrians did not think proper to give him the leaſt moleſtation, ſo that he quitted Holſtein, intercepted ſome of their convoys, and encamped near Ratzburg, whither he was followed by the imperial general, whoſe troops did nothing but exhaust the country. The Danes complained, that the ſlowneſs of Galas, in executing the pro- ject of ſtarving the Swedes, had given them time to retire with ſafety; while he, on the other hand, alledged, that the Danes had promiſed a great deal, and performed nothing; that he expected to have found money for the ſuſſiſtence of his troops, together with a reinforcement of four thouſand diſciplined ſoldiers, and twice the number of peaſants; inſtead of which, he ſaw not above four thouſand raw men, ill payed, and miſerably equipped <sup>m</sup>.

Miſunder- ſtanding be- tween the Danes and Im- perialiſts.

IN the beginning of this war, the duke of Newburg and the archbiſhop of Cologne had projected a league in the circle of Weſtphalia, with deſign to defend themſelves equally againſt the Swedes and Auſtrians, and to maintain an exact neutrality. This affair ſeemed to be the more important, as the circle of Franconia appeared well diſpoſed to follow the example; and the count d'Avaux, in a letter to the duke, repreſented, that ſuch a league would be altogether oppoſite to the intereſts of the Germanick body, becauſe, in obliging the foreign troops to quit the empire, it would furniſh the houſe of Auſtria with means for enſlaving the whole nation. This argument had no effect upon the duke, who per- ſiſted in his deſign, which however miſcarried in the ſequel through want of money. <sup>c</sup>

The elector of Brandenburg negotiates with France.

THE treaty which the elector of Brandenburg negotiated with France proved alſo inef- <sup>d</sup> feſtual. He wanted to be ſupported by that kingdom in his pretenſions to the ſucceſſion of Juliers, and in his ſcheme of marrying the queen of Sweden; but, as I have already obſerved, the Swedes dreaded the government of a foreigner, who would, in all probabi- lity, beſtow the beſt poſts of the kingdom upon his own creatures and followers, to the prejudice of the natives; and France did not wiſh to ſee ſuch an acceſſion of power to any Proteſtant prince of the empire <sup>n</sup>.

The proceed- ings of the diet at Frankfort.

DURING theſe efforts of the elector at the French court, the emperor's commiſſaries, aſſem- bled at Frankfort, exerted their endeavours to deſtroy the alliances ſubſiſting between the princes of Germany and foreign powers. Ferdinand had ſummoned a diet to meet in this city; and Erneſt Oettingen, who preſided in his name, propoſed, at firſt, that the abuſes <sup>e</sup> which had crept into the adminiſtration of juſtice ſhould be reformed. But this propoſal was indifferently received by the deputies, who, ſuſpecting the houſe of Auſtria of a deſign to protract the war, alledged, that the firſt object of their deliberation ought to be the means of reſtoring peace to Germany. The imperial commiſſaries, in order to remove the ſuſpicion they had incurred, aſſented to the juſtneſs of this propoſal; but repreſented, that, in order to procure a general ſolid peace, the members of the Germanick body ought, firſt of all, to be united among themſelves; that the landgrave of Heſſe ſhould detach him- ſelf from France and Sweden; and the elector of Brandenburg be obliged to renounce his neutrality, and act in concert with the other ſtates of the empire againſt all foreign powers whatever. This article was, after a long debate, rejected, and a reſolution taken to make <sup>f</sup> peace with foreign princes, before meaſures could be taken to re-eſtabliſh union in the empire, becauſe the one neceſſarily depended upon the other <sup>o</sup>.

College of the princes and towns claim the privilege of ſending de- puties to the congreſs.

THE next queſtion that fell under conſideration was, whether or not the college of the princes and towns ſhould ſend deputies to the congreſs at Munſter and Oſnabrug. The college of electors repreſented, that they were the depository of the rights of the empire, and the guardians that ought to preſerve them; that it would be impoſſible to keep the negotiations ſecret, provided they ſhould be communicated to ſuch a number of envoys, and that conſuſion muſt neceſſarily attend ſuch a number of opinions. The deputies of the princes and towns, on the other hand, declared, that they had no intention to encroach upon the prerogatives of the electors, or even to mingle in the conferences held between <sup>g</sup> the imperial miniſters and ambaffadors of foreign princes; but it was no more than reaa sonable, that they should assist in the deliberations about the common interest of their country, on which subject no resolution ought to be taken without their privity and consent <sup>p</sup>.

THIS pretension was extremely disagreeable to the emperor and greatest part of the electors, who, fearing that the party of their adversaries would prevail, so as that they should be obliged to acknowledge their right of deputation to the congress of Westphalia, proposed to continue the diet at Frankfort, where the states should be exactly informed of the negotiations at Munster and Osnabrug. They promised at the same time to convoke another general assembly, for regulating the differences on account of religion; and reforming the abuses which had crept into the aulic council and imperial chamber.

b THESE proposals gave rise to warm debates, in the midst of which they received letters from the plenipotentiaries of France, expressing their astonishment that the members of the empire, after having called in foreigners to their assistance, and supported a long and troublesome war, should let slip a favourable opportunity of retrieving their liberty, and convincing the world of their sovereign power to make peace or war, independent of any superior. They likewise exhorted the deputies of the empire to repair forthwith to the place of conference, and openly accused the house of Austria of a design to oppress the freedom of Germany. Supported in their pretensions by the court of France.

c FERDINAND was so much incensed at this affront, that he demanded authentic satisfaction, and would have considered as null and void the passports he had received from France for his ambassadors, on pretence that they were not signed by a prince of the blood, or ratified by the parliament of Paris, whose authority was very great during the minority of Lewis the fourteenth. Various were the opinions of the electoral deputies, concerning the manner in which this outrage ought to be resented: but the subject of their deliberation was soon changed by the progress of the French arms upon the banks of the Rhine, though the misfortune of their country still remained. The princes and states of the empire were irreconcilably divided on the score of religion. The Protestants, who were often at variance among themselves, and always surpassed in number by those of the other communion, made very weak and languishing efforts in return to the invitation of France and Sweden; and the Roman Catholics sacrificed the liberty of their country to the interests of the house of Austria. Division between the Catholic and Protestant estates of the empire. Among other instances of their attachment to this family, they opposed and rendered ineffectual a scheme of the princes and cities for removing the diet to Munster, that it might be more at hand to consider the articles of the peace; for the emperor foresaw that France and Sweden would form a considerable party in such an assembly, and the elector of Bavaria was afraid that the cause of the Palatine would be brought before that tribunal <sup>a</sup>.

e FRANCE being disturbed by the war between Sweden and Denmark, which was fomented by the emperor, sent the sieur de la Thuillerie to Copenhagen, in order to negotiate an accommodation; but his proposals met with little regard, until the retreat of Galas, and the bad success of some sea-engagements, rendered his Danish majesty more tractable. Now that he despaired of obtaining fresh succours of the emperor, he listened to the mediator; and on the seventeenth day of August a treaty was concluded at Bromsboo, by which Sweden restored to Denmark all the towns she had conquered in Holstein, and Stormarie, Dythmarsie; and, on the other hand, Christian ceded to the queen of Sweden, Jemptie, Halland, the island of Gothland, the citadel and town of Wisbie, with all the isles depending upon it. Peace is re-established between the crowns of Sweden and Denmark, and a treaty concluded between Denmark and France.

BESIDES this treaty, which enabled Sweden to act with all her forces against the house of Austria, La Thuillerie concluded another between France and Denmark, by which Christian engaged to yield no assistance directly or indirectly to the enemies of France and her allies; and Ferdinand was in no condition to prevent the execution of this new league: for the viscount de Turenne had retrieved the affairs of his nation upon the Rhine, which he crossed at Brisack, and advancing with a small army towards the source of the Danube, routed the Imperialists commanded by the baron de Merci.

f IN the month of May the Bavarian army, being recruited and augmented, went and laid siege to Friburg. Turenne was no sooner apprised of this motion, than he marched to the relief of the place; but count de Merci, brother of him whom he had just before routed, took such measures as effectually prevented the French general from throwing supplies into the town; so that finding himself too weak to act with vigour against the enemy, the viscount retired, and encamped within a league and an half of the town, which was obliged to capitulate. The queen-regent of France, being informed that the king's army was greatly inferior in strength to the Bavarians, ordered Lewis de Bourbon, duke d'Enguien, to join Turenne with a reinforcement; and these two generals attacked the count de Merci with such impetuosity, that notwithstanding his situation, which seemed almost inaccessible, he The Imperialists take Friburg.

was obliged to retire with the loss of three thousand men. This action, which lasted seven hours, on the third day of August, was immediately followed by another, in which the Bavarians had at first some advantage. The duke d' Enguien rallied his troops, which were in disorder, and marched up to the enemy, whom they drove from their intrenchments three several times, but at length they were repulsed with some loss; though, as neither party quitted their ground, the victory remained undecided. Merci, who had lost one half of his infantry, resolved to avoid a third shock by a quick retreat, which he effected in good order, notwithstanding the efforts of the French, who attacked his rear. Continuing his route, he reached the country of Wirtemberg, leaving to the enemy his artillery and baggage, with all the towns situated between the Rhine and the Moselle, from Mentz to Landau.

FRANCE and Sweden were not the only foreign enemies that incommoded the house of Austria. Ragotski, vaivode of Transylvania, had proposed to these crowns an alliance against the emperor; and they would not let slip this opportunity of finding employment for the emperor in Hungary and Bohemia, while the Swedes were employed in the Danish war. Accordingly a treaty was concluded; and the consent of the Grand Signior, to whom Ragotski was tributary, being obtained, the Transylvanian prince took the field with thirty thousand men. He advanced into the county of Neugrad, undertook the siege of Fileck, which he was constrained to abandon, while another corps of his army invested Cassovia. Having made himself master of a great many places, his army increased to sixty thousand men, whom he divided into four bodies for the convenience of provision.

Goetz,

In order to oppose the progress of the vaivode, the emperor sent the troops that were designed as auxiliaries to the king of Denmark, under the command of the count de Bouchain, who entered Hungary with eight thousand men, and marched directly to Presburg, where he expected to be joined by thirty thousand Hungarians. Before these could be assembled, Cassovia was taken by Ragotski, who then convened the states of Transylvania, of which he obtained an augmentation of his forces. For the justification of his conduct, he published a manifesto, addressed to the noblemen of Hungary, in which he assured them, that his whole aim in taking up arms was to defend their liberty and privileges from the encroachment of the emperor, whose design was to make that kingdom hereditary in his family: he therefore conjured them to join him in such a laudable undertaking. This manifesto was answered by Ferdinand, who reproached the vaivode for having made an alliance with the enemies of the empire, to whom (he said) he had promised to deliver up the principal places of Hungary. At the same time he augmented the count de Bouchain's army, and gave the chief command to general Goetz, who encamped within a few leagues of Presburg; but being still greatly inferior to the enemy, all he could do was to harass and attack their parties, cut off their provisions, and intercept their convoys. Ragotski's troops being raw, undisciplined, and without subordination, he durst not venture to give battle, until he should be joined by a reinforcement which Torstenfon had promised to send to his assistance, together with a sum of money; but, instead of this supply, he soon received intelligence that the Swedish general had occasion for all his strength to make head against the king of Denmark; that the grand vizier, his protector, was dead; and that the king of Poland intended to declare against him. These concurring circumstances filled him with such despondence, that he believed himself on the brink of ruin, and resolved forthwith to retreat. He was eagerly pursued by Goetz; but the country being destitute of provisions, the imperial troops were half-starved, and afterwards totally ruined at the siege of Cassovia, where the vaivode had left five regiments, who defended the place with extraordinary bravery. This disorder of the enemy re-inspired Ragotski with courage, insomuch that he rejected the conditions of peace which Ferdinand offered, and was of signal service to Sweden, by making a diversion in Germany, while her forces were employed in Denmark.

NOR was the emperor's forces in better plight in Lower Saxony, where Galas fled before the Swedes. On the last day of August this general crossed the Elbe at Larwemburg, without waiting for the provision which he had bought at Hamburg; and Torstenfon pursued him with such diligence, that he was fain to leave his heavy artillery at Magdeburg: then crossing the Saale at Bernburg, he was joined by the Saxons; but hearing of the junction of major-general Koningsmarck and Torstenfon, he could not afford the least repose to his troops until he arrived at Hall, and established his quarters between Weten and Treidemberg. Here he was reinforced by a body of Saxons, under general Enkenfort, who had reduced the town of Lukaw; but this reinforcement served only to increase the dearth of forage and provision in his army: for such was the vigilance of Torstenfon, who had pursued him all the way, and was now encamped at Oldensleben that no party could go out of the imperial camp

- a without being attacked. Königsmarck defeated a convoy of fifteen hundred loaded waggons, of which he took one thousand, together with twelve hundred soldiers, and four hundred horses<sup>1</sup>: and this misfortune was followed by another of the same kind, in sight of the Imperialists, who durst not move from their situation. Nevertheless, Galas, finding it would be impossible for him to subsist in the place where he was, had recourse to a stratagem that succeeded: he detached colonel Donabe with fifteen hundred horse, and two thousand foot soldiers, to surprise Eisleben; and this officer set out in the dark, so as to conceal his march from the Swedes. *Torsten*son was no sooner informed of this motion, than he followed the detachment with the best part of his cavalry, in order to cut off its retreat. Then Galas, taking advantage of their absence, decamped without loss of time, taking the road to
- b Stasfort, where general Enckenfort waited for him, and arrived at Magdeburg, leaving behind him some pieces of artillery, which he could not carry off. Notwithstanding all his vigilance and expedition, the Swede was at his heels, and hampered him in such a manner, that he could not find subsistence for his troops, which were reduced to such misery; that many died of famine, a great number deserted to the Swedish army, and all the rest were so exasperated against Galas, that they engaged in a conspiracy to blow him up with gun-powder; but this combination was happily discovered<sup>2</sup>.

A. D. 1645:

- c THE imperial general being thus as it were besieged, *Torsten*son left part of his army with Königsmarck to starve the Austrians, while he himself, at the head of twelve thousand men, took the road to Annesberg; and making himself master of the pass at Presnitz, advanced into Bohemia, every horseman carrying a pike and shovel, and every soldier being provided with victuals for eight days. As for Galas, he was reduced to such extremity, that he resolved to cut his way, sword in hand, through the Swedes, and was lucky enough to escape into the circle of Leutmeritz. Mean while *Torsten*son, who now found himself nineteen thousand strong, advanced directly to Prague, in hope of surprising that city, and taking the emperor and archduke Leopold, who had resided there for some time: but Ferdinand was no sooner apprised of his march, than he ordered all the troops that could be assembled to approach the place, under Galas, Hasfeld, John de Wert, and the counts of Brouay and Montecuculli; yet all these forces could not dissipate his fear, in consequence of which he and Leopold retired to Vienna<sup>3</sup>.

- d THE imperial army being formed, encamped between Thabor and Budweis, at a small distance from the Swedes, and each side watched the motions of the other with equal diligence and address. At length *Torsten*son, in order to decoy the Austrians from their post, spread a report, that he intended to march to Moravia, and actually took the road to that province, till finding the enemy in motion to follow his route, he returned, and encamped at Strockwitz. On the second day of March he passed the Moldaw, and arrived in the neighbourhood of Thabor, whither he was followed by the Austrians. Here, though both armies glowed with an equal desire of battle, neither would quit its advantageous situation to attack the enemy, and during four days nothing happened between them but slight skirmishes. At last the Swedes resolved to advance to the Imperialists: the cannonading began at break
- e of day, and about seven o'clock in the morning, both sides were engaged in an action, that continued for the space of four hours with equal obstinacy and success on both sides. At first the left wing of the Swedes began to give way; but being timely supported, the battle was restored, and they charged the Austrians with such fury, that their cavalry was routed, and their infantry cut in pieces: general Goentz, and about three thousand men, were killed upon the spot; six-and-twenty pieces of cannon were taken, together with sixty-three pair of colours, and the number of the prisoners amounted to four thousand, comprehending general Hasfeld, and several officers of distinction. The Swedes, in pursuing their victory, overtook a party of fugitives, who had escaped to the neighbourhood of Krembs upon the Danube, slew twelve hundred, and took the rest, together with three thousand horse: then they sent a reinforcement to Olmütz, and filled all the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria with consternation and despair<sup>4</sup>.

- f FERDINAND, terrified at these repeated misfortunes, pressed the elector of Bavaria to assist him with troops; and the duke sent four thousand men towards Vienna, excusing himself from furnishing a greater number, on account of his being obliged to protect his own dominions from the insults of the French, who threatened the Upper Palatinate. Galas collected the broken remains of the imperial army in Bohemia, set on foot new levies, and, having formed a body of troops, encamped under the cannon of Pilsen, to observe the motions of *Torsten*son. This general, in consequence of his victory, had reduced Leipnitz, Pilgran, Iglaw, and several other places: the towns of Krembs, Stein, and the fort of Tyrnstein, submitted to the conqueror, so that he was master of the Danube on the Moravian side; and all the towns of this province surrendered at discretion, except Brinn, which he

THIS enterpriſe raiſed ſuch terror in Vienna, that the emperor retired to Ratiſbon, and the empreſs, with the nobility, took refuge at Gratz in Stiria: all the valuable furniture was removed; the ſuburbs were pulled down; the baſtions and ramparts were repaired; ſome old regiments threw themſelves into the place; the burghers and ſtudents were armed; the magazines were filled, and preparations made for ſupporting a long ſiege, which, however, Torſtenſon never dreamed of undertaking. He was now employed at that of Brinn, which, by its gallant reſiſtance, gave Ferdinand time to put his affairs in ſome order. He declared the archduke Leopold generaliſſimo of his forces; and Galas, who ſerved under him in quality of lieutenant-general, aſſembled the militia from all quarters to augment the army, that they might hinder the Swedes from croſſing the Danube, and ſending parties to lay Upper Hungary and Auſtria under contribution. While the Imperialiſts thus exerted themſelves in repairing the damage they had ſuſtained, the elector of Bavaria was buſy in taking meaſures to ſtop the progreſs of the French conqueſts, which alarmed his whole dominions. General Merci having received intelligence, that the viſcount de Turenne, after having quitted his winter-quarters at Spire, had eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Mariendal, which he had taken, and that his troops were diſperſed in the neighbouring towns for the convenience of finding ſuſſiſtence, reſolved to attack him unaware, before he ſhould be able to re-aſſemble them; and with this view, extending himſelf in the plain of Mariendal, he drew up his forces in order of battle, placing his infantry in the center, and his cavalry on the two wings. After having cannonaded the French for ſome time, he put himſelf at the head of his infantry, and marched to the attack of a ſmall wood which covered their front, a poſt which it was abſolutely neceſſary to poſſeſs, before his left wing, commanded by John de Wert, could act to advantage. Turenne at the ſame time, with his cavalry, charged the right wing of the Imperialiſts, which he broke, and penetrated as far as the ſecond line: but three thouſand French ſoldiers, under the command of general Roſe, were routed and diſperſed by the Bavarians; and de Wert perceiving their diſorder, advanced with his left wing to take the viſcount de Turenne in the rear. This general, ſeeing the riſk he ran of being ſurrounded, ordered his cavalry to wheel about, and retire acroſs the wood; at the other ſide of which being joined by three freſh regiments, and fifteen hundred horſemen who had been already engaged, he ranged them in order of battle, with a view to attack the enemy, ſhould they paſs the wood to purſue him: but Merci did not think proper to try the experiment; and the French general having rallied his troops, repaſſed the Tauber, and retired in good order. Nevertheless, he was very much harraſſed in his retreat, and often obliged to face about to repulſe the enemy, in whoſe deſpite he croſſed the Maine, and reached the frontiers of Heſſe, where he was joined by the reſt of his army, after having loſt a good part of his infantry, twelve hundred horſe, four pieces of cannon, and his whole baggage. b c d

reinforced by the duke d'En-guien.

THE elector of Bavaria, elevated by the advantage he had obtained, made very lofty propoſals of peace to France, which, without paying the leaſt regard to them, ſent a reinforcement of eight thouſand men to Turenne, under the conduct of the duke de Enguien; and theſe two generals reſolved, either to oblige the Bavarians to come to a general action, or to drive them as far as the Danube, and then undertake the ſiege of Heilbron. With this view they marched directly to Dunitelsbubel, and encamped near the enemy, who were intrenched at Weietewaugh: their intention was to attack Dunitelsbubel; but underſtanding the Bavarians were in march to frustrate that ſcheme, they reſolved to meet them half-way, and juſt as they quitted a wood, perceived their van-guard filing off on one ſide. Turenne, whoſe turn it was to command, drew up his ſquadrons in order of battle, and the Bavarians took poſt upon a riſing ground, which was ſo inacceſſible that the French would not attack them, though they cannonaded each other with pretty equal ſucceſs. The duke de Enguien, ſeeing it would be impoſſible to bring the Bavarians to an action againſt their will, determined to proſecute his deſign of advancing to the Danube, and took the road to Nordlingen, while the enemy marched towards Donawert. Orders were actually given to return to Hailbron, when news were brought, that the Bavarians were in march within a league and an half of the army; and in a little time they appeared on this ſide the river of Wermitz. The duke immediately drew up his army in order of battle upon the plain, giving the command of the right wing to the marechal de Grammont, that of the left to the viſcount de Turenne. Marſin was at the head of the infantry of the firſt line; the ſecond, compoſed chiefly of Heſſians, was commanded by major-general Geiſs; and the ſieur de Chabot conducted the body of reſerve. The Bavarians put themſelves in order upon a mountain of eaſy aſcent; their right was compoſed of the infantry poſted upon a riſing ground; and the reſt of their army was intrenched. There was a village below, and upon their left a caſtle, which they manned g a with some troops. The action was begun by the French general, who ordered Marfin to attack the village; but he being dangerously wounded, and the troops under his command giving way, the duke sent in his room the marquis de Mouffau, with a reinforcement, which was broke, and would have been intirely defeated, had not the general, in person, led up the whole infantry to their assistance.

YET, notwithstanding all his efforts, this first advantage of the enemy might have ended in a complete victory on their side, had not their general, count de Merci, been killed in the hottest of the action. Even the death of this great captain, and the intrepidity of the duke d'Enguien, who behaved with the most heroic ardour, could not prevent the destruction of a great part of the French infantry. On the other hand, the left wing b of the Bavarians fell with such impetuosity on the French cavalry, that they were routed, and the marechal de Grammont taken prisoner; while John de Wert, attacking the corps de reserve, defeated Chabot, and penetrated as far as the baggage, which was pillaged. During these transactions, Turenne attacked the right wing of the Imperialists; and, having reached the top of the hill in good order, a terrible engagement ensued, in which the first line of the Austrians was broke; but general Gleen, advancing with the second, disconcerted the French, who being in their turn seasonably supported by the duke d'Enguien, the enemy were obliged to give way; and their cannon being taken, was pointed against the rest of their right wing, that extended to the village: then Turenne, charging the Bavarians in flank, repulsed them beyond the village, after having taken Gleen prisoner; and some regiments that were intrenched at a church and farm in the neighbourhood, despairing of assistance, surrendered at discretion. John de Wert, being informed of what passed on the hill, hastened thither with his victorious wing; but he was too late, the day was lost, and every thing in confusion: so that all he could do was to conduct the remains of the army to Donawert, whither they retreated by favour of the night, though they were pursued to the banks of the Danube. This victory was dear bought by the French, four thousand of whom were slain upon the spot; though they kept possession of the field, took a great number of prisoners, and made themselves masters of the enemy's artillery.

The duke d'Enguien attacks the Bavarians and Austrians, who are defeated near Nordlingen.

AFTER the retreat of the Bavarians, Nordlingen and some neighbouring places opened their gates to the conquerors, who afterwards marched into the country of Hohenloe, where d they found abundance of forage and provision; while the enemy encamped within five or six leagues of them, and both sides remained in that situation till the seventeenth day of October. The elector of Bavaria, being apprehensive that the intention of the French was to take winter-quarters in his dominions, solicited the emperor to send him a speedy reinforcement; and Ferdinand, who was then upon the eve of a peace with Ragotski, so that he had no occasion for troops in Hungary, sent a large detachment of horse and dragoons into Bavaria, under the command of the archduke Leopold, accompanied by general Galas; and they being joined by John de Wert and Gleen, who had been exchanged for the marechal de Grammont, marched forward with great expedition, in order to surprise Turenne, who, being apprized of their design, passed the Neckar, and fortified himself under the cannon of Philipsburg. The archduke, disappointed in this project, besieged and took e Winphen: Dinkespuel, Nordlingen, and the other towns which the French possessed between the Neckar and the Danube, made no resistance; so that all the conquests of this year vanished in smoke, and Leopold retired into Bohemia to oppose the operations of *Torsten*son. The duke of Bavaria put his troops in winter-quarters in Suabia: Grammont returned to France with the army of the duke d'Enguien; and the viscount de Turenne finished the campaign by re-establishing the elector of Triers in his dominions. This prince, after a captivity of ten years, had obtained his liberty, and permission to go to the congress of Munster, in consequence of a secret treaty with Ferdinand, by which he submitted to the articles of the peace of Prague, relinquished to the Spaniards the possession of what they had f taken, and promised to retrieve what was occupied by the French. As he had signed this treaty with no other view than to deliver himself from a tedious and disagreeable imprisonment, he was no sooner enlarged than he had recourse to the protection of France, and the queen-regent ordered Turenne to effect his restoration. Accordingly that general invested Triers, the garrison of which was obliged to capitulate, and the elector entered his capital amidst the acclamations of his subjects.

Nordlingen and other places submit to the conquerors;

but are soon retrieved by the archduke Leopold.

The elector of Triers is re-established in his dominion.

DURING these transactions the elector of Saxony, seeing himself unable to stop the progress of Konigsmarck, who had reduced a number of places in Thuringia and Misnia, had recourse to negotiation, and concluded a truce with the Swedish general for six months, before the expiration of which a peace might be negotiated. This treaty was the more disagreeable to the house of Austria, as it enabled Konigsmarck to join *Torsten*son in Bohemia, and put him in a condition to advance his progress in Moravia, where he was already very powerful: the emperor, however, in some shape counterbalanced this advantage by making peace with Ragotski, vaivode of Transylvania, though the articles were not much for the interest of Ferdinand<sup>b</sup>.

WHILE the pope and Venetians sent the nuncio Chigi and Contareni to mediate an accommodation at the congress at Munster, the parties concerned proceeded in their conferences at Osnabrug without any intercessor, and drew up preliminaries, which were published under the title of Propositions of Peace: but in these the demands of the emperor and king of Spain were so high, that peace seemed to be at as great a distance as ever; for they insisted upon having every thing restored that had been taken from them during the war. France wanted to preserve all the conquests she had made in the Low Countries, and in Roussillon; and demanded, that the emperor should make an absolute cession of the bishoprics of Metz, Toul, and Verdun; which, however, she consented to hold as fiefs of the empire, by which means she would have a seat in the diet, and a share in electing the emperor: she likewise claimed Alsace, pretended to appropriate Lorraine by right of confiscation, and to retain the conquests she had made on the coast of Italy.

THE Dutch, though heartily tired of the war, by which they were loaded with debts and taxes, were yet afraid of concluding a separate peace with Spain and the emperor, lest they should give umbrage to the king of France, who was a dangerous neighbour, and therefore they delayed the departure of their plenipotentiaries for Munster.

SWEDEN was resolved to keep Pomerania, notwithstanding the opposition of the elector of Brandenburg; and, moreover, laid claim to three bishoprics in the circle of Westphalia, and to two in Lower Saxony. The emperor, who dreaded the Swedish arms, attempted, by flattering the ministers of that crown, to detach them from the interests of France, which continued still to cultivate the friendship of queen Christina, though not at all disposed to see Protestants in possession of so many Catholic dioceses.

THE king of Spain, notwithstanding his high pretensions, was reduced to such extremity, by the loss of several battles, the conquests of France in the Low Countries and Roussillon, the revolt of Catalonia and Portugal, the insurrection of Naples, and the invasion of Sicily by the duke de Guise, that he invested his ministers at Munster with the most ample powers to effect a general peace, or even to conclude a separate treaty with the king of France, or the states-general.

FERDINAND wished for nothing more than a pacification; but the same motives that inspired his wish, hindered him from enjoying it: for he had been so unfortunate in his operations of war, that he was afraid of making advances to a peace, which he could not expect on any other than unfavourable terms.

As for the elector of Bavaria, though connected with the emperor by the ties of interest and religion, he secretly favoured the views of France upon Alsace, in hope of acquiring a powerful neighbour, to whose assistance he could have recourse, in case of any future breach with the house of Austria. His troops and dominions were ruined, therefore he wished for peace; though he dreaded a general accommodation, by which he might be obliged to restore the Palatinate and the electoral dignity. Mean while, his private correspondence with France did not escape the penetration of Ferdinand's plenipotentiary the count de Trausmandorff, who traversed his designs in the negotiation, and represented him to his master as a perfidious ally.

ALL the interested powers were jealous of one another; and this jealousy, together with the differences about religion, raised very strong obstacles to a general peace.

THE ceremonial being adjusted at the congress, with respect to the titles conferred on the different powers (B), a dispute arose among the three colleges of the empire. The emperor had been obliged to admit the electors to the congress, contrary to his inclination; and now the princes and towns claimed the same privilege, which was supported by France and Sweden, because these powers thought the consent of all the states might be necessary to confirm the acquisitions they intended to make in the empire. Ferdinand was therefore obliged to grant them permission to send deputies to the assembly of Westphalia: it was

(B) The French ministers insisted upon having the title of majesty bestowed upon their king by the electors, and yet refused that of most serene to the elector of Brandenburg. At length, they agreed that neither should be used. The king of France demanded, that the title of altesse, or highness, should be given to the duke of Languedoc, because he was descended of a bastard of Lewis of Orleans, brother to Charles VI. but the count de Nas- sau, the emperor's plenipotentiary, claimed the same right, and it was refused to both. Another dispute arose about the title excellency, which the emperor would not grant to the ambassadors of the electors; and Oxenstiern was of the same opinion. At last a temperament was found, and they called the Swedish deputies royal ambassadors, and those of Brandenburg, electoral ambassadors (1).

a accordingly agreed, that the Catholics and Protestants of the three colleges, should be equally divided in the cities of Munster and Osnabrug, with liberty of passing and repassing occasionally, in order to communicate their deliberations.

THESE regulations being made, they were all unanimous in the article of politics; but when religion came upon the carpet, the Protestants complained that the aulic council, composed entirely of Catholics, took cognizance of religious as well as civil causes, and decided upon petitions without hearing the parties; and embraced every opportunity of oppressing those who adopted the confession of Augsburg. These complaints, though supported by the Swedes, were referred to the decision of a general diet, that they might not interfere with the negotiations; and this evasion convinced the Protestants of the power and obstinacy of their adversaries.

b MEAN while Torstenfon ravaged Austria to the very gates of Vienna, while the archduke Leopold, with the wreck of the Imperialists, who had been so often defeated, intrenched himself at Lagenlabd, and the emperor retired to Lintz. In Bohemia, general Konigsmarck reduced one town after another, and laid the country under contribution; and Wrangel commanded in Pomerania, and over-awed the negotiations at Munster and Osnabrug. Torstenfon, however, that his army might not be infected with the plague which raged in Vienna, decamped from Stockeraw, and marched into Moravia, and afterwards advanced into Bohemia, as if he intended to undertake the siege of Prague: but the archduke Leopold being joined by the count de Bouchain, took effectual measures for covering that city; while Torstenfon, being terribly afflicted with the gout, quitted the command of the army, and retired to his own country <sup>c</sup>.

He was succeeded by general Wrangel, who found himself at the head of fifteen thousand horse, and eight thousand infantry, exclusive of the garrisons, and a flying camp under the conduct of Konigsmarck; for at this time Wittemberg had retired from Silesia to join the main body. Against these the Imperialists advanced, to the number of thirteen thousand horse, and eleven thousand foot, reinforced by twelve regiments of cavalry, and eighteen of infantry, belonging to the elector of Bavaria. Their design was to attack the Swedes before they could be joined by Konigsmarck, or the French make a diversion upon the Rhine: but Wrangel, in order to avoid a battle with an enemy, who in a little time must be obliged to divide his army, decamped with great expedition, and retreated into Misnia: then he detached a body of troops with Wittemberg, to levy contributions in Silesia, and beginning his march towards the Weser, reduced Hoxter, Paderborn, Stadbergen, and some other small places in his route. The viscount de Turenne having given him to understand, that he would pass the Rhine at Bacharack in the beginning of June, Wrangel advanced into Upper Hesse, and posted himself near Wetzlar, where he was joined by Konigsmarck; but Turenne failing in his promise, the Swedish general saw himself exposed to the utmost danger from the Imperialists, who now advanced against him with all their forces. In this dilemma he encamped near Amenibourg, in order to observe the designs and countenance of the enemy, as well as to wait his junction with the French.

e IN order to prevent this junction, and cut off the Swedes from all supplies of provision, the Imperialists and Bavarians posted themselves upon a rising ground, at the distance of half a league from the Swedish camp, which they overlooked; but they were disappointed in their expectation: for Wrangel was plentifully supplied from Cassel, while they themselves suffered greatly by want of provision and forage; and the Swedes were joined by marechal Turenne, in spite of all their vigilance and precaution <sup>d</sup>. This junction being effected, the allies advanced to the enemy, who had retired to a strong camp near the convent of Ilmenstad; but as the Imperialists did not chuse to hazard a battle, they ravaged Franconia and Suabia, and passing the Danube and the Lech, invested Rain, which was obliged to capitulate. Then they undertook the siege of Augsburg, in which they had made considerable progress; when the archduke approaching to its relief, they relinquished the enterprize, and retired towards Lawinguen. Wrangel was very desirous of penetrating farther into Bavaria, as they had a manifest superiority of strength; but the French rejected the proposal, and, indeed, during the whole course of the war, they had carried on a secret correspondence with the Bavarians; for they had no design to oppress the enemy in such a manner, as that the Swedes should be able to subsist of themselves without the assistance of France: for this reason the allies abandoned Bavaria, after having pillaged the country, and went into quarters in Suabia. Turenne seized the places along the Danube, and Wrangel occupied the country that extends towards the lake of Constance; though they afterwards made an irruption into Bavaria by the way of Rain, and routed two thousand horse near Bruckheim; and Wrangel had the good fortune to surprise some fortresses and castles, where he found a very rich booty. While the main body of the Swedish army gained these advantages in this part of Germany, Wittemberg, with a detachment of five thousand men, took Warttemberg in Silesia, which, together with Bohemia and Moravia, he laid under contribution, and compelled a body of Imperialists to retire : yet, in the midst of these transactions, the emperor's troops found means to retake several places in his hereditary provinces, which had been conquered and garrisoned by the Swedes. The emperor seeing the Swedes employed in ravaging Silesia, took that opportunity of repairing to Prague, where his eldest son Ferdinand was crowned king of Bohemia : from thence he set out for Presburg, where, assembling the states of Hungary to determine the differences which had arisen between the Catholics and Protestants, these last were re-established in their religious privileges, and then the archduke Ferdinand received the crown of that kingdom.

PERHAPS he might not have been so indulgent to the Protestants, had not he dreaded dissensions in Hungary, which might have been of the worst consequences to his interest at this juncture, when he was abandoned by Maximilian elector of Bavaria, who now concluded a separate peace with the French, to whose hands he consigned Larwinguen, Gondelfinguen, and Hochstet, and withdrew his subjects from the service of the emperor. At the same time he negotiated a neutrality for the archbishop of Cologne, and his example was afterwards followed by the archbishop of Mentz, and the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, who were reduced to the necessity of taking this step, by the arms of Turenne, who laid waste their country ; so that now France had no other enemy in the empire than the house of Austria.

NOR did the Swedes fail to take the advantage of the Bavarian's defection : they secured the towns they possessed in Westphalia and Upper Suabia ; made themselves masters of Schweinfurt, which had cut off the communication between these two provinces ; and after this achievement, Wrangel entering Bohemia invested Egra, which was obliged to capitulate before the approach of the Austrian army under Melander. This general being a Protestant, the Catholic officers refused to obey his orders, and a mutiny would have ensued, had not the emperor taken the command in person. Scarce had he arrived at the camp when he had like to have been surprised by a detachment of the enemy, and a battle ensued, in which the Swedes obtained the victory, though at a considerable expence.

AT this period, when the interest of the emperor seemed almost extinguished, the face of affairs changed all of a sudden. The elector of Bavaria, by the insinuation of the pope's nuncio and the bishop of Osnabrug, was prevailed upon to renounce the treaty he had concluded with the French at Ulm, and re-unite himself to Ferdinand ; and the elector of Cologne had already infringed his neutrality. Maximilian attempted to justify his conduct in a manifesto ; then he took the field, and invested Memmingen, which was occupied by a Swedish garrison, and compelled it to capitulate. The conquest of this place was succeeded by the taking of Iglaw in Moravia, which surrendered at discretion to the count de Bouchain : the Imperialists made themselves masters of Ravensburg in Suabia, and divers advantages were gained over the Swedes in Westphalia by general Lamboy, who commanded the Austrians in that province.

THE reunion of the Bavarians with the Imperialists gave these last such a superiority over the Swedes, that Wrangel resolved to retire ; and having provided for the security of the places he had conquered in Bohemia, he began a long and difficult march thro' the dominions of the elector of Saxony, followed and harrassed by Melander, the imperial general, as far as Jena in Misnia. At last he arrived in the dutchy of Brunswick, where he put his troops in winter-quarters, and then exerted all his endeavours to recruit and augment his army, that it might be in a condition to take the field in the spring.

THE French, on their side, without waiting for a favourable season, attacked Weissensteig, belonging to the elector of Bavaria, which they reduced, and afterwards surprised the castle of Hobentechberg ; while the Bavarians, on their return from Hesse, which they had plundered, made themselves masters of some posts, and seemed to prepare for some more important expedition.

WRANGEL advanced in the spring to join the viscount de Turenne ; but they were obliged to separate for want of provision : and while the Swede marched along the Maine, the French general kept on the left of the Neckar. Wrangel wanted to make Bavaria the theatre of the war ; and Turenne would not consent to leave Suabia and Wurtemberg, where he had established his magazines. Perhaps he had secret orders to spare the duke of Bavaria, in hope of gaining him over again to the interests of France. This certainly was the opinion of Wrangel, which he avowed openly to Turenne ; who, nevertheless, continued staunch to his purpose, in which the Swedish general was obliged to acquiesce.

- a THEY joined again, however, in order to drive the Imperialists beyond the Danube. These, under the command of Melander, had retired towards the Neckar; and, being pursued by the confederates, proceeded to Augsburg, in order to cover themselves with the river Lech: but their march being retarded by their baggage and carriages, the confederates came up and attacked their rear. The action soon became general, and both sides fought with incredible resolution; until Melander being killed on the spot, the Imperialists fell into confusion, and were utterly defeated, notwithstanding the inconceivable efforts and intrepidity of Montecuculi and Ulric duke of Wurtemberg, who made a fine retreat with the remains of the army to Augsburg, where they passed the Lech: Picolomini afterwards took the command, and retreated towards Passau; while the Swedish and French generals, passing that river, penetrated into Bavaria, and laid the whole country under contribution; so that the duke was obliged to quit his capital, and demand an asylum of the archbishop of Saltzburg<sup>1</sup>.

Wrangel and Turenne attack the Imperialists under Melander, who are defeated near Augsburg.

- b THIS was not the only loss which the Imperialists sustained since the opening of the campaign. Baron Lamboy, who commanded the troops of Westphalia and Cologne, gave battle to the Hessians near Grevemburg in the dutchy of Juliers, and was defeated: and the count of Konigsmarck surprised the new city of Prague, while Wurtemberg made himself master of Thabor. In a word, Charles-Gustavus, prince-palatine, arriving from Sweden with a reinforcement of eight thousand men, undertook the siege of old Prague, and carried on his attacks with such vigour, that the place must have been taken, had not the emperor, c dreading the loss of this city and the whole kingdom of Bohemia, resolved in earnest to conclude the peace<sup>k</sup>.

Baron Lamboy is defeated by the Hessians, and the new town of Prague surprised by Konigsmarck.

- d HITHERTO the negotiations at Munster and Osnabrug had varied according to the vicissitudes of the war: the cession of Alsace to France, and the several demands of the treating powers, met with such difficulties, and formed such obstructions, as one would think almost impossible to surmount: nevertheless, after infinite debates and altercation, all these difficulties and obstructions were removed; and at length they determined this famous negotiation, which for the space of five years had held all Europe in suspense. The conferences were translated to Osnabrug, and from thence transported to Munster, and at each place a treaty was concluded, since well known by the appellation of THE PEACE OF WEST-PHALIA.

The articles of peace are agreed to by the plenipotentiaries.

- e THESE being considered as fundamental and perpetual laws and constitutions, which serve as a basis to all subsequent treaties, it will be necessary to give extracts of them for the information of the reader.

- f THE treaty of Munster imported, "That there should be a perpetual peace and sincere friendship between his imperial majesty and the most Christian king, as well as between all the allies and adherents of his said imperial majesty, the house of Austria, their heirs and successors, the princes and states of the empire, on one part; and all the allies of his said most Christian majesty, their heirs and successors, chiefly the most serene queen and the kingdom of Sweden, and respectively the electors, princes, and states of the empire, on the other part.

Substance of the treaties of Munster and Osnabrug.

- "THAT the circle of Burgundy shall be and remain a member of the empire, after the differences between France and Spain shall have been determined; and that neither the emperor nor any of the states of the empire shall intermeddle in the present war between the two crowns.

- "THAT the dispute touching Lorraine shall be submitted to arbitrators, chosen by both parties; and that it shall be terminated by the treaty between France and Spain, or by some other amicable expedient.

- f "THAT the electors of the sacred empire, the princes and states, comprehending the nobility holding immediately of the empire, their vassals, subjects, and citizens, &c. shall be fully re-established on both sides, with respect to spirituals and temporals, in the condition which they lawfully enjoyed, or might have enjoyed before the restitution, notwithstanding all the changes made to the contrary, which shall now be annulled.

- "THAT if the possessors of the effects and rights to be restored shall think it incumbent upon them to make exceptions, they shall not, for all that, hinder the restitution; but, this being once made, their reasons and exceptions may be examined and discussed before competent judges.

- g "THAT the electoral dignity which the electors-palatine have formerly enjoyed, with all the regal rights, offices, precedencies, &c. as also all the Upper Palatinate, and the county of Chusa, with all their dependencies, &c. shall be vested, as in past times, so for the future, in Maximilian count-palatine of the Rhine, duke of Bavaria, and his children, and in all the Willielmine line, as long as it shall produce male issue.

“ As for what concerns the Palatine house, the emperor and empire, in regard to public tranquillity, consents, by virtue of the present convention, that an eighth electorate shall be established, and possessed by Charles-Lewis count-palatine of the Rhine, his heirs, and all his descendants of the Rodolphine line, according to the order of succession expressed in the Golden Bull, &c. a

“ IN the second place, that all the Lower Palatinate, with one and all the effects, ecclesiastic as well as secular, the rights, appurtenances, &c. shall be intirely restored to him; and every thing which may have been enacted to the contrary shall be repealed.

“ THAT if the male issue shall intirely fail in the Willielmine line, while it still subsists in the Palatine family, the electoral dignity shall revert to this last, and the eighth electorate by these means be extinct. b

“ THAT the Pacta Familiae between the electoral houses of Heidelberg and Neuburg, confirmed by the preceding emperors, touching the electoral succession, as also the rights of the whole Rodolphine line, so far as they are not contrary to this disposition, shall be preserved and maintained in their full force.

“ THAT the said Charles-Lewis, and his successors to the Lower Palatinate, shall not in any shape molest the counts of Linangen and Daxburg; but leave them in peaceable possession of their rights, &c.

“ THAT those of the confession of Augsburg, who have been in possession of churches, and, among others, the burghers and inhabitants of Oppenheim, shall be maintained in the ecclesiastical state of the year 1624; and that others, who are desirous of embracing the same exercise of the confession of Augsburg, shall be at liberty to practise it in public as well as in private, &c. c

“ THAT the most Christian king shall restore to the duke of Wirtemberg the towns and fortresses of Hohenweil, Soborendorf, Tubingen, and all the other places which he occupied in the dutchy of Wirtemberg.

“ THAT the princes of Wirtemberg, of the branch of Montbeliard, shall be likewise re-established in all their dominions situated in Alsace, and elsewhere; and particularly in the two fiefs of Upper Burgundy, called Clairval and Passavant.

“ THAT the electors, princes, and states of the Roman empire, shall enjoy, without contradiction, the right of voting in all deliberations touching the affairs of the empire, especially when they turn upon the declaration of war, the imposition of a tribute, the levies of troops, treaties of peace or alliance; and they shall treat of other such affairs, which henceforth shall not be settled without the privity and free concurrence of all the states of the empire. d

“ THAT each of the states shall freely, and for ever, enjoy the right of making alliances among themselves, or with strangers, for their own preservation and security, provided that these alliances shall not be formed against the emperor and the empire, or contrary to the public peace, &c.

“ To the end that peace and friendship may be more and more strengthened between the emperor and the king of France, &c. it is agreed, that the supremacy, the rights of sovereignty, and all other rights to the bishoprics of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, to the towns so called, and to the whole extent of these bishoprics, and especially to Metz, shall, for the future, belong to the house of France, with which they shall be incorporated perpetually and irrevocably, in the same manner as they have hitherto belonged to the Roman empire; reserving, nevertheless, the right of metropolitan, which belongs to the archbishop of Triers. e

“ THAT the emperor in his own name, as well as in that of the most serene house of Austria, and also the empire, shall cede all the rights, properties, domains, possession, and jurisdiction, which they may have hitherto had to the town of Brisack, the landgraviate of Upper and Lower Alsace, the Suntgaw, and the provincial prefecture of the ten towns situated in Alsace, namely, Haguenau, Sclestat, Wissemburg, Colmar, Landaw, Oberenbeim, Rosheim, Munster, Val-saint-gregoire, Kaiserberg, Turingbeim, and all the villages and other rights depending on the said prefecture, and shall transfer all and every one of them to the most Christian king, and kingdom of France; so as that the town of Brisack, with the villages of Hoeftadt, Niederensing, Hartem, and Acharrem, belonging to the community of the town of Brisack, with all the territory and precincts, according to their antient extent, shall, for the future, appertain to the crown of France; without prejudice, nevertheless, to the privileges and immunities heretofore granted to the said town by the house of Austria. f

“ Item, THE said landgraviate of Upper and Lower Alsace, and the Suntgaw, as well as the provincial prefecture over the said ten towns and places depending: Item, all the vassals, inhabitants, subjects, men, cities, boroughs, castles, farms, fortresses, woods, forests, mines of gold, silver, and other metals, rivers, brooks, pasturages, and the rights of regality, and other rights and appurtenances, without any reserve, shall henceforward belong in perpetuity g a tuity to the most Christian king, and to the crown of France, and shall be incorporated with the said crown, with all sorts of jurisdiction and sovereignty, without contradiction on the part of the emperor, the empire, the house of Austria, or any other; in such a manner, that no emperor or prince of the house of Austria shall ever usurp, or even pretend to, any right or power over the said countries, as well on the other side as on this side of the Rhine. The most Christian king shall, nevertheless, be obliged to maintain in all, and each of these countries, the Catholic religion, as it hath been maintained under the princes of Austria, and to banish all innovations which may have crept into it during the war.

b “ IN the fourth place, with the consent of the emperor and all the empire, the most Christian king and his successors, in the kingdom of France, shall have a perpetual right to keep a garrison in the fortress of Philipsburg, as protector; which garrison shall be limited to a proper number of soldiers, that cannot give any just suspicion to the neighbourhood, and shall be maintained intirely at the expence of the crown of France. The passage by land and water shall be free through the empire, as often as there shall be occasion to convey thither soldiers, necessaries, or ammunition.

c “ NEVERTHELESS, the king shall pretend to nothing in the fortress of Philipsburg, except the protection, garrison, and passage: but the property of the place, the jurisdiction, the possession, all the emoluments, fruits, revenues, rights of regality, and other rights and servitudes, men, subjects, vassals, and all that antiently did or ought to belong to the bishop or chapter of Spire, in the whole extent of the bishopric of Spire, and of the churches incorporated therewith, shall remain in their possession for the future, and be preserved to them intirely and inviolably, saving always the right of protection.

d “ THE emperor, the empire, and the archduke of Inspruck, Ferdinand-Charles, respectively, absolve the orders, magistrates, officers, and subjects of the said counties and places, from the engagements and oaths by which they have been hitherto bound to them and the house of Austria; and remit and oblige them to yield subjection, obedience, and fidelity to the king and kingdom of France; and thus establish the crown of France in full and just sovereignty and possession over them; renouncing, from henceforward for ever, all the rights and pretensions which they may have to them: and this the emperor, the said archduke and his brother, for them and their descendants, as they are concerned in the said cession, shall confirm by particular letters patent, and cause the Catholic king to make the same renunciation in the most authentic form; and this shall likewise be done in the name of the whole empire, on the very day that the present treaty shall be signed.

“ FOR the greater validity of the said cessions and alienations, the emperor and empire, by virtue of the present transaction, expressly derogate from all and every the decrees, constitutions, statutes, &c. which may be contrary thereto, &c.

e “ IMMEDIATELY after the restitution of Rhinfeld, the fortifications of that place shall be razed, as well as those of Fort Rhinau, Saverne in Alsace, and the castles of Hohenbach and Neuburg on the Rhine; nor shall there be any soldier in garrison in any of these places. The magistracy and inhabitants of the said town of Saverne shall exactly observe the neutrality; and the king's troops shall pass through it freely and securely, as often as there shall be occasion.

“ No fort shall be raised on the banks of the Rhine, on this side, from Basil to Philipsburg; nor shall the course of the river be impeded or altered on either side, in any shape whatsoever.

“ WITH respect to the debts of the chamber of Ensisheim, the archduke Ferdinand Charles shall take upon himself one third of all these debts, without distinction, &c. when he receives that part of the province which is to be restored to him by the most Christian king.

f “ AND with respect to the debts with which the colleges of the states are charged, by a particular convention made with them, and by the princes of Austria, or such as the same states have contracted in common, as being thereunto obliged, there shall be a suitable distribution between those that pass under the dominion of the king, and those that remain under that of the house of Austria, to the end that each may know what share of the said debts he is to pay.

“ THE most Christian king shall restore to the house of Austria, and especially to the said archduke Ferdinand-Charles, eldest son of the late archduke Leopold, the four forest-towns, namely, Rhinfeld, Seckingen, Lauffemburg, and Waldshut, with all their territories, bailiages, farms, villages, mills, woods, forests, vassals, subjects, and appurtenances on this as well as on the other side of the Rhine.

g Item, THE county of Haverstein, the Black Forest, all the Upper and Lower Brisgau, and the towns therein situated, antiently belonging to the house of Austria, namely, Neuburg, Friburg, Endingen, Kensingen, Waltrich, Willingen, Braulingen, with all their territories, bailiages, farms, villages, mills, woods, forests, &c. as also all the monasteries, abbeys, prelatures, provostships, &c. and all the rights of regality, other rights, jurisdictions, fiefs, fiefs, &c. antiently belonging, in that whole country, to the sovereignty and patrimony of the house of Austria.

“ Item, ALL the Ortnaw, with the imperial towns of Offenburg, Gingembach, and Zell, upon the Hamersbach, so far as they depend upon the prefecture of Ortnaw, in such a manner that no king of France shall or ought ever to pretend or usurp any right or power over the said countries, situated either on this or on the other side of the Rbine; provided always, that the princes shall acquire no new right to them by this present restitution.

“ THAT henceforward the trade and passages shall be free to the inhabitants of both banks of the Rbine, and of the adjacent provinces.

“ THAT the most Christian king shall oblige himself to leave the bishops of Strasburg and Basil, the town of Strasburg, and the other estates and orders which are in both Alfices, immediately subject to the Roman empire; the abbots of Mourbach and Luders, the abbesses of Andlaw, Munster of Val St. Gregoire, of the order of St. Benedict, the palatines of Luzelstein, the counts and barons of Hanaw, Flekinstein, Oberstein, and the nobility of all the Lower Alsace: item, the ten imperial towns which acknowledge the prefecture of Haguenaw: all these the most Christian king shall leave in that liberty of possessing the Indemnity, with regard to the Roman empire, which they have hitherto enjoyed, in such a manner as that he shall not hereafter pretend to any royal sovereignty over them, but remain content with such rights as belong to the house of Austria, which are, by this treaty of pacification, ceded to the king of France: provided still, that nothing shall be understood in this present declaration as derogatory from the supremacy granted to the states of that province, as holding of the empire.

“ IN like manner the most Christian king, as a compensation for these cessions, shall pay to the said archduke Ferdinand-Charles three millions of livres Turnois, within the three succeeding years of 1649, 1650, and 1651, at St. John's-day, paying every year one-third of the said sum at Basil, in good and lawful money, deposited in the hands of the said archduke, or of his deputies. Over and above the said sum, the most Christian king shall be obliged to charge himself with two-thirds of the debts of the chamber of Ensisheim, without distinction, &c. Moreover, the mention made of the Catholic king, and the nomination of the duke of Lorraine, in the treaty between the emperor and Sweden, and the title of landgrave of Alsace given to the emperor, shall in no shape prejudice the most Christian king.

“ THAT, nevertheless, the peace concluded shall remain in full force and vigour: that all those concerned in this transaction shall be obliged to defend and protect all and every the laws and conditions of this peace against every person whatsoever, without distinction of religion, &c. and if in the space of three years the difference cannot be determined, &c. one and all the parties concerned in this transaction shall be bound to join the injured party, and assist in redressing the grievance with their counsel and forces, &c.”

SUCH were the conditions of the treaty, properly regarding France and the empire. That which concerned Sweden, and was concluded at Osnabrug, was the same with regard to general clauses: but the particular articles imported, that the archbishopric of Bremen should devolve to Sweden, saving the rights and liberty of the town and bishopric of Werden, the effects of which shall be secularized: and Sweden shall hold the fiefs of these benefices immediately of the empire, with a deliberative voice in the diets. Moreover, that crown shall possess the town and port of Wisnar in Mecklenburg, with Stetin, and all the Upper Pomerania; the Lower shall remain in possession of the elector of Brandenburg, who shall not enjoy the bishopric of Halberstadt, or the principality of Minden, with the county of Hohenstein, and the archbishopric of Magdeburg, till after the death of the administrator Augustus, duke of Saxony.

IT was likewise stipulated, that, if the male branch of Brandenburg should fail, all Pomerania should revert to the crown of Sweden. In order to indemnify the duke of Mecklenburg for the town and port of Wisnar, he was put in possession of the bishoprics of Swerin and Ratzburg, with two commandaries of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, situated in the dominions of that prince. The dukes of Brunswick and Lunenbourg, as a compensation for the coadjutorships of Magdeburg, Bremen, and Halberstadt, &c. which they had ceded, were, with the Catholics, secured in the alternative succession of the bishopric of Osnaburg, without altering the state of religion on either side.

IN order to reimburse the crown of Sweden for the sums she had expended, it was agreed to pay five millions of crowns in three terms, to be charged upon the circles of the empire; excepting, however, those of Austria, Bavaria, and Burgundy.

WITH respect to the complaints of the Protestants, touching the administration of justice in the imperial chamber and aulic council, it was decreed, that, besides the judge and the four presidents, two of which, in the nomination of the emperor, should be of the Augsburg confession, the number of assessors should be increased to fifty; so as that the Catholics should be restricted to the presentation of twenty-six, comprehending the two appointed

- a pointed by the emperor, and the other four-and-twenty should be presented by the Protestants, who should be permitted in each neutral circle, not only two Catholics, but the same number of Protestants: that the emperor should decree, that in the imperial chamber, as well as in the aulic council, the judges of both religions, being equal in number, should decide ecclesiastic and civil causes between Catholics and Protestants, or between these last only, or between the Catholics and an intervening Protestant; and, for that effect, he should choose in the circle a suitable number of lawyers, well versed in the affairs of the empire, and take such measures as should preserve an equality of judges in both religions <sup>b</sup>.

- b THE articles of this treaty were now signed by all the ministers assembled at each congress, except those of the county of Burgundy, who, in the name of the king of Spain, director of that circle, not only refused to subscribe, but formally protested against them, as prejudicial to his Catholic majesty. Nevertheless, the treaties were next day published at Münster and Osnabrug, and couriers dispatched to all the generals to order a cessation of arms. A. D. 1648.
The king of Spain protests against the treaty,

- c NOTWITHSTANDING all the precautions that could be taken, many difficulties intervened before the ratification could be effected. The pope published a bull, annulling all the articles which he conceived prejudicial to the Roman Catholic religion. The king of Spain employed his influence with the emperor so effectually, that Ferdinand had well nigh frustrated the whole negotiation. He wrote to Münster, that the Catholic king was lawful possessor of the Lower Palatinate, which he had acquired at a great expence, and of which he had received the investiture in the most solemn manner: but as the states of Germany had not been consulted, they deemed it illegal, and paid no regard to the remonstrances of the emperor <sup>c</sup>. against which the pope publishes a bull.

- d THE Swedes were in no hurry to exchange the ratifications, because the article concerning their winter-quarters was not yet executed; and the French refused to quit Germany, until the Spanish branch of the house of Austria should have renounced Alsace and Suntgarw: for this reason the viscount of Turenne kept his army encamped on the banks of the Iser; till at length the deputies of the states, impatient to see the exchange of the ratifications thus retarded, declared, in the name of the Germanic body, that every article should be faithfully and effectually executed after the exchange: at the same time they proposed a sure and commodious plan for evacuating the places, and disbanding the troops. In consequence of their declaration, the plenipotentiaries of the different powers mutually delivered the ratifications of the treaty, and began to take measures for its being put in execution <sup>d</sup>. A. D. 1649.
The ratifications of the treaty are exchanged, and the execution is regulated by another treaty concluded at Nuremberg.

- e THIS subject was discussed in conferences at Nuremberg, where the treaties of execution were signed, on condition that the emperor should immediately disband part of his armies and troops, and maintain the rest in his own dominions; that the king of France should withdraw all his troops that remained in the empire; and that three terms should be fixed for the restitution of the places within the year: and as it was foreseen, that the opposition of the Spaniards would put it out of the power of the house of Austria to deliver up Frankendal within the term prescribed, the emperor obliged himself to surrender Heilbron, as a security to Charles-Lewis count-palatine, until Frankendal should be restored.

- f TERMS were likewise fixed between the empire and Sweden, touching the dismissal of troops, and evacuation of places, as also for the payment of the sum due to the Swedish soldiers; and every thing relating to the amnesty granted to the princes and towns which had espoused the Swedish party, as well as to the redress of grievances which the Protestants suffered, and the repartition of the five millions of rixdollars to be paid by the circles to Sweden, was confirmed by this treaty, which was signed by the plenipotentiaries of the emperor, of Sweden, and of the princes and states of the empire.

Giving a Detail of the War with the Turks in Hungary, and with the French on the Rhine, to the Peace of Nimeguen.

- f MEAN while Conringius, the celebrated civilian, undertook to answer the pope's bull against the erection of an eighth electorate, the liberty of conscience, and secularised bishoprics granted to the Protestants. In his justification of the peace of Westphalia, he proved, that the dignity of elector was purely temporal, and altogether independent of the pope's authority; and that it was absolutely necessary to secularize some benefices, in order to restore the peace of the empire. A. D. 1650.
Conringius answers the pope's bull.

THE next contest that engrossed the attention of the emperor, was the famous dispute which had continued so long, touching the succession of the duchies of Juliers and Berg, between the elector of Saxony, the marquis of Brandenburg, and the duke of Neuburg; in order order to terminate which in an amicable manner, Ferdinand convoked an assembly at Dresden, where many expedients were proposed, and mutual offers made, for effecting an accommodation; but, after all their conferences, the affair continued still undecided (D).

NEVERTHELESS Germany did not fail to enjoy the happy fruits of the peace: tranquillity was restored in all the provinces. The Spaniards, after innumerable disputes, agreed to take Hailbron in exchange for Frankendal, which was no sooner delivered to the count palatine, than he demanded and received the investiture of the Lower Palatinate from Ferdinand, who ordered the count de Furstemberg to invite that prince to the diets of the empire. It was a much more difficult task to regulate the difference subsisting between Sweden and the elector of Brandenburg, touching Further Pomerania. That prince was not as yet put in possession of all that had been adjudged to him by the treaty of Osnabrug; yet the queen of Sweden expected, that her deputies should be admitted into the diet, as she now assumed the title of duchess of Pomerania. The elector of Brandenburg, and the other princes, opposed this demand, because she had not as yet terminated her difference with the marquis of Brandenburg; and the negotiations occasioned by this affair obliged the emperor to postpone the diet, which he had summoned to meet at Ratisbon.

The emperor's eldest son is elected king of the Romans.
A. D. 1653.

FERDINAND glowed with impatience to see his eldest son elected king of the Romans; and therefore, without waiting for the convocation of the diet, he proposed the election to the electors, and all of them gave their consent, without hesitation, except the elector of Brandenburg, who, tho' he opposed Ferdinand's intention at first, was soon brought over to his views. Then assembling at Augsburg, they unanimously chose his son Ferdinand-Francis king of the Romans, after he had signed a capitulation, obliging himself to maintain inviolably the Golden Bull, and the eighth electorate created in favour of the count-palatine; to observe religiously the treaties of Munster, Osnabrug, and Nuremberg, with all that should be concluded in the diet at Ratisbon; and to contract no alliance concerning the affairs of the empire, without the consent of the Germanic body.

Proceedings of the diet at Ratisbon.

THIS ceremony being performed, the emperor returned to Ratisbon with the electors, and there receiving an account of Lower Pomerania's being restored by the queen of Sweden to the elector of Brandenburg, he ordered the diet to be opened without farther delay,

(D) In order to convey a distinct idea of this dispute, it will be necessary to trace it to its origin. Albert, duke of Saxony, from whom the electoral branch descends, received from Ferdinand III. the reversion of Juliers and Berg; and this eventual investiture was confirmed by Maximilian I. Notwithstanding this patent, Charles V. in 1521, bestowed the investiture of these duchies upon duke John the second, and his wife; with this proviso, that he should satisfy the house of Saxony with regard to its pretensions. Next year, however, the emperor being made sensible of the justice of the Saxon's pretensions, offered to bestow upon the dukes the same investiture of Juliers, Berg, and the county of Ravensberg, declaring, that he had no intention to invade the right of the dukes of Saxony. Perhaps this declaration was made on account of a marriage, which was then negotiating, between John-Frederic, duke of Saxony, and Sibella, princess of Cleves. On this occasion, the emperor was solicited to consent, that, if the duke and duchess should die without male issue, the duchies of Cleves and Juliers, with their dependencies, should be vested in the daughters of the marriage; but an additional clause was made to the contract, importing, that the elector John should likewise reserve his antient rights. At length, by a transaction at Spire, in 1544, between Ferdinand king of the Romans, and John-Frederic elector of Saxony, it was concluded, that this contract of marriage should be confirmed in the following manner: in case the duke of Juliers, Cleves, and Berg, should die without male issue, the emperor, or his successors, should confer on the said elector, or, in case of his death, upon the heirs male of his body, the duchies of Juliers, Cleves, and Berg, as masculine fiefs. John-William, duke of Cleves, dying in 1609, without issue, his succession was disputed by the children of his sisters. John-Sigismund of Brandenburg, son of Eleonora of Cleves, and Wolfgang-William, duke of Neuburg, son of Anne, her younger sister, seized the dominions by force, and maintained themselves in possession by the assistance of foreign powers. Mean while the elector of Saxony had recourse to the emperor, from whom, in 1610, he received the investiture of these duchies; and that same year a congress was held at Cologne, and afterwards at Interbock, where, by the mediation of Christiern, margrave of Brandenburg, and Maurice and Lewis, landgraves of Hesse, a treaty was concluded on these conditions: that the houses of Brandenburg and Palatine should admit that of Saxony into a real communion of the possession of Juliers, &c. until a definitive sentence could be obtained; that the house of Saxony should possess them either undivided, or conjunctly with those of Brandenburg and Neuburg; that the disputed dominions should be governed by a council, which should take the oaths to the princes of the three houses; that the duke of Saxony, after his admission, should give four hundred and fifty thousand florins of Misnia, by way of reimbursing the money expended by the elector-palatine and duke of Neuburg; which sum should be restored to him, in case his pretensions should be set aside by a definitive sentence: but the marquis of Brandenburg and duke Neuburg refused to ratify this treaty, though confirmed by the emperor. Then George, duke of Saxony, instituted a process against them before the tribunal of the emperor; but this suit being strangely protracted, the marquis of Brandenburg and palatine of Neuburg, in 1629, made a provisional agreement, by which the succession was shared between them. The marquis had the duchy of Cleves, with the counties of la Marck and Ravensburg; while the duke enjoyed Juliers and Berg, with the lordship of Ravenstein. The elector of Saxony protested against this transaction, which Ferdinand II. refused to confirm. It was afterwards debated in the congress of Westphalia; but as the elector of Brandenburg fluctuated between the house of Austria and the allies, neither side paid much regard to his interest, and the affair was still undetermined, when Ferdinand III. endeavoured to put an end to it at the assembly in Dresden (1).

(1) Intérêts de Puissances, par Rouffet, t. i. p. 210, &c.

a in order to deliberate upon measures for strengthening the peace, and for the entire execution of the treaties of Westphalia.

THE duke of Lorrain still ravaged Alsace and Westphalia, and obliged the Germanick body to support his interest against France: he refused to restore Hombourg, Landstoul, Hammerstein, and some other places occupied by his troops, unless the states would gratify him with a million of rixdollars. They promised to indulge him with a considerable sum, to the payment of which the electors of Brandenburg and Palatine, together with the free towns, refused to contribute, inasmuch as his imperial majesty had obliged himself by the treaty of Munster to rid the empire of the Lorrain troops, by his own authority. Ferdinand, conscious of this obligation, directed the archduke Leopold, governor of the Low Countries, to decoy duke Charles to Brussels, where he was apprehended, and sent prisoner to Toledo, though not before he had found means to convey to the count de Ligneville, who commanded his army, a billet, ending in these injunctions: "Leave the Spaniards immediately; kill and burn all that falls in your way; and remember Charles of Lorrain!"

The duke of Lorrain is arrested at Brussels, and sent prisoner to Spain.

THIS order, however, his general did not obey. The troops were, by the address of the count Fuenfaldagno, persuaded to continue in the service of Spain. Francis, the brother of Charles, took the command; and, in consideration of one hundred thousand rixdollars, evacuated the places which the Lorrainers occupied in Germany.

MEAN while the diet of Ratisbon continued to deliberate upon complaints that were made by several states against France, by which they alleged their privileges were invaded, in consequence of the cession of Alsace to that crown. The town of Bremen, likewise ceded to the Swedes by the treaty of Osnabrug, complained, that Charles-Gustavus, successor of Christina queen of Sweden, who had abdicated the throne, paid no regard to their rights and privileges which were confirmed by the peace of Westphalia, but had even surprised and seized a borough in their neighbourhood by force of arms. The towns of Lubeck and Hamburg, alarmed at this act of hostility, made remonstrances to Konigsmarck, who paid no regard to their representations, and even affirmed, that neither the diet nor the emperor had the least title to intermeddle in any dispute between Sweden and its subjects. Ferdinand, incensed at this assertion, ordered the circles of Westphalia and Lower Saxony to maintain the privileges of Bremen, which was an imperial town, while the Swedish general

d invested it without hesitation. However, the elector of Brandenburg, and the dukes of Brunswick, beginning to levy troops, and the town being well garrisoned, and supplied with plenty of provision, Gustavus listened to the proposals of the Hollanders and hanse-towns, which offered their mediation; and a congress was appointed at Staden, where the deputies concluded a peace, by which the privileges of Bremen were confirmed<sup>b</sup>.

Peace concluded at Staden. A. D. 1654.

THE session of the diet by this time drawing near a close, the Protestants foreseeing, that the indulgencies granted to them by the treaty of Westphalia would not have their due effect, unless they could be united under one chief, who should direct their conferences, and execute their resolutions, chose the elector of Saxony to perform that function, not only on the account of the high rank he maintained among the states of the Augsburg confession; but also out of gratitude to his house, which had rendered such signal services to the Protestant cause. Their example was followed by the Catholics, who declared the elector of Bavaria chief of their union: but as both parties could not agree about the equal number of deputies to be appointed from each communion, that affair was referred to the deliberations of the next diet at Frankfort.

The Protestants choose the elector of Saxony as their chief; and the elector of Bavaria is declared chief of the Catholic union.

MEAN while the elector-palatine was invested with the title of arch-treasurer, instead of arch-steward of the holy Roman empire, which the duke of Bavaria assumed, in consequence of having been invested with the electorate of the count-palatine. Frederick Hohenzollern, Anthony Eggemberg, Winceslaus Lobkowitz, Charles count de Salm, Maximilian de Districhstein, Ottavius Piccolomini, and Weickard d'Aversperg, were acknowledged princes of the empire; but, at the same time, it was regulated that those of them who had no fiefs, immediately holding of the empire, should have neither seat nor suffrage in the diet<sup>c</sup>.

FINALLY, the diet concluded with their enacting a decree, enjoining all the members of the Germanick body to observe the treaties of Osnabrug and Munster, as fundamental laws of the empire, notwithstanding the protests of the archbishop of Pisa, who assisted as pope's nuncio at this assembly.

ALL these affairs being settled, the diet broke up, and the emperor, with his empress and eldest son, repaired to Vienna, which they entered in the midst of great pomp and loud acclamations: but their joy was soon blasted by their losing the king of the Romans, who died of the small-pox in the twentieth year of his age; and the imperial court retired in the utmost consternation to Eberdorf.

The emperor's
son Leopold is crowned king of Hungary.

THE emperor having raised his son Leopold to the throne of Hungary, with the consent a of the states convoked for that purpose at Presburg, and amused the Protestants of that kingdom with promises of favour and indulgence, he returned to Germany, and opened the diet at Frankfort, in order, if possible, to terminate the differences between the Protestants and the Catholics, touching the exercise of religion, the temporal and spiritual jurisdiction, and the privilege of filling public offices; but notwithstanding an infinite number of propositions, on both sides, and almost incessant debates during the space of seven years that the diet lasted, these contests could not be compromised<sup>1</sup>.

As for Ferdinand, he left them to dispute at their leisure in speeches and writings, and seemed to interest himself more in foreign affairs, than in helping to appease the intestine troubles of the empire. He acted as mediator between Spain and the dukes of Modena b and Savoy; ordered twelve thousand men to march into Tyrol, to attack Piedmont, in case this last prince should prove refractory; and sent a reinforcement of troops to Casimir, who returned from Silesia to Lublin, where he was affectionately received by the palatines, and began to renew the war with Sweden, on the promise of being powerfully supported by the cham of Tartary. His first attempt was upon Warsavia, which was garrisoned by the Swedes, and, after an obstinate resistance, surrendered at discretion: but this smile of fortune was not of long continuance. Gustavus, being joined by the elector of Brandenburg, advanced, and gave him battle, in which he was defeated, and Warsavia opened its gates to the conqueror. After this action, as the elector refused to march farther from Prussia, Gustavus left the command of his army to Wrangel, and repaired to Lubeck, to c terminate a treaty which his ministers negotiated with Holland<sup>m</sup>.

engages in a treaty with the kings of Den-land against the Swedes.

THE neighbourhood of the Swedes incommoded Prussia so much, that the elector of Brandenburg eagerly wished for an opportunity to break with them: the king of Denmark projected an irruption into Sweden, and the emperor set on foot a negotiation for raising the archduke Leopold to the throne of Poland, and procuring the resignation of Casimir; for which purpose he sent the baron Lisola, as his minister, to Dantzick; but that effort miscarrying, he concluded a treaty with Frederick king of Denmark, in which the Muscovites, Tartars, and the states of the empire, should be comprehended, and to which the elector of Brandenburg should be at liberty to accede, importing, that his Danish majesty should declare war against Sweden, and that the emperor should send sixteen thousand men into d Poland to join the Poles, and act against Gustavus. This league was approved by the cham of the Crim Tartars, who ordered an army of an hundred thousand men to march to the assistance of Casimir, while Ferdinand reinforced him with fifteen thousand horse and foot, and the king of Denmark declared war against the Swedes by a manifesto; but the emperor did not live to see the effect of these measures, for he died at Vienna, in the forty-ninth year of his age, and in the twentieth of his reign<sup>n</sup>.

He dies at

THIS prince mounted the imperial throne during an obstinate war, which afflicted the Germanick body in all its parts; and it may be affirmed, that no emperor ever saw himself attacked by so many powerful enemies at once, or sustained such defeats and mortifications without sinking altogether under his misfortunes. He was religious even to superstition, e expressed on all occasions a tender regard to his subjects, and not wholly void of liberality, though very unfortunate in the distribution of his favours; for he seemed to think, that his bounty conferred merit on the undeserving; and, in consequence of this prejudice, he admitted into his councils several persons who engaged him in unlucky enterprizes, and were in a great measure the cause of his miscarriages (E).

It was at the diet of Ratisbon, in the reign of this emperor, that the session of the princes, and the other states in the general assemblies of the empire, was regulated; for the ancient order of sitting, having been confounded by the cession of several ecclesiastical fiefs to lay-princes, there was a necessity for establishing a new form; in consequence of which it was agreed, that the ecclesiastics should have the right hand, and the laics the left; f and that on the side of the former, there should be a cross bench for the administrator of

By his first wife he had Ferdinand-Francis, king of Bohemia, Hungary, and the Romans, who died in 1654; Mary-Anne, who married Philip IV. of Spain; Philippa-Augusta, who died in 1639; Maximilian-Thomas, who died in the course of the same year; and Leopold-Ignatius, who succeeded his father. By his second wife, he had Charles-Joseph, bishop of Passau and Olmütz, and grand-master of the Teutonic order; and by his third venter, Theresa-Maria-Josepha, who died in 1653; Eleonora-Maria, first married to Michel-Koribut-Wiesnowiski, king of Poland, and afterwards to Charles V. duke of Lorraine; Maria-Anne-Josepha, who married John-William count-palatine of the house of Newburg; and Ferdinand-Lewis-Joseph, who died in 1698 (1).

- a Magdeburg : but as the elector of Brandenburg at present possesses that archbishopric as a lay-fief, this bench is occupied by the bishops of Lubeck and Osnabrug, when this last is Protestant, that is, when the bishopric is in the hands of a prince of the house of Brunswick ; because, by a regulation made in the diet at Ratisbon, approved by the emperor, the ecclesiastical princes of the Augsburg confession, can neither be admitted to the bench of the Catholic clergy, nor to that of the lay-princes °.

- b LEOPOLD, already king of Bohemia and Hungary, though but seventeen years of age, governed his dominions under the tuition of his uncle the archduke Leopold, by whose directions he finished the treaty which his father had begun with Casimir, and sent an army into Poland, commanded by Hasfeld and Montecuculli, who besieged and retook Cracovia, without paying the least regard to the remonstrances of the king of Sweden, who complained of these hostilities as infractions of the peace of Westphalia. Leopold sends an army to the assistance of Casimir.
- At the same time the Dutch were embroiled with the princes of the Rhine, by a quarrel between the bishop of Munster and his subjects, in which those powers espoused different parties : at length the affair was accommodated by mutual agreement, importing, that the city of Munster should maintain three hundred foot-soldiers, and the bishop be contented with five hundred ; the commander of which should take the oath of fidelity to the magistracy, and attempt nothing contrary to the advantage of the place °.
- c IN the midst of these transactions the archbishop of Mentz convoked an electoral diet at Frankfort, in order to supply the vacancy on the imperial throne ; but the ambassadors of France represented, that, before the election of an emperor, the states should remove the obstacles which retarded the execution of the treaties of Osnabrug and Munster, effect an accommodation between the crowns of France and Spain, recal the German troops which were in Italy, revoke the commission of vicariat, granted to the duke of Mantua, confer the investiture of Montferrat upon the duke of Savoy, according to the tenor of the treaty of Munster, and declare void all the acts which had passed in the imperial court against the duke of Modena. An electoral diet convoked at Frankfort, in order to elect an emperor.
- d THE electors of Mentz and Cologne entered into the interests of France, and promised to use their utmost endeavours to obtain for them the satisfaction they demanded : as previous steps to which, the archbishop of Mentz reinforced the intrigues of the marechal de Grammont, and Hugues de Lionne, to traverse or retard the election of Leopold king of Hungary and Bohemia. They at first offered their interest to his uncle Leopold, who protracted the negotiation, and amused them with equivocal answers, until his nephew should have attained his majority, or eighteenth year ; and, in the mean time, he, at their pressing solicitations, influenced that young prince to send orders to Montecuculli to suspend his march into Pomerania. The French ambassadors endeavour to traverse the election of Leopold.
- e THE duke of Neuburg was also competitor for the imperial crown, and attempted to avail himself of the assistance of France, by which he was for some time cajoled ; but cardinal Mazarine actually employed all his address and insinuation to persuade the elector of Bavaria to aspire to the imperial dignity ; the king of Sweden backed the exhortations and promises of France ; every argument that could sooth his apprehension, gratify his pride, or influence his ambition, was employed by the French deputies : they even interested his wife and mother in their scheme ; but, in spite of all their united efforts, the elector persisted in his resolution to reject their offers, saying, “ He chose rather to be a rich elector than a poor emperor ; ” and his refusal paved the way to the election of young Leopold. Nevertheless, the electors were still divided in such a manner, that the vote of Brandenburg could make either scale preponderate. The French gained over Charles count-palatine with a sum of money ; the elector of Cologne hated the Austrians, because, in preference to him, the archbishop of Mentz had consecrated Ferdinand the fourth king of the Romans ; the electors of Triers, Bavaria, and Saxony, had declared for the king of Hungary and Bohemia ; and as for Brandenburg, who had not yet disclosed his sentiments, France not only tempted him with sums of money, but also intimidated him by threatening to assist the duke of Neuburg in making himself master of Cleves. The French exerted themselves in this manner, not so much with a design to prevent the election of Leopold, as to obtain from that prince, before his elevation, a capitulation, obliging him to renounce the Spaniards in the Low Countries, and prevent the infractions of the treaty of Munster. In pursuance of this aim, the ambassadors prevailed upon the four electors of Mentz, Cologne, Palatine, and Brandenburg, to sign a preliminary convention, interpreting the third article of the treaty of

Munster, in favour of Lewis the fourteenth, by which they obliged themselves to proceed to a new election, in case the future emperor should contravene this capitulation.

FRANCE, having gained this important point, raised no further obstruction to the success of Leopold-Ignatius, king of Hungary and Bohemia, who was unanimously elected emperor, and signed a capitulation, promising to take proper measures for the redintegration of the circles, to abstain from alienating aught belonging to the Germanic body without the consent of the circles; from citing the electors, princes, prelates, counts, noblemen, and other states, to any other than the ordinary tribunals of the empire; but to leave all of them in general, and each in particular, to enjoy their immediate justice and privilege of non appellando, according to the Golden Bull, and other ordinances of the holy empire: he obliged himself to preserve the liberty of the ten towns of Alsace, and their union with the empire, without prejudice to the prefectorial jurisdiction; to re-establish the electors and states in the possession of what had been taken from them by force, according to the treaties of Westphalia and the edict of Nuremberg; to favour the Protestant and Catholic religions equally in the restitution; to avoid entering into the war between the kings of France and Spain, as well as alliances with foreign powers touching the affairs of the empire, without the consent of the electors; and to maintain the privileges of the towns and princes<sup>a</sup>.

the Rhine.

WHILE this great affair was in agitation, the electors of Mentz and Cologne formed the project of a peace between the courts of France and Spain, which was presented to Lewis the fourteenth at Amiens, and to the count de Pigneranda the Spanish minister at Frankfort. Neither party was averse to the proposal; and Lewis desired it might be discussed before the election of the emperor, in the apprehension, that should it be delayed until a prince of the house of Austria should be settled on the imperial throne, he could not expect such favourable terms of accommodation: for that very reason the ministers of Spain endeavoured to protract the negotiation. He could not, however, prevent the ambassadors of France from forming at Frankfort the League of the Rhine, which was an offensive and defensive alliance between the French king, the electors of Mentz, Triers, Cologne, the count Palatine, the king of Sweden as lord of Bremen, the dukes of Eunenbourg, and the landgrave of Hesse, obliging the contracting parties to employ their utmost endeavours in the diet, and otherwise, to strengthen the peace of Westphalia, and to hinder the German troops from marching to the assistance of the Spaniards in the Low Countries: (F).

MEAN while, Leopold, having obliged the king of Sweden to make an accommodation with Poland, applied himself likewise to put a stop to his progress in the dominions of Denmark. Charles-Gustavus had seized upon the islands of Funen, Langeland, Laaland, Falster, and Zeland. These conquests forced the king of Denmark to a treaty, which was concluded at Roschild, but in terms very disadvantageous to him; therefore he sought an opportunity to evade them, in which disposition he was encouraged by the emperor and the Dutch, who promised to assist him with all their forces. The king of Sweden, being informed of this, suddenly embarked ten thousand men, made a descent upon Zeland, and even besieged Copenhagen; but was forced, after three months spent in the siege, to turn it into a blockade.

Pomerania.

THE imperial troops, and those of Brandenburg, in the mean time, having entered Pomerania, met at first with some success, which encouraged the Austrians to besiege Stetin; but Wrangel, the Swedish general, having thrown great succours into the garrison, they were obliged to raise the siege with some loss. The elector of Brandenburg succeeded no better before Gripwald<sup>a</sup>.

THIS invasion of Pomerania by the Austrians and Brandenburgers was the subject of the deliberations of the diet, then assembled at Frankfort. The majority of the deputies were of opinion, that the emperor and the elector of Brandenburg, by acting against Sweden, had broke the treaty of Ofnabrug; and that the Germanic body, having guaranteed the execution of it, ought either to oblige these two powers to recall their troops, or send assistance

(F) In the course of this year died the celebrated Gaspard Barth, one of the most learned men of the age. In the seventeenth year of his age, he published a work of merit upon the Latin authors, which he is said to have composed in the space of four and twenty hours. He acquired great reputation by his writings, though he died poor; and his narrow circumstances were probably owing to the liberty with which he disapproved of the measures that were taken against the Jews, who had been unjustly oppressed in Germany and Hungary, during the reign of Ferdinand, although they had done him great service in defending Prague against the Swedes. Leopold expelled them from Vienna, at the solicitation of his empress, who imagined her sterility proceeded from the toleration of the Jews; but after her death they were re-admitted, allowed to farm the customs under the emperor's protection, and even gratified occasionally with honourable titles (1).

a to the king of Sweden. Leopold, fearing one of these two resolutions might be agreed to, wrote to the diet, that he transferred their assembly to Ratisbon, hoping at that place to over-awe their deliberations: but it was answered, that he claimed a right not granted to him by the constitution of the empire; and that the assembly, having been convoked at Frankfort to put the treaties of Westphalia in execution, could not be transported elsewhere, without the consent of the states. The deputies of Saxony and Bavaria did not approve of this answer; but the rest, supported by the promises of the king of France, payed no regard to the order of the emperor, but continued their session at Frankfort.

b THE duke of Neuburg was one of those who most stiffly opposed the undertaking of the emperor. He was supported by France, who promised to cause the dutchy of Juliers to be ceded to him, which had a long time been held in sequestration by the Spaniards. The ministers of these two crowns were then negotiating the peace of the Pyrenees, which was concluded in less than six weeks in the island of Faisans. It consisted of twenty-four articles, which, among other things, regulated the restitution of the conquests made during the war. The king of Spain renounced the province of Alsace, the treaty of Querasque was confirmed, Pignerol reserved to the French, and the city of Juliers given to the duke of Neuburg.

The peace of the Pyrenees between France and Spain, by which the city of Juliers is added to the dutchy of Neuburg.

c AT the same time the French and English, fearing that the Dutch and Austrians should become too powerful in the Baltick, by reason of the dissensions of the northern powers, pressed the states-general, by their ambassadors at the Hague, not to give any more assistance to the king of Denmark. And having concluded a treaty, called The Convention of the Hague, they obliged themselves to reduce by force that party which should refuse to come to an accommodation. The king of Sweden rejected it; but being defeated by the Danes, and obliged to retire with great loss, he consented to declare his resolution, after consulting the states of his kingdom, which assembled at Gottenburg in the month of January; yet delayed coming to any resolution about a peace, depending upon the success of next campaign: but the king of Sweden dying of a fever, a peace was immediately after concluded, to which the emperor and the elector of Brandenburg acceded.

d THE troubles of the North being composed, the emperor was threatened with an invasion from the Turks, who had advanced with an army to the borders of Transylvania, and demanded the head of young Ragotski, with all that his father had possessed in Hungary. That prince was then at war with them; and two years before, having represented to Leopold, that, if once they possessed Transylvania, there would be no barrier betwixt them and the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria, he had obtained from him three or four thousand men. This supply encouraged him to attack the vizier's army near Atad, which he defeated, after having killed five or six thousand of their troops. But elevated with this advantage, and advancing rashly, he was surprised by the Turks, his army cut in pieces, and his baggage and several cannon taken. In consequence of this defeat, the Turks made themselves masters of almost all Transylvania, and bestowed the government of it upon Jacob Botskai. But Rago'ski, being still in possession of some places, in the beginning of this year made an incursion into the territory of Giula, and, finding a considerable body of infidels, he attacked and routed them. As soon as the season would permit, he marched with his little army against the Turks, and judging there was no resource for him but in a desperate attempt, he resolved either to conquer or die. Finding them encamped between Clausenburg and Alba Julia, he fell upon them sword in hand, put their battalions in disorder, and was upon the point of gaining the victory, when, his helmet falling off, he received so violent a blow upon his head, that he fell to the ground from his horse almost dead. His army, astonished at this accident, made no more resistance; but retired with their wounded general, who died soon after at Waradin.

A. D. 1660. The Turks threaten the emperor with an invasion, and demand the head of Ragotski, e f ZATHMAR and Zambolick were the fiefs which the Grand Seignior had demanded from Ragotski, and which, since his death, the emperor, at the intreaty of several lords of that kingdom, intended to take from the princes of Transylvania, and fortify their frontier places as barriers against the Turks. But, first using the means of persuasion, he sent to Francis Ragotski, son of the late vaivode, to engage him to cede these two provinces to him, as he was not able to defend them himself, in the present bad situation of his affairs. That prince consulting with the princess his mother, resolved to gratify the emperor, and gave the necessary orders for putting these two counties into the hands of the baron Mierberg, his envoy, judging that, by acquiring the friendship of the house of Austria, he might one day be enabled to recover Transylvania.

who attacks them, and is killed in the action.

His son surrenders Zathmar and Zambolick, the disputed counties, to the emperor.

g AFTER this session, Leopold immediately sent the count de Souches with ten thousand men into Upper Hungary. He encamped at Trenchin, where the emperor had called a diet of the states of that kingdom, which gratuitously offered to supply his troops with provisions.

" Theat. Europ. t. ix. ad An. 1660.

That the Turks might take no umbrage at these proceedings, he ordered his resident to declare to the grand vizier, that he had disapproved of the bad conduct of the prince of Transylvania, and the Porte might be assured, that he would do nothing against the last treaty of peace; his only reason for sending troops into Hungary, being to take possession of the counties of Zathmar and Zambolick.

The Hungarians, dreading the enlargement of the emperor's authority, at first refuse to admit them, and even surrender Waradin to the Turks.

DE SOUCHES soon after appeared before Tokai, and wanted to take possession of it in the name of the emperor; but those who commanded in the place at first made some difficulties, pretending that the Hungarian garrison ought to remain, and that it was sufficient if they took the oath of allegiance to his imperial majesty. De Souches put an end to disputes, by shewing them the emperor's order to take possession of it by force, if they refused to deliver it voluntarily. Upon this the Hungarian garrison withdrew, and the Germans took possession of the town. After the same manner he entered Zathmar, and wanted likewise to put imperial troops into Erschet<sup>w</sup>; but the governor for princefs Ragotski opposed it. De Souches had received an order from Vienna to treat with the princefs, to induce her to allow German garrisons to be put into Erschet and Onod. The Hungarians opposed this negotiation, observing with regret the emperor enlarging his authority in Upper Hungary, and the princefs could not be prevailed upon to trust to their assurances of delivering them up again as soon as the Turks should retire. The lords likewise talked high of their privilege of not allowing any German troops to garrison their towns; and so averse were they to the imperial troops, that the inhabitants of Waradin chose rather to surrender to the Turks, than accept of the German assistance sent them.

THE surrender of Waradin obliged the count de Souches to take all precautions against the Turks. He supplied the frontier towns with all necessaries, and made the kingdom contribute to the expence of the fortifications: he repaired the out-works of Kalo, and secured the fidelity of Erschet. Afterwards settling his head-quarters at Cassovia, he even obtained from the princefs Ragotski leave to put a German garrison into Onod.

A. D. 1661. Leopold prepares for a war against the Turks.

THE emperor then applied himself wholly to provide for a war with the Turks. The bascha of Upper Hungary had laid several villages in the neighbourhood of Zathmar under contribution, and had published a manifesto, threatening with fire and sword the inhabitants of the county, if they refused to acknowledge the sultan for their sovereign: besides, the infidels made such great preparations, that it might easily be perceived they designed some important conquest. Leopold, preparing to oppose them, acquainted the Transylvanians with his intention, and demanded of them Zekelheid and Kovar, as places of arms, and securities for their fidelity. He sent Montecuculli with twenty thousand men into Hungary: Zekelheid was garrisoned with five thousand Germans: the fortifications of the frontier towns were repaired; the command of the army given to count Staremburg; and de Souches made grand master of artillery.

THESE preparations gave a great deal of uneasiness to the Palatine, and other Hungarian lords: they were persuaded that Leopold intended by them rather to conquer Hungary, than oppose the invasion of the Turks: they declared loudly that the imperial troops, by entering their country, violated their privileges; and that the emperor, by taking possession of the places of strength, wanted only to drive the Protestants out of Hungary, as he formerly had expelled them from Bohemia.

THESE discourses, which were not without foundation, made an impression upon the people. They assembled in a tumultuous manner, and requested of the palatine and archbishop of Strigonia to represent to the emperor, that he must recal his troops, as the articles which he had sworn to observe at his coronation prohibited him from bringing Germans into their country. These two lords promised to speak to the emperor, though they expected but little redress, as he could not draw off his troops without exposing the frontier to the invasion of the Turks. The Hungarians, observing no effect from their promises, absolutely refused to give winter-quarters and provisions to the troops. Leopold, being informed of this, sent for the archbishop and the count of Nadasti, and several other lords, to Vienna: having discoursed with them, he made them promise to allow winter-quarters for his army in Upper Hungary.

The Germans are obliged to leave Upper Hungary.

NADASTI, upon his return, assembled the deputies of the thirteen counties, and drew from them a promise of lodging the Germans; upon which Montecuculli marched directly with his army for Cassovia, where, after some difficulty, he was admitted: but the palatine Wesselini seeing his measures broke, assembled the states at Cassovia, and renewing in their minds their antient suspicions of the emperor's conduct, prevailed upon them to deny provisions and winter-quarters to the Imperialists; although Montecuculli, who was there, represented to them, that by so doing they would expose their country a prey to the Turks; but he being able to obtain nothing, and seeing his army diminish daily by sickness, was obliged to winter in Lower Hungary.

- a THE emperor being informed of this disposition of the diet of Cassovia, sent the count A. D. 1662.
Rbotal, and the chancellor of the kingdom, to prevail with it to grant winter-quarters to his army: but the deputies persisted in their denial, and represented, that what was demanded of them was of dangerous consequence, and might be used as a precedent to complete the ruin of their liberties. They wrote to the emperor, entreating him to recal the Germans who oppressed them, and asking leave to defend their frontiers themselves, according to their laws and privileges: but finding no effect from this letter, and the Germans still continuing to oppress them, they at last proceeded to oppose them by force. The peasants, and are attacked by the peasants on their march. headed by some lords, attacked them on their march, killed many of them, and exposed their bloody cloaths to the wind, that all might know the vengeance they had taken.
- b ABOUT the middle of this year there was an appearance of peace with the Turks; upon which the emperor agreed with the states of Hungary, that nine thousand Germans should depart their kingdom; the rest should be subsisted by his imperial majesty, and such regulations settled for their marches and quarters, as should not be distressing to the kingdom. Nevertheless, the disturbances did not cease; for the Imperialists still continuing to pillage and plunder upon their march, were for this denied access to the Hungarian towns; and when they attempted it by force, they were repulsed. The Germans, in despite to see themselves thus treated, exercised, in their turn, the utmost violences against the Hungarians, which consequently greatly irritated them against the emperor.
- c THE negotiations of peace not succeeding, the grand vizier had orders to enter Hungary A. D. 1663:
 with a powerful army. The emperor, upon this, demanded money and troops from the princes of the empire; who first petitioned for a general diet to be called, to regulate what each ought to send. The diet accordingly assembled at Ratisbon on the twentieth of January, and deliberated upon the means of defending the empire from the designs of the Turks; of putting the treaties of Westphalia in execution; and of regulating what could not be finished at the last diet. The division among the deputies prevented their coming to any resolution about the succours to be given to the emperor, till they were surprised with the news of Newhausen's being taken by the Turks, which happened on the twenty-fifth of September. Then they determined to assist Hungary with men and money; and the electors of Mentz, Saxony, Brandenburg, and Bavaria, sent troops to the emperor: but their march was
- d so slow, that they gave the Turks time to take up their winter-quarters in Upper Hungary.
 THE emperor likewise wrote to the Hungarians to raise forces, and make other preparations for war: but they, either not thinking the danger so pressing, or being less afraid of the Turks than the Germans, acquainted Leopold, that they had resolved to assemble the arriere ban, and entreated his imperial majesty not to send any army till their troops were raised; but if he wanted to put garrisons in the towns, they consented to it, provided they were brought by water, and subsisted from the provisions which were in the magazines.
- e MEAN while the Turks were advancing with great speed, and directing their march The Turks advance towards Friuli; towards Friuli. Edward, count of Aversperg, had taken the field with some German and Croatian regiments to defend the frontier; and hearing that the Turks were coming down from the mountains of Jurevestein, called a council of war, in which it was resolved to guard the passage of Sluin, and send count Aversperg to Roclanoz, to prevent the infidels from advancing any farther. The count of Serini, who was next in command, took possession of a little eminence covered with oaks, at the bottom of the mountain Jurevestein, and waited there for the coming down of the Turks. On the sixth of October, at break of day, a thousand janissaries, and four hundred spahis, came down into the valley, who were attacked but are repulsed by count Serini. by the Croatians with such vigour, that very few escaped, most of them being either killed, or taken prisoners. The Turks, struck with this resolution of the Croatians, and judging that they were much stronger than indeed they were, fled with precipitation, leaving their baggage behind them.
- f THE emperor being informed soon after, that the grand vizier was preparing to march against Newhausen, called an assembly of the states at Presburg, to press for the arriere ban, and put that place in a condition to maintain a siege; for though the twenty-fourth of August had been appointed for their general rendezvous at Vaberg, when the imperial officer came there, he did not find a man. This extraordinary conduct had surprised the court of Vienna, and therefore count Rothal was sent into Hungary, with full powers to treat with the states; who, being assembled in a diet at Cassovia, at last granted him what he demanded.
- g NEVERTHELESS, Leopold was still distrustful of them; and being likewise dissatisfied with A. D. 1664.

The pope allowed him to raise the sixth penny upon the goods of ecclesiastics in Austria and Bohemia; the king of France sent him two thousand horse, and four thousand foot, which were joined by a great number of volunteers; eight hundred horse, and six hundred foot, were obtained from the king of Sweden, upon condition of allowing liberty of conscience to the Protestants of Hungary, and granting to the Swedes the investiture of the duchy of Bremen, and of Pomerania. a

THE count of Serini began the campaign by burning the bridge of Essak, which was in the possession of the Turks. Soon after he took the city of the Five Churches, and many other places situated betwixt the Drave and the Danube. The count de Souches, who commanded a separate body, gained great advantages over the Turks: he made himself master of Newtria; and marching afterwards to besiege Newhausel, he met with four thousand Turks, whom he defeated. He pursued them to the banks of the Gran, where they, receiving reinforcements, again opposed him; but, being vigorously attacked, they were intirely routed, and their artillery and baggage taken. Immediately after, he marched to Lewentz, which he attacked with such fury, that the garrison, being struck with a panic, surrendered at discretion. b

THE bashaw of Buda, having assembled the troops of Moldavia and Walachia, thought of recovering the place before the breaches were repaired. In effect, he besieged it; but the count de Souches, passing the Gran with his little army, encamped within a league of the besiegers; and both sides drawing up in order of battle, the Imperialists attacked the Turks and Tartars with such vigour, that they soon put them to flight. The troops of Moldavia and Walachia went home, and their retreat passed for a revolt. The count de Souches, pursuing his victory, took possession of the city of Barcem; and, after that, led his troops to Comora for refreshment. c

The grand vizier is intirely defeated near St. Godard.

MEAN while the grand vizier, having made himself master of Serinswar, in sight of the Austrians, who neither durst assist the place, nor offer battle, animated by this success, passed the Muer, and formed the design of marching to Vienna. Montecuculli, who observed the Ottoman army, undertook to stop him near St. Godard upon the Raab. The Turkish general, having found a ford, transported a part of his troops with design to offer battle: but he committed a great error in deferring till next day to transport the rest; for there fell such a heavy rain all night, that the Raab overflowed its banks. Montecuculli, resolving to prevent the re-union of the Turks, drew up his army in order of battle, to attack those who had passed to his side of the river; and the Turks, still endeavouring to pass the river over a small wooden bridge, were repulsed by five hundred French volunteers (G). This memorable action began on the third of August, at nine in the morning, and lasted till four in the afternoon. The victory was long doubtful; but at last the Turks were intirely defeated, with the loss of twenty-two thousand men, and seventeen pieces of cannon. d

The Turks immediately conclude a peace.

THIS defeat appeared so considerable to the grand vizier, that he sent next day to offer a negotiation of peace, which was concluded at Temeswar the tenth of August. The Hungarians, and Abassi, the vaivode of Transylvania, astonished at this precipitation, complained, that, instead of consulting their interests, they had treated without them, and at their expence, they being still abandoned to the Turks, and exposed to the incursions of the garrison of Newhausel; that the emperor might have obtained much more advantageous conditions from the infidels, considering the terror in which they were; and that Newhausel ought certainly to have been delivered up, or its fortifications razed. The ministers of the emperor endeavoured to excuse themselves, by affirming, that they were obliged to have more regard to the sad state to which the empire was reduced, than to the uncertain consequences of a victory. But the truth was, that Leopold consented to it the more willingly, as he wanted to accomplish his marriage with the infanta of Spain, to prevent the designs of the French upon that crown. e

THE murmurs of the Hungarians were not appeased by this answer; but proceeded so far as to threaten a revolt, if there was no regard paid to their remonstrances. The malcontents, hearing that his imperial majesty's resident with the grand vizier was carrying the treaty to Vienna, to be ratified by the emperor, attacked him on the road, took his horses and money from him, and with difficulty restored to him the dispatches he was carrying to their sovereign. The emperor no sooner heard of this violence, but he sent for the principal lords of Hungary to Vienna; and prince Lobskowitz, president of the imperial council, told them, that the Turks, seeing their measures broke, had of themselves proposed a peace; in which it was agreed, that Transylvania should enjoy its liberty, though formerly claimed as a province by the infidels; that the counties of Zatbmar and Zambolick were f a likewise ceded to the emperor; the bounds of Hungary extended to the Tibisque, a rapid and deep river, and consequently a good frontier against the Turks; that his imperial majesty had reserved the power of building forts to restrain the garrisons of Waradin and Newbausel; and as he had resolved to recall all the German regiments from Hungary, provided they would put garrisons in their place, the lords of that kingdom ought not to make any difficulty of signing the treaty in the name of the states.

THE Hungarians appeared at first satisfied with the reasons of prince Lobkowitz: never- A. D. 1665. theless they told him, that all the officers of war, even to a general, who should serve beyond the Danube, must only be natives of Hungary; and they were not obliged to support German garrisons, repair the old, or build new fortifications.

b THE emperor, being able to obtain no more from the Hungarians, promised to exempt them from the lodging and subsistence of foreign troops; to leave them the command of all the towns beyond the Danube; a liberty of putting garrisons of their own choosing into those of the mountains; with a power likewise of bringing hussars and heyduques into the neighbourhood of Newbausel, till the fort which was proposed should be built. The lords, satisfied with these conditions, ratified the treaty, brought back the royal crown to Presburg, from whence they had taken it the year before, and returned quietly to their possessions.

AFTER the ratification of the treaty, the lords expected that the emperor would withdraw the German troops from Hungary; but he having ceded to Michael Abaffi, vaivode of c Transylvania, the places depending upon that province, the garrisons coming from thence were transferred to Tokai, Zatkmar, Kalo, and Onod. The Hungarians hoped that, at least, Neutria and Lewentz would be put into their hands; but, after they had earnestly demanded them several times, they were refused, and German garrisons put into both these places.

THESE absolute proceedings of the emperor, and manifest breaches of the liberty and privileges of the nation, re-united all the Hungarians against the house of Austria. They refused to pay the ordinary taxes, and universally complained of the government. The palatine and principal lords of the kingdom, far from opposing these commotions, even encouraged the discontents of the people, taking umbrage at Leopold's pretending to govern by himself, and not admitting them to any part in the administration. The Hungarians revolt.

d THE emperor, to quell the revolt in its beginning, sent fresh troops into Lower Hungary, which only contributed to irritate their minds; they imagined that he wanted to destroy the lords that were most considerable for their wealth and authority with the people, and to leave only in the kingdom peasants, manufacturers, and artificers. In this persuasion, they resolved to seize upon the person of the emperor; and solicited him to come to the diet, that was to assemble at Presburg on the twenty-eighth of September. But he, whether informed of the plot, or his council not thinking it safe for him to trust himself in the hands of the Hungarian lords, pretended a great many reasons for not coming.

ABOUT this time Leopold married Margaret-Theresa, infanta of Spain. The rejoicings of A. D. 1666. this solemnity were scarcely over, when he was alarmed with the news of the great preparations of Lewis XIV. of France, to take possession of the Low Countries, in right of his e his wife, as sole heir to the late king of Spain by his first marriage, pretending that the females of the first bed inherit to the prejudice of the males of the second. Lewis XIV. before he declared war, had secured the alliance or neutrality of several princes of Germany, and had likewise engaged the English and Dutch to conclude a peace, to prevent the first from joining Spain, and to put the last in a condition to assist him. After the conclusion of this peace, he made a treaty with Sweden, which engaged to keep twelve thousand men in the territory of Bremen, to act on the side of the empire, in case Leopold should join Spain, and declare war against France. Leopold marries Margaret-Theresa, infanta of Spain.

HAVING concerted these measures he took the field, and entering the Low Countries A. D. 1667. immediately seized Charleroy, Binch, Aeth, Tournay, Douay, Alost, and Lisle; and at the same time defeated the Spanish army which came to the assistance of this last place: afterwards he proposed to carry the war into Franche-comté. The king of Spain, alarmed at the proceedings, and hoping to engage the states of the empire to espouse his quarrel, represented to the diet at Ratisbon, that this province being one of the circles of the empire, the Germanick body was interested in its preservation; and that France could not attack it without declaring war against the empire: but the deputies, whether secretly in the interest of France, or employed in affairs that seemed to them of more importance, neglected this representation. Lewis XIV. attacks Spanish Flanders and Franche-comté.

g THE great concern of the diet then was to compose a new imperial capitulation, to remain constant and invariable, which the emperors should be obliged to sign at their election. This matter had been formerly treated of in some diets by the electors, at their own separate meetings; but being complained of by the princes and cities, it was again canvassed at this general diet, where they were all present, and a project for a perpetual capitulation was agreed upon; but this scheme, though approved in a general diet, has never yet received the necessary sanction to render it a law of the empire. The deputies had likewise under consideration, the differences betwixt the electors of Mentz and Cologne, and the duke of Lorraine on one part, and the count-palatine on the other; but determining nothing, the parties complaining proceeded to right themselves by arms.

The elector of Mentz declares war against the palatine.

A GREAT number of the villages of the Palatinate having been rendered desolate by the long wars, the count granted lands and privileges to all strangers who should come and settle in them<sup>f</sup>, and by a right called Wildfangiat, appropriated them as his subjects. The electors of Mentz and Cologne, the duke of Lorraine, and the cities of Spire and Worms, seeing the number of their citizens diminish, disputed this right with him; and the diet having decided nothing, the archbishop of Mentz declared war against the count-palatine, and began with the siege of Ladenburg, which he easily carried. Afterwards he took Odernheim, Hek, and some other small places; so that the palatine, too weak to make opposition, proposed an accommodation, which was broke off by the duke of Lorraine, who sent the prince of Lillebonne with some forces, engaging the archbishop to continue the war.

THIS prince, who had commanded in Flanders, was very earnest to bring the matter to a decisive action; but the palatine army, not able to act offensively, had intrenched itself partly behind an inaccessible marsh, and partly under the cannon of Frankendal. But the prince, after many skirmishes, drawing them to a general engagement by an ambuscade, routed them entirely. The elector-palatine, alarmed at this defeat, proposed an accommodation, and a truce was agreed to for four months; during which the deputies of the parties should assemble at Oppenheim to negotiate a peace: but he not waiting this decision, and impatient to attack the duke of Lorraine, broke the truce, and entered the county of Falkenstein. On the first news of these hostilities, the duke ordered a body of troops, who were in winter-quarters in the bishopric of Spire, to make reprisals upon the lands of the palatine. They accordingly made an incursion, and carried off six hundred horses and a great many cattle. The palatine having made several unsuccessful attempts upon Kisloe, and seeing his states threatened with approaching ruin, resolved again to enter into an accommodation. A suspension of arms was agreed to, and the prisoners on both sides were restored. These two articles were the preliminaries to a treaty afterwards concluded at Heilbron, on the seventh of February, by which the right of Wildfangiat was confirmed to the elector-palatine.

Lewis XIV.
seizes Franche-comté.

A peace concluded between him and the Spaniards.

DURING this dispute between the electors, Lewis XIV. had caused his troops to march off towards Franche-comté, under the command of the prince of Condé. This general took Besançon on the seventh of February, while the marechal of Luxemburg made himself master of Salins. Dole likewise surrendered to the French on the fourteenth, Gray on the nineteenth, and, in less than a month, all Franche-comté was reduced under the power of Lewis XIV.<sup>g</sup> The Hollanders, concerned at the progress of the French, offered themselves, in conjunction with the English and Swedes, as mediators to procure a peace; accordingly their plenipotentiaries assembled at Aix-la-Chapelle, where the terms proposed by the French king were rejected by the Spaniards. Then he caused an hundred thousand men to march towards the frontiers, with intention to attack Brussels, Ostend, and Luxemburg; and by this appearance of a second invasion, which threatened the conquest of the whole Low Countries, compelled the Spaniards to accept of his terms. The peace was signed at Aix-la-Chapelle on the second of May; and by it Courtray, Bergues, Furnes, and all the country since called French Flanders, was ceded to Lewis XIV. on condition that he should restore Franche-comté.

THE Hungarians being still dissatisfied with the emperor's conduct, laboured to shake off the yoke, or lessen their dependence; therefore the deputies of Upper Hungary refused to come to the diet, which was convoked at Presburg for the coronation of the empress, unless the demands which they made at the last diet were granted to them. They complained likewise, that the office of palatine, vacant by the death of Wesselini, was neglected to be filled up by the emperor; and the Protestants also refused to come to the diet until their churches should be restored. Leopold, in order to suppress these complaints, promised to the deputies to grant their demands, and ordered Ragotski to restore to the Protestants their churches and the revenues belonging to them; in consequence of which condescension, many of the deputies came to the diet the sixteenth of April.

NEVERTHELESS a number of malcontents, uneasy at seeing a German garrison in Tokai, assembled at Zemblin, and sent deputies to the emperor, requiring it should be dismissed. They represented to Leopold, that the places of the kingdom, which ought to be garrisoned a by the militia of the country only, were filled with strangers, though directly contrary to their privileges; and that the Protestants received all manner of bad treatment from the Catholics. The emperor endeavoured to satisfy them; but his reasons having no effect, they assembled at the castle of Kivar, upon the frontiers of Transylvania, and a league was proposed between the Hungarian Protestants and the Transylvanians, to drive the Germans out of the kingdom, demolish Zathmar, and arm themselves for the defence of the reformed religion: but the difficulties which occurred put a stop to their resolutions, and they separated without having come to any conclusion.

b MEAN while the elector-palatine being dissatisfied with the peace concluded at Heilbron, in the beginning of the former year, again had recourse to arms, upon account of the right of Wildfangiat, and commenced hostilities by entering the country of Falkenstein and Honec<sup>h</sup>. Having passed the Rhine with his army, he marched against Landstuhl and Homburg, places ceded to the duke of Lorrain by the peace of Munster, which he made himself master of without any resistance, and afterwards took the castle of Honec. The duke, surprised at these hostilities, marched against him at the head of his troops; and the armies engaging near Heidelberg, after an obstinate dispute the palatine was at last defeated, and the emperor, who needed the assistance of Germany to calm the troubles of Hungary, writing to the parties to negotiate a peace, the elector answered, that he was very well disposed to an accommodation. The duke, not minding the solicitations of the emperor, and incensed at the fickleness of the palatine, ordered new levies, and proposed to raise c eighteen thousand men; but the king of France taking umbrage at that great armament, and representing to him that he must disband his troops, and conform to the general peace, which allowed him only one company of guards, and another of light horse, the duke replied, that he was ready to agree to these terms, provided his subjects were protected from the hostilities of his enemies; in consequence of this representation a truce was agreed upon for six weeks, which ended in a treaty of peace.

The elector-palatine renews hostilities against the duke of Lorrain.

A. D. 1669. but by the mediation of the French, a peace is concluded between them.

d DURING the negotiation of this peace, the duke formed a scheme of association with the archbishop of Cologne, the bishops of Strasburg and Hildesheim, and some other princes of Germany, which was concluded at Nancy. Each member was taxed a certain sum, and a number of horse and foot. The city of Frankfort was appointed for the place of the council of the union, in which each party had a deliberative voice; but if any one furnished a double contingent, he was to have a double voice; and in case of an attack made upon any of the confederates, the rest obliged themselves to arm in his defence.

e ABOUT this time also the count of Nassau demanded from the diet at Ratisbon, the restitution of the county of Saaverdin, then in possession of the duke of Lorrain. He founded his demand upon the treaty of Westphalia; but Risaucourt, the duke's envoy, represented, that his master, for want of a safe conduct, not being able to appear at the congress at Munster, it was not just to oblige him to the execution of an article made to his prejudice in his absence; that the county of Saaverdin had been adjudged to his highness after a process of an hundred years; and if the diet hearkened to the demands of the count of Nassau, he hoped they would likewise attend to the treaty, by which the emperor had obliged himself to make no peace, till that prince his ally, was re-established in his dutchies and pretensions. The diet, influenced by these reasons, obliged his highness only to restore to the count of Nassau, some villages depending upon the county of Saaverdin, till the affair should be judged to the bottom by arbitrators appointed for that purpose. After this decision of the diet, Risaucourt went to Vienna, and concluded an alliance betwixt the duke and the emperor, who made no difficulty of admitting him to the alliance of the house of Austria, and forthwith appointed him general of the Austrian horse, which were immediately to march into Hungary.

f THE malcontents of that kingdom had assembled at Zathmar, and resolved to raise a company of an hundred troopers, whose officers should be Protestants. At the same time, the count of Strasolte having received an order from Vienna to repair the fortifications of Tokai, the gentlemen absolutely refused to contribute to the fortifications, and made loud complaints of the violation of their privileges, by putting foreign garrisons into their towns. While the emperor was taking measures to stifle these discontents, the count of Tattembach, at a conference with the count of Serini, shewed him a paper written by the hand of Nadasti, concerning the preservation of their privileges, and the manner of driving the Germans out of Hungary. Next day they subscribed to this, and engaged never to forsake each other; but as they could not execute their design without the assistance of the Turks, they resolved to send deputies to Constantinople; and, that the emperor's resistant might not discover their negotiations, they employed Transylvanians, who, being g under the protection of the Porte, would not be suspected.

Count Tattembach and Serini enter into an association, and solicit the assistance of the Turks.

UPON the first overture made to the grand vizier, he promised to support the malcontents, if they would become tributaries to the Porte: but, rather than assent to that hard condition, they chose to continue faithful to the emperor; and he having sent regiments into Hungary, to prevent the irruptions of the Turks and Transylvanians, they were ready to sacrifice their lives in defence of their country, and his just rights: but far from meeting acceptance with the emperor, his mind seemed rather irritated against them. The Hungarians then despairing of having their privileges restored, again renewed their negotiations with the Porte: they intreated the grand vizier to send an hundred thousand men into Hungary; and offered, on their part, to enter the hereditary countries of Austria with a powerful army, and to ravage the frontier provinces of Germany with fire and sword, to prevent the subsistence of any troops that might come to the assistance of the emperor: they consented also that the Turks should keep the places which they had conquered, leaving the rest of the kingdom at liberty, and satisfy themselves with an annual tribute.

which is discovered to the emperor by Tattenbach's servant.

THE sultan being then at war with the Persians, was not much disposed to break with the emperor: he therefore refused to engage with the Hungarians, unless the places of strength were put in his possession as a security, and even made no difficulty of revealing indirectly the secret negotiations with the malcontents. The emperor having notice of this from his resident at the Porte, was afterwards fully informed of the plot, by means of the count of Tattenbach's servant, who having been imprisoned by his master upon a suspicion of robbery, and thinking to be revenged and regain his liberty, sent some papers relating to the conspiracy, written by Tattenbach's own hand, to Vienna. Leopold, upon this discovery, sent orders to the chancellor of Gratz, diligently to observe the conduct of Tattenbach.

AT the beginning of Lent count Serini took the field, to the surprize of all those who were ignorant of the conspiracy. Tattenbach, to avoid suspicion of being concerned with him, offered to the chancellor to endeavour to discover his intentions, and soon after came to Gratz, to take his place at the council; but was immediately arrested, and an officer sent to his castle to seize his papers; upon which he confessed the engagements he had with count Serini, a copy of which information was sent to the emperor. While the count Serini was to act in Croatia, and keep up the spirit of the Walachians, who had already joined him with eight thousand men, Ragotski had promised to seize Montasch in Upper Hungary, where his father's treasures lay; and coming to Tokay, where he treacherously surprized the governor and some of his chief officers, he endeavoured to make himself master of the town; but being repulsed, he marched to Montasch, where the gates were shut against him by his mother, and the cannon pointed to answer his demands.

The emperor asks assistance from the diet of the empire.

THE emperor, finding that the malcontents were growing powerful, resolved to reduce them by force, and ordered the march of some troops into Hungary; and, that his conduct might be approved by the states of the empire, sent a copy of some of the conspirators letters to the diet at Ratisbon, and demanded the assistance of the states against the rebels and Turks. The diet promised an assistance of twenty-six thousand men; but not being able to agree upon the number that each member should furnish, they concluded nothing that year. Besides the troops that were sent into Hungary, major-general Spankau was sent with six thousand men and eight pieces of cannon against count Serini in Croatia, who was then greatly embarrassed, the Walachians having deserted from him for want of pay, and he having failed in his enterprize against Copnanitz, which he had promised to deliver to the Turks. The malcontents of Upper Hungary not rising as he expected, and the imperial army advancing to besiege him, he was persuaded to implore the mercy of the emperor: but while a monk mediated a reconciliation, Spankau besieged Schaketorn with the imperial army; and, denying any knowledge of a treaty, pressed the town so vigorously, that count Serini, despairing of defending it, endeavoured to escape with his brother-in-law, count Frangipani; but they were both taken, and carried prisoners to Vienna.

WHILE Spankau was reducing Croatia, Ragotski had besieged Tokai and Zatbmar in Upper Hungary, and had seized all the passes, to prevent the imperial army from coming to relieve them; but receiving a letter from count Serini, by a messenger of the emperor, asking the liberty of the governor and officers of Tokai, and exhorting him to submit to his sovereign as he had done; at the same time he judging it was impossible to continue the war without ruining himself, and glad to have propositions made to him by the emperor; immediately laid down his arms, and set his prisoners at liberty, praying their assistance to procure his pardon; which at length, by the mediation of his mother, was granted to him, together with the possession of all his former estates.

THE emperor, having now no more to fear from the malcontents, summoned to Vienna the chiefs of the nobility of Upper Hungary; and at the same time declared, that those who

a refused to appear should be judged guilty of treason, and proceeded against by military execution. Soon after Pagiferents, the secretary of the association, being taken at Caſſovia, there were found in his chamber five boxes full of letters and papers relating to the conspiracy, by which it was discovered that Nadaſti was alſo one of the conspirators. He, being ſeized, confeſſed himſelf guilty; and only requested of the emperor to ſpare his children, who had not been concerned in the crime.

By means of theſe letters Leopold being informed of every thing relating to the plot, appointed judges to try the rebels. Serini, Nadaſti, Frangipani, and Tattembach, were condemned to be degraded from their nobility, and to have their heads and right hands cut off: all their goods were conſiſcated, and their children obliged to change their names and coats of arms <sup>k</sup>. Serini, Nadaſti, Frangipani, and Tattembach, are condemned and executed.

To put a final end to theſe troubles, all the nobility and the deputies of the counties of Upper and Lower Hungary were ſummoned to a diet at Preſburg, which opened on the firſt of January; but the deputies of Upper Hungary refuſing to come, unleſs ſafe-conducts were granted to them, the aſſembly was prorogued till the third of February, when it was ſoon underſtood, that the Hungarians had no deſire to contribute to the ſubſiſtence of the troops; and for that reaſon they delayed coming to a concluſion of any affair <sup>l</sup>. The emperor being informed of this immediately, made ſeveral regiments that were in Bohemia, Stiria, Moravia, and Austria, march into Hungary; which the malcontents perceiving, they had recourſe to his clemency, and endeavoured by their ſubmiſſions to ſurpaſs his moſt faithful ſubjects: however, they demanded to be freed from the payment of money to the German ſoldiers, and propoſed to the emperor to aſſign their ſubſiſtence out of the conſiſcated eſtates; but he refuſed, and told them, that by their revolt they had loſt their privileges, and had no other part to chuſe but that of ſubmiſſion; and, far from granting what they deſired, he obliged them to maintain thirty thouſand men, to pay their uſual taxes, and to puniſh the ſeditious.

While the emperor was employed in ſettling the affairs of Hungary, Lewis the fourteenth was preparing to invade the Dutch, having taken umbrage at the triple alliance formed between them, the English, and Swedes, to preſerve the tranquillity of Europe, and chiefly deſigned to reſtrain his ambitious views. Having ſucceeded at the courts of England and Sweden in diſſolving the triple alliance, and ſecuring them to his intereſt, he likewiſe made a treaty with the elector of Cologne, the biſhop of Munſter, and ſeveral other princes of Germany; and alſo prevailed upon the emperor to obſerve a neutrality, provided he made no attempt upon the territories of the empire: but he could obtain nothing of the elector of Brandenburg, but an ambaffador ſent to France to diſſuade him from making war againſt the Dutch; on the contrary, that elector made an alliance with the ſtates-general <sup>m</sup>, and engaged to furniſh them with twenty thouſand men, one half of whom were to be payed by the ſtates, who, having foreſeen the deſigns of the French king, were taking all poſſible precautions to oppoſe him; and, by their ambaffador at Madrid, had engaged the court of Spain to furniſh them with money, and ſix thouſand men from Oſtend, beſides the recruits they were raiſing in the territories of ſeveral princes of Germany, and ſix thouſand Swiſs, brought by the count de Dobna. Other ſuccours were promiſed them, and conſiderable levies were expected from the prince of Anhalt; and the command of all their forces was given to prince Waldeck, and lieutenant-general Wurts: but the great preparations of Lewis the fourteenth, and the public calamity that threatened, ſo terrified the people of Holland, that they not only declared William prince of Orange captain-general and admiral of the republic, but in a tumultuous manner altered their preſent form of government, and elected him ſtadtholder and governor-general of their armies by ſea and land. That prince was then but nineteen years of age, and became afterwards the moſt indefatigable enemy of the ambitious ſchemes of Lewis the fourteenth.

f THE English began the firſt hoſtilities, by attacking the Dutch fleet returning from Smyrna; and, in the beginning of March, the French king marched with one hundred and twenty thouſand men towards the Rhine, the elector of Cologne having opened to him all the paſſes into his country. At the ſame time the biſhop of Munſter entered with all his forces into the northern provinces of the republic: the French immediately took Orſoy, Burich, Wefel, and Rhinberg; and paſſing the Rhine at Tolkouſe, they took Arnheim, the fort of Shenck, Utrecht, Doſsburg, Zutphen, Nimeguen, Naerden, the fort of Crevecoeur, the iſle and city of Bornel and Bodegrave; having, in a few months, paſſed three rivers, conquered the three provinces of Guelders, Utrecht, and Overyſſel, and taken forty towns. The troops of the biſhop of Munſter and the elector of Cologne, being joined, had taken Grool, Borkelo, Lochen, Krewort, and were ſet down before Deventer, which was obliged to ſurrender the twenty-ſecond of June, after having made a moſt vigorous defence. afterwards took Couvorde, and on the twenty-seventh of July opened the trenches before Groningen, but was obliged to raise the siege with loss; and the Hollanders recovering Couvorde, drove the troops of Munster from all the places which they had possessed in the province of Groningen.

Leopold resolves to assist the states-general.

THESE rapid conquests of the French caused the emperor and several princes of Germany to declare for Holland; and, in the month of August, Leopold wrote to all the members of the empire to unite themselves for the common safety of the Germanic body, and to recall their troops which were in the service of France and England; and although the elector of Bavaria and the French ambassador, by their intrigues at Vienna, endeavoured to prevent any assistance being sent to the Hollanders, yet Leopold made a treaty with them, and engaged to furnish thirty thousand men to join the forces of the elector of Brandenburg; and the treaty being published, was followed with a manifesto, wherein the emperor declared, that, as guarantee of the treaties of Westphalia, which the French had broke, he proposed to hinder them from entering into the empire, and to stop their progress, which was now dreaded by all Europe.

A. D. 1673.

ON the thirty-first of January the elector of Brandenburg, at the head of twenty-six thousand men, and thirty pieces of cannon, and the duke of Bournonville, the imperial general, left Lipstadt, and marched towards Loest, where they learned that Turenne had left Holland, and was coming to meet them at the head of thirty thousand French. The only fruits of this diversion were, the evacuating of Groningen by the bishop of Munster, and the siege of Maestricht raised by the French; for though the elector of Brandenburg would have hazarded a battle, yet the imperial general, who had secret orders only to act defensively, would not give his consent. The elector not being powerful enough to act against the French by himself, was obliged to retire into the county of Ravensberg, while the Imperialists went towards Lippe; and the viscount Turenne following after him, and forcing the passes where he had left detachments, he was forced to quit Westphalia, and to retire into the bishopric of Hildesheim, while the French took possession of the dutchies of Cleves and Marck, and the city Wesel upon the Rhine. The bad success of this campaign making the Hollanders murmur against him, his friends represented to him, that he ought to make use of that conjuncture to be reconciled to Lewis the fourteenth. The states likewise, having omitted to pay the subsidies which they had promised, and all the provinces which the elector possessed in Westphalia being lost, he was disposed to make an accommodation with France; and a peace was concluded at Wofen, by which all his provinces were restored to him, except the cities of Retz and Wesel, which the French kept till the peace should be concluded with Holland: the elector promised not to give any more assistance to the Hollanders, reserving to himself, nevertheless, the liberty to defend the empire, in case it was attacked.

The elector of Brandenburg makes peace with the French.

THE French having put garrisons into too many places, which considerably weakened their army, and having neglected to possess themselves of Amsterdam, the soul of the republic; likewise Montecuculi, the imperial general, marching to join the prince of Orange, and prince Maurice, governor of Friseland, having gained several advantages over the bishop of Munster, Lewis the fourteenth saw that he could not long preserve his conquests; therefore accepted of the mediation of Sweden to negotiate a peace with the United Provinces. The place appointed for the congress was the city of Cologne; and the kings of France and England, and the states-general, sent their plenipotentiaries thither before the opening of the campaign. As a suspension of arms was not agreed upon, the prince of Conde arrived at Utrecht in the month of June, and formed a design of making himself master of Muiden; but being repulsed by the Hollanders, he endeavoured to let off the waters that overflowed the country, by opening the dykes towards the sea: but was obliged to desist from his attempt; for as the tide rose, he only let in more, which distressed his own army. The king of France succeeded better before Maestricht, which he besieged with an army of forty thousand men; and, though it was defended with the utmost bravery by the governor Farjau, obliged it to surrender on the thirtieth of June.

Lewis the fourteenth takes Maestricht, while the prince of Orange retakes Naerden and Bonn.

THE prince of Orange, not having forces sufficient to oppose the French army, employed himself in retaking the towns which the French had seized; and began with the siege of Naerden, which, after a week's defence, surrendered on the thirteenth of September. Afterwards marching his army into Brabant, he had a conference with the governor of Spanish Flanders, who promised to join him immediately with eight thousand men; and Montecuculi being then at Coblentz, the three armies marched in conjunction to besiege Bonn, which surrendered after nine days siege; as did Kerpen and Duren upon the first attack. These successes of the allies obliged the French to evacuate the three provinces of Holland, after having exacted heavy contributions, and secured the artillery and hostages at Maestricht and

- a Graves. Nevertheless, trusting to the advantages of the next campaign, they sought all means to retard the negotiations of peace, which was not now so impatiently desired by the allies, especially as they had conceived suspicions of the mediation of the Swedes, who, they believed, were too favourable to France; therefore the plenipotentiaries at Cologne spent their time more in ceremonies and entertainments than in business: and William count of Furstenberg, plenipotentiary for the elector of Cologne, having been seized and carried prisoner A. D. 1674. to Bonn by order of the emperor, gave occasion to Lewis the fourteenth to recal his ambassadors, and carry the war into the empire; although the emperor declared, that the reason why count Furstenberg was taken prisoner was, that, being a vassal of the empire and of the duke of Austria, he could not take upon himself the office of plenipotentiary against the interests of his master; that, besides, he was colonel of a regiment in the service of France, and had not obeyed the letters of revocation of the court of Vienna.
- b THE duke of Noailles having entered Franche comté, Leopold made a league with the Dutch and Spaniards: the elector of Brandenburg also promised to join the imperial army with six thousand men; and the elector Palatine, the dukes of Brunswick, and the landgrave of Hesse, acceded to the alliance<sup>1</sup>, which obliged the elector of Cologne and the bishop of Munster to abandon France; but the elector of Bavaria and the duke of Hanover remained neuter. Lewis the fourteenth, coming to the camp, began the campaign with the siege of Besançon, which surrendered in the end of May, the garrison being made prisoners of war. The French afterwards took Dole, Salins, the castles of Joux and St. Anne. Mean
- c while, the German troops desiring to enter Alsace, were prevented; the French having seized Germerheim, and the city of Strasbourg having denied them the use of their bridge; therefore they retired with their troops between Heidelberg and Philipsburg, where the duke of Bournonville was to join them with the imperial army: but the viscount Turenne, to prevent that junction, took the route of Epingem, and in five days came within sight of the Germans, who were encamped upon a rising-ground near Sintzheim, a small town of the Palatinate, under the command of the count Caprara and the duke of Lorraine. The two armies engaging, the Germans were defeated, and obliged to retire to Heidelberg<sup>2</sup>; from whence
- d from passing that river: but the viscount Turenne advanced with his army, and sent his cavalry to find out a ford, resolving to attack their intrenchments; upon which the imperial generals, declining an engagement, sent off their baggage, and in the beginning of the night decamped, and marched to Frankfort. The viscount Turenne, being now master of the Palatinate, not only allowed his army to live at discretion, but ravaged the whole country with fire and sword, destroying their woods, and setting fire to their houses and cornfields. These calamities of the elector-palatine awakened the other princes of Germany; and in less than a month the dukes of Brunswick, the elector of Cologne, and the new bishop of Munster, sent troops to join the imperial army, which was encamped between Mentz and Frankfort. These forces, when united, being greatly superior to the army of the viscount Turenne, he was obliged to repass the Rhine, and encamp at Landau; whilst the Imperialists passed over the bridge of Mentz, and, marching along the Rhine, encamped between Spire and Philipsburg, where, in a council of war, it was resolved to pass the Rhine, and take winter-quarters in Upper Alsace. Accordingly they passed over the bridge of Strasbourg, the emperor's resident having influenced the city to allow them, and encamping upon the river Ill, they waited for the elector of Brandenburg, who was coming to join them with a reinforcement of twenty thousand men. The viscount Turenne, though inferior in number, yet profiting of the advantage of the mutual jealousies among the allied generals, resolved to attack them before they were joined by the elector; and marching from Wantzenau, he advanced on the fourth of October, at break of day, in order of battle, where the duke of Bournonville, having placed a body of infantry with some cannon in a little wood, waited for him. The two armies looked at one another for more than an hour, without any action; but Turenne, fearing to be flanked from the wood, ordered it to be attacked; and, after a vigorous resistance, he made himself master of it, and took ten pieces of cannon. During the dispute in the wood, the allies fell upon the centre of the enemy's line, and, notwithstanding their heavy fire, broke through to the body of reserve; but being repulsed by some squadrons of horse, and the foot rallying and renewing their fire, they were intirely routed; and the night coming on, they retired beyond the Ill, leaving three thousand dead on the field<sup>3</sup>; and having encamped under the cannon of Strasbourg, waited for the arrival of the elector of Brandenburg, who, having been hindered by the difficulty days after. This strong reinforcement obliged Turenne to quit his post, and intrench himself behind the lines of Marleim; but the Imperialists passing the Brusch, he encamped at Wilfen, to cover Haguenau and Saverne. The elector of Brandenburg not being able to prevail upon the imperial general to hazard a battle, the two armies lay eight or ten days within a league of one another, without any hostilities; and the Germans, not having any magazines, were soon distressed for want of provisions, and obliged to return to Blaishheim, from whence they separated into winter-quarters in the cities of Upper Alsace.

WHILE Turenne protected the frontiers of France towards the Rhine, the prince of Conde attacked the prince of Orange at Senef; and the action continued till night, when the victory remained doubtful.

WHILE the war was continued by both parties with such earnestness, pope Clement X. did not cease to exhort the emperor and king of Spain to renounce the alliance of the Protestants, and be reconciled to France. He likewise pressed the most Christian king to turn his views towards peace, which now seemed also to be desired by the allied princes of Germany. But the emperor, Spain, and Holland, seemed to be far from entering into a negotiation: nevertheless, the states-general made some proposals of peace, which were rejected by the French as too high demands; and the allies, thinking their affairs in a prosperous way, would not submit to any alteration in the plan of accommodation.

A. D. 1675.

THE viscount Turenne, having received a reinforcement of ten thousand men from Flanders, advanced to Remiremont, and fell upon the quarters of the Imperialists, took a regiment of dragoons prisoners<sup>u</sup>, and defeated six thousand horse near Mulhausen, taking the generals Caprara and Tunewald, with several other officers, the duke of Bournonville retiring in haste to Colmar, the quarters of the troops of the elector. Turenne, still advancing, attacked the allies, who were posted betwixt the rivers of Turkeim and Colmar. The Imperialists, giving way, were supported by the elector of Brandenburg; and night drawing on, the French retired, and stood under arms, expecting to renew the engagement next day; but the allies decamped at eight in the evening, and repassed the Rhine at Strasburg, the Imperialists taking up their winter-quarters near Offenburg, and the elector of Brandenburg in Franconia.

THAT the elector might be called from assisting the Imperialists on the Rhine, the French had prevailed with the Swedes to invade the Marches of Brandenburg, though two years before they had made a defensive alliance with that elector<sup>x</sup>. The Swedes at first observed an exact discipline, committing no great hostilities for three or four months; their general declaring, that he would retire with his army whenever the elector should make his peace with France: but provisions beginning to fail, they used violence; and not only pillaged the country, but raised contributions upon several towns. The elector, who was then in Franconia, ordered the prince of Anhalt, governor of Pomerania, to make no opposition<sup>y</sup>; but to shut the gates of the cities, and remain in Berlin till he should arrive. At the same time he complained to the diet of Ratisbon; and on the ninth of March presented a memorial, in answer to one that the king of Sweden had sent to the diet in the month of December: he concluded with desiring, that, since the king of Sweden had used hostilities against one of the most faithful members of the empire, the diet would be pleased to declare him an enemy, and proceed against him according to the laws of the Germanic body. Though this memorial and several others were supported by the emperor, yet it was not before the middle of July that Sweden was declared an enemy of the empire; the elector having left Franconia, and arrived at Magdeburg, a month before. During his absence, the Swedes had over-run all Pomerania, and taken a great many towns; but, from the moment of his arrival, affairs so suddenly changed their appearance, that in less than twelve days all the country was retaken, and the Swedes repulsed with considerable loss. As the Swedes met with no opposition, they had divided their army into several bodies, that their conquests might be the more extensive; but, as there were no posts then established in Germany, they had no information of the elector's long march, till they were surprised by him at Rathenau; upon which that part of their army that was at Brandenburg marched towards Therbellin, where they were to be joined by general Wrangel, with some other of their troops: but the elector not waiting for his infantry, but pursuing them with five thousand six hundred horse, and twelve pieces of cannon, immediately attacked them; and killing three thousand of their men, the remains of their army retired into Therbellin, and broke down the bridge after them; but not thinking themselves safe there, they retreated with precipitation into the dutchy of Mecklenburg.

- a cut off the communication between Strasbourg and the imperial army, resolved to pass the Rhine, and succeeded in his enterprize, before the Imperialists had any knowledge of his purpose. Having taken Wilstadt, he extended his army along the Rhine, to prevent the Imperialists from passing it; while Montecuculli, having thrown succours into Offenbourg, lay with his army at Reuchen. The viscount Turenne, after a sharp dispute, having posted himself at Acheren, obliged the Imperialists to retire to Bibl, leaving one hundred men in the castle and church-yard of Salsbach, with orders to defend them to the last extremity; but the French advancing, drew up their cannon against the castle; which Montecuculli observing, marched up with his army, with the design of an engagement, and about one in the afternoon brought his cannon to play upon the French. Turenne, finding that his batteries were too low to have any effect, and those of the Imperialists bore upon his camp, went, with some officers, to view a rising-ground, where a battery might be raised to dismount that of the enemy; and while he was talking to the officers, he received a ball upon his breast, and fell dead upon his horse's neck.

AFTER the death of the viscount Turenne, the French, in a council of war, resolved to decamp, and repass the Rhine at Altenheim, where they had their bridges; and marching off on the twenty-ninth of July, in the evening, they were attacked by Montecuculli in passing the Cheutre; and after an action of ten hours, in which they lost many men, and a great part of their baggage, they were obliged to retire with precipitation to Altenheim, where passing the Rhine, they intrenched themselves on the other side.

- c THE emperor, to free Montecuculli from a part of his enemies, desired the princes of Lunenburg, and the duke of Lorraine, to march their troops towards the Lower Rhine, and make a diversion by besieging the city of Triers. The marshal Crequi, being informed of their intention, immediately marched to Metz: and having received a reinforcement from the army of the prince of Conde, he encamped on the Saverne, with a design of marching to the assistance of the besieged. The allies, not thinking it proper to wait for him, quitted their lines, and marched to attack him. The marquis of Grana began the engagement against the left wing of the French, and drove them from a rising-ground sword in hand. The cavalry of Zell, in the left wing of the allies, at first gave ground; but the duke of Zell rallying them, brought them back, and attacking the French in flank, their cavalry fled, and left the foot to be cut in pieces by the conquerors, who falling in sword in hand, entirely routed them. The French lost their cannon, mules, carts, and baggage, and almost all their generals were either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. The allies returned to their lines; and having received a reinforcement, continued the siege of Triers, which surrendered on the twentieth day; and the dukes of Brunswick and Lunenburg having taken possession of the town, left the army, and went to secure their own territories, fearing that the duke of Hanover should declare in favour of the Swedes, against the elector of Brandenburg<sup>2</sup>. The duke of Lorraine dying soon after the battle, his nephew succeeded him, and led the troops of Lorraine into Alsace, to join the imperial army.

The allies besiege Triers, and defeat the French army.

- e THE elector of Brandenburg, being assisted by the Imperialists, and having prevailed with Denmark and Holland to declare war against Sweden, attacked their provinces in his turn; and entering Pomerania, took Wolgast, and the island of Wollin; while the Danes made themselves masters of Damgarten and Wismar; and the bishop of Munster, at the head of seven thousand troops, invaded the duchies of Bremen and Verden, taking all the small fortresses of the country. Afterwards, the duke of Zell taking the command, and a reinforcement of three thousand Danes arriving, the allies besieged Staden, which, after a long blockade, was obliged to surrender, and completed the conquest of Bremen, which immediately became the subject of dispute to the conquerors, the bishop of Munster pretending it ought to be ceded to him as a reward for his services to the allies, was supported by the emperor, who desired to see the Catholic religion prevail in that duchy. On the other side, the king of Denmark, the elector of Brandenburg, and the dukes of Lunenburg, proposed to divide that country among themselves, to the exclusion of the bishop of Munster<sup>3</sup>, who had always disturbed the Protestants in the exercise of their religion; but at length a congress being formed at Bremen by commissaries from the emperor, a treaty was concluded, which settled the division.

- g THE losses of Sweden did not greatly affect the king of France, as his arms were superior in the Low Countries; the marechal d'Humieres having taken Lokeren, and several other places in the country of Vaes; the marechal Crequi having taken Conde by an assault, and made the garrison prisoners of war, the citadels of Liege and Hui being destroyed, and the duchies of Cleves and Juliers ravaged. The prince of Orange, to repair these losses, sat down before Maestricht, but was obliged to raise the siege the twenty-seventh of August, upon the approach of marechal Schomberg, while the marechal d'Humieres took Aire, and the duke of Orleans made himself master of Bouchain.

are defeated in Alsace by the duke of Lor-rain,

THE French were not so happy upon the Rhine; for Montecuculli having obtained leave of a the emperor to retire to Vienna upon account of his infirmities, the command of the imperial army was given to the duke of Lorraine, one of the greatest generals that the house of Austria ever had. He, having passed the Rhine in the beginning of May, immediately formed the design of besieging Philipsburg, and took the fort of that city on this side the river in four days, and afterwards marched with his army into Upper Alsace, against the duke of Luxemburg, who was encamped near Scelestat. The two armies were in view of one another on the fourth of June, near the little river Roubr, which separated them. The duke of Lorraine marching towards Saverne, the duke of Luxemburg, to cover that town, marched in haste by Ziberstzig, leaving dragoons and infantry in the passes, to prevent the Imperialists from interrupting his march; but the Germans soon forced the French horse, and pursuing b their army, came up with it as the last squadron was passing the Sorre<sup>b</sup>. The French army having passed the river, and drawn up within pistol-shot of the bank, were attacked by the Imperialists with such fury, that they were quickly put into disorder, and would have been entirely routed, had not the English infantry supported the charge of the Austrians, till the duke of Luxemburg had rallied the French, who continuing their march, encamped under the counterescarp of Saverne. The duke of Lorraine followed them, and raising three batteries upon a rising-ground, cannonaded them for four days; but the elector-palatine making great complaints of the garrison of Philipsburg, the emperor sent an express order to the duke to besiege that city, notwithstanding he wrote to Vienna, that he would oblige the French army to surrender at discretion in fifteen days. Marching his army towards Stras- c burg, he there embarked his infantry and heavy cannon, and advanced with the rest towards Philipsburg. The trenches were opened on the twenty-sixth of June, and, after the siege was well advanced, an unexpected event put all into disorder; for the Rhine suddenly overflowing, washed down the tents, filled the trenches, and ruined the batteries; so that the besiegers had all to begin anew. The duke of Luxemburg likewise, at the head of forty-five thousand men, made several attempts to assist the town; but not succeeding, he endeavoured to draw off the duke of Lorraine, by marching to besiege Friburg. Having spent much time in building a bridge over the Rhine, the duke followed him with his cavalry, with the intention of engaging him. Luxemburg, surprised at his approach, retired under the cannon of Brisack, repassed the Rhine, and marched towards Scelestat. The duke of d Lorraine, returning to Philipsburg, summoned the governor to surrender, who at last capitulated on the tenth of September, the garrison having leave to march out with drums beating, and matches lighted. After the reduction of Philipsburg, the duke of Lorraine wanted to force the duke of Luxemburg either to repass the Rhine, or consent to a battle: for this purpose he advanced upon him, and drove him under the walls of Brisack, where his situation was so advantageous, that he could not be attacked; therefore the duke of Lorraine marching towards Rhinfeld, caused them to lay over a bridge of boats, as tho' he had a mind to repass the river at that place. The duke of Luxemburg apprehending this, repassed the Rhine, to observe him on the other side, and possessed the passes, to hinder the Imperialists from entering into the county of Burgundy: but the season being far advanced, the imper- e ial troops went into winter-quarters in Suabia and Franconia; and the French army having sent some of their forces into Lorraine, and others into Burgundy, remained in Alsace.

The baron de Montclar pursues the duke of Saxe-Eisenac, and obliges
him to surrender.

THE duke of Lorraine, having heard at Florainville of the raising of the siege of Charleroi, marched with his army towards Alsace, with a design to join the duke of Saxe Eisenac, who, with twelve thousand men, opposed the French troops commanded by the baron de Montclar, and had even shut them up in a place where they must have perished for want of provisions, had not the marechal de Crequi relieved them at the time when he was observing the march of the duke of Lorraine upon the Moselle. The baron likewise having received a reinforce- ment of men, now obliged the duke of Saxe to repass the Rhine at Brisack, and retire in his f turn to Strasburg; and following him at the head of ten thousand horse, forced him into an island of the Rhine, between the bridge and the city. The prince of Saxe, waiting for the arrival of the duke of Lorraine, endeavoured to subsist in that place as well as he could, with the assistance of the citizens of Strasburg, who had declared for the emperor<sup>c</sup>: but at length they, dreading the menaces of the marechal Crequi, ceased to send him provisions, and only acted as mediators betwixt the two generals, making a kind of accommodation, by which the duke of Saxe obtained the liberty of marching out with all his forces, and retiring into Germany, upon condition that neither he, nor his troops, should carry arms against France during the rest of the campaign.

WHILE the duke of Lorraine was marching to the relief of the prince of Saxe, he heard of his accommodation; but continuing his route, he passed the Rhine over the bridge of Stras- g burg, and following the French army, found it encamped near Heckersberg. Sending major-

- a general Schultz, with a large detachment of cavalry, to observe the disposition of their army; there followed an engagement betwixt thirty-six squadrons of the French and the detachment, in which it would have wholly been cut to pieces, had not the duke of Lorrain come in person to their assistance, and forced the French to return to their camp. Soon after, the duke received orders from the court of Vienna to put his troops into winter-quarters, which he was obliged to submit to, although he represented, that it was to be feared that the marechal Crequi, who was still in arms, would form some enterprize against Friburg, as soon as the imperial army should be dispersed into quarters. The imperial camp was no sooner broke up, than Friburg was invested by the French; which when the duke of Lorrain heard of, he dispatched a messenger to the governor of the place, assuring him of immediate assistance; and drawing out the garrisons from the neighbouring places, he marched to his relief; but the town surrendered before he arrived, not without suspicion that the governor, major-general Schultz, had been gained by the French. Notwithstanding the advanced season, marechal Crequi marched against Walkirck, which he razed, with some castles in the neighbourhood. Afterwards he repassed the Rhine, and went into winter quarters. The duke of Lorrain marching to Worms, and putting garrisons into all the places near Friburg, went to Vienna to conclude his marriage with the princess Eleonore, sister of Leopold.

Friburg surrenders to the French.

- THE Swedes, who prevailed against the king of Denmark, had not the same success in Pomerania against the elector, who, having made himself master of the greatest part of Pomerania, now besieged Stetin, the capital. After a blockade of five months, he ordered the trenches to be opened the sixth of June<sup>c</sup>. The siege was maintained by the soldiers and citizens with the utmost vigour till the end of December, when, at last, the Swedes having failed in their attempts to relieve the place, the garrison, who were now reduced to three hundred men, were obliged to capitulate on the twenty-fifth of December for want of ammunition; and on the first of January marched out, drums beating, colours flying, with their arms and baggage, and were conducted to Livonia, the Germans only being detained, agreeable to the emperor's letters of avocation<sup>f</sup>.

The elector of Brandenburg makes himself master of Stetin.

- IN Pomerania, after the taking of Stetin, the Swedes possessed nothing but the cities of Stralsund and Gripswald, which were likewise soon obliged to submit to the conqueror. The elector of Brandenburg having assembled several small vessels, under the command of admiral Trump, and having got a reinforcement of four thousand men, embarked his troops, and made a descent upon the island of Rugen: having defeated the Swedes, and taken Febrschantz and the port of Putbus, he passed over to Stralsund, where the count of Konigsmarck commanded, with one thousand six hundred horse and six hundred foot. Three thousand of the citizens had likewise taken up arms, and, with a resolution of vigorously defending the town, had themselves set fire to the suburbs; but the elector landing his artillery, so furiously bombarded the town, that in a short time one half of it was in flames. The citizens, affrighted, immediately raised a flag of truce, without the knowledge of the governor; upon which the elector ceased firing, and sent a trumpet into the town to know if they would capitulate; but the count of Konigsmarck, pointing the cannon of the ramparts upon the town, threatened to hang those that dared to mention a capitulation. The besiegers renewing their bombardment, and the bombs having set fire to seven places of the town, and burnt the magazine, the flag of truce was again raised, with the permission of Konigsmarck, and two deputies sent to the camp of the elector, who submitted to the terms of capitulation he prescribed. After Stralsund had surrendered, the elector ordered the baron of Dorstin to besiege Gripswald, which was likewise bombarded, and the garrison obliged to surrender at discretion, before the Swedes could come to their assistance. By the reduction of this place, the elector completed the conquest of Pomerania.

The elector takes Putbus, Stralsund, and Gripswald.

- THE duke of Lorrain having begun the campaign in Alsace, in the month of May, encamped near Offenburg, at the head of an army of forty thousand men, with a design to besiege Friburg; but he disposed his army, as though he had an intention of passing the Rhine at Strasburg, and marching into Upper Alsace. The motions of the duke obliged the marechal de Crequi to reinforce the garrison of Friburg, and encamped near Colmar, with a view to assist Alsace, or in case of need to enter into Brissgaw; but hearing that the prince of Baden was clearing the roads leading to Friburg, and preparing magazines for a siege, he passed the Rhine, and encamped not far from Brissack. The duke of Lorrain seeing all his measures broke, posted himself between Brissack and the French army, with an intention of bringing the enemy to an engagement; but the marechal Crequi leaving his camp, went and fortified himself within half a league of Friburg; but the duke cutting off supplies from him, he was obliged to march into Alsace; and that the Imperialists might be prevented from following him, he demanded of the city of Strasburg to have the fort, which commanded the bridge on the side of Germany, to be put into his hands, alledging, that it was to hinder them from breaking the neutrality. The magistrates having refused to deliver the fort, he ordered it to be attacked, and, on the seventeenth of July carried it, having killed or taken prisoners all those that defended it : afterwards razing the fort, and burning part of the bridge towards Germany, he entered Alsace, and continued in the neighbourhood of Strasburg. The duke of Lorraine fearing that he would undertake the siege of that city, immediately sent in boats one thousand foot, and four hundred horse, who were received into the town. Crequi regarding that action as a breach of the neutrality, ordered the two forts betwixt Strasburg and the Rhine, on the side of Alsace, to be attacked, while the duke of Lorraine passed that river near Philipsburg, and having made himself master of Landau, pillaged it, and afterwards defeated some detachments of French troops.

THE cause of the little success of the Imperialists this year upon the Rhine was chiefly owing to the neglect of the court of Vienna, in not furnishing the duke of Lorraine with money and magazines, for the subsistence of his troops, and undertaking the siege of Friburg ; besides, the princes of Germany disgusted with the war, did not serve with the same ardour as they had done in the beginning ; and the Hollanders, who wanted a peace, made such a weak resistance in the Low Countries, that the French were at liberty to send great detachments from thence to strengthen their army in Germany ; and the king of Denmark, and the elector of Brandenburg, wholly employed with their conquests in Sweden, thought of nothing but augmenting them ; the emperor also, more attentive to the troubles of Hungary, than the war in Alsace, thought chiefly of reducing the malcontents of that kingdom.

Leopold suppresses the office of palatine of Hungary, and appoints a viceroy for that kingdom.

LEOPOLD, considering the government of Hungary, and determining to suppress the office of palatine, because it put too much power into the hands of one person, adjudged it more proper to govern that kingdom by a viceroy, who, holding all his authority from him, and subject to be recalled at pleasure, would be always submissive to his orders. Accordingly, five years before, he had established at Presburg a sovereign court, under the direction of prince John Gaspar Ampringen, grand master of the Teutnick order, and prince of the empire. As this prince was a native of Hungary, it was thought that he would not be suspected by the nobility of that kingdom : but the change of government, far from appeasing the troubles, only augmented the number of malcontents ; and the proceedings of the sovereign court determined them at last to take arms, in defence of their privileges. They surprised some places, and had several engagements, in which they were sometimes superior, and at other times defeated, which obliged the emperor to send a reinforcement of ten thousand men to general Spankau, who commanded in that kingdom.

The malcontents threaten to throw off the yoke of Austria, and chuse a king of their own nation.

BUT this year the number of malcontents increased so much, that the imperial court was fully resolved either to quiet them entirely, or to ruin them. The use of three churches in Upper Hungary was offered to be restored to them ; but this offer provoked them the more, and they talked of throwing off the yoke of Austria, and chusing a king of their own nation. Some Hungarian troops likewise having taken up their quarters in the territory of Waradin, the emperor's general complained of it to the bashaw of that city, as an infraction of the peace. He answered, that he could not refuse lodging to those people, whom the sultan did not look upon as enemies ; that he had received them as Hungarians, and not as rebels and traitors, they living peaceably, and paying for the provisions which they bought.

They are supported by the Turks.

LEOPOLD, judging by this haughty answer that the Turks favoured the malcontents, sent Hoffman, secretary at war, to Constantinople, to complain to the grand vizier of the assistance which the bashaws of the frontiers gave to the rebels of Hungary. The vizier answered, that the invincible sultan, his master, was ready to renew the peace with the emperor, and refuse assistance to the Hungarians <sup>b</sup>, provided the emperor, in acknowledgment of that benefit, would pay an annual tribute to his highness, and grant him some claims which he had upon the frontiers. During this negotiation at Constantinople, the states of Hungary had assembled at Oedenberg ; it was there resolved to consent to the restitution of all the churches to the Protestants, and to abate in several other points, that the malcontents might be drawn off from their engagements with the Turks. Mean while, the Hungarian lords whom the emperor had ordered to Vienna, represented to him that the change which had been made in the government, terrified the nation, and that they could not be quieted but by re-establishing in some measure their former privileges ; that they would be contented with the re-establishment of the office of palatine of the kingdom, the convocation of a general diet, and the restoring of the churches to the Protestants. The imperial ministers consented to the re-establishment of the palatine ; but they limited his power in such a manner, that he would entirely have depended upon the emperor ; they

a wanted, that the diet should never be assembled but by the command of his imperial majesty; lastly, they eluded the demand of restoring the churches, so that the deputies understood the ministers only designed to amuse the Hungarians, by pretending to enter into an accommodation.

ABAFFI, vaivode of Transylvania, having defeated a competitor by the assistance of the malcontents, in return sent them the greatest part of his troops, commanded by count Emerick Tekeli, son of Stephen Tekeli, who had been one of the richest lords in Upper Hungary. As he professed the Lutheran religion, and had a great estate, he became so criminal in the eyes of the ministers of Vienna, that they persuaded the emperor to order him to be besieged in his own castle. He dying during the siege, his son Emerick, then fifteen years of age, seeing the garrison about to surrender, saved himself in the night with some of his friends, and afterwards fled to Poland, believing the king might procure his pardon with the emperor; but being soon undeceived, he retired into Transylvania, and so distinguished himself by his merit, and the wisdom of his conduct, that Abaffi made him his prime minister, and gave him the command of the troops which he sent to the assistance of the malcontents<sup>1</sup>. Soon after his arrival count Wesselen, their general, dying, they gave him the command of their armies, in consequence of which, and of the great success of his arms, he afterwards took the title of, Prince and Protector of the Kingdom.

TEKELI, at the head of an army of twelve thousand men, entered Upper Hungary, and marched directly for Mongatz, whither he was conducted by his affection for the daughter of count Serini, widow of Francis Ragotski. Her mother-in-law, a strict Catholic, had hitherto opposed the marriage, and sent some troops to fall upon the quarters of Tekeli; which being entirely defeated, and a son of count Serini taken prisoner, by his means the alliance was concluded, and the marriage soon after celebrated. Mean while the imperial army, being too weak to venture an engagement with the malcontents, retired under the cannon of Eperies. Then Tekeli published a manifesto, declaring his design of re-establishing the kingdom of Hungary in its antient rights, exhorting all honest Hungarians to join him, and threatening to treat those as enemies who should oppose his designs, or even be indifferent in the present conjunction. By this declaration he soon augmented his army to twenty thousand men, with which he marched in the month of August towards Eperies, which he carried in three days; and by the end of September saw himself master of all the places in the neighbourhood of the mountains of Krapach. Afterwards he took Rosenberg, and detached two thousand Tartars, who passed the Wag in sight of all the Imperialists, ravaged Moravia, and penetrated into Austria on this side the Danube. The season being advanced, it was resolved in a council of war to put the troops into winter-quarters, and wait for the succours that were sent from Transylvania. Tekeli marching towards Stetin, and hearing that count Leslie, who commanded the Imperialists, was at Zathmar, he resolved to attack him; and having routed his army, he pursued them over the mountains, putting all to the sword whom he found. About this time likewise, one named Father Joseph, who had turned Protestant, put himself at the head of six thousand men, and calling himself Jeshua, and the Deliverer of the persecuted Hungarian Protestants, entered into the hereditary countries of the house of Austria, where he spread so great a terror, that the inhabitants abandoned their houses, and fled for safety to Vienna. The cities in the mountains also declaring for the malcontents, Tekeli went and besieged Altsohl, which he took by storm, and afterwards made himself master of Newsohl, Chemnitz, Bolsenaw, and Lipora.

The court of Vienna, alarmed at all these conquests which the imperial army could not prevent, charged the bishop of Strigonia, primate of Hungary, to negotiate an accommodation. This prince declaring himself mediator of the differences, Tekeli, and the other chiefs of the malcontents, laid before him their demands: they required, that a general amnesty, without any exception, should be granted for all that was past; that the Protestants should be allowed the free use of their religion, and the churches should be restored to the Lutherans as well as Calvinists; that the confiscated estates should again be restored to those who were dispossessed of them; that the diet should be allowed to elect a palatine of their nation, who should enjoy all the antient prerogatives, rights, and authorities, annexed to that dignity. Though the emperor had no intention to grant these demands, yet as he heard that they threatened to deliver all the cities in the mountains to the Turks, and had offered to the bashaws on the frontiers, to oblige them to take an oath of fidelity to the Grand Seignior, he answered, that he would make known his intentions to the Hungarians that remained faithful, who might inform the malcontents.

during this negotiation, the imperial general, having received some troops that he expected, resolved to attack the malcontents; and having first taken possession of the passes in the mountains, to prevent the Turks from joining them, he marched against Tekeli and

Babam, whom he found near Alisöl, in order of battle. Towards the end of the engagement, the Imperialists receiving a reinforcement obliged the malcontents to retreat under the cannon of Alisöl, having passed the mountains in good order, notwithstanding twenty squadrons of the enemy undertook to cut off their retreat. Next day Tekeli, having received a reinforcement of one thousand men, returned to the plain, and encamped under Carpfen. The city of Bustruck having broke the neutrality, and fired upon his army, he attacked it so vigorously, that in a few hours he made himself master of it, and caused the heads of the principal citizens to be struck off, as a punishment for their infidelity. After this expedition he agreed upon a truce for some months with the imperial general.

SUCH was the situation of the affairs of Hungary, while the powers of Europe were negotiating a peace at Nimeguen. In the month of April the French king had declared the conditions upon which he would conclude a peace with the empire. He demanded Franchecomté to be annexed to France for ever; likewise a part of Spanish Flanders, and the city of Friburg in the Brisgaw, upon condition of leaving Philipsburg and all its dependencies to the emperor<sup>k</sup>. He obliged himself also to restore Lorrain to prince Charles, but under such conditions as were never accepted of by that duke. The states-general being very desirous of peace, and, by the favourable offers of the French, being inclined to desert the allies, the emperor was at last obliged to consent to the demands of the plenipotentiaries of France: the treaty of peace was signed on the fifth of February, and afterwards ratified by the emperor<sup>l</sup>.

C H A P. XXII.

DURING the negotiations of peace at Nimeguen, Van Gale the bishop of Munster died, at the age of seventy-one, after having reigned twenty-eight years. His death was the occasion of new disputes among the allies in the North, who, neglecting his successor, thought only of seizing his part of the duchy of Bremen; the elector of Brandenburg complaining to the court of Vienna of the invasion of the duke of Lunenbourg, who thought he justified himself by saying, he only prevented the king of Denmark. The emperor, displeased with the conduct of the duke of Lunenbourg, obliged him to restore to the successor of Van Gale what he had taken from him: but he did not long enjoy the new conquests; for soon after, making peace with France and Sweden, he was obliged to restore to the last all that his predecessor had possessed in the duchies of Bremen and Verden. The emperor likewise concluding a peace with that crown, it was agreed, that the pacification of Westphalia should be the rule and foundation of the treaty; and that all acts, decrees, and commissions, declaring Sweden an enemy of the empire, and depriving it of the advantages of the peace of Munster, should be null and void<sup>m</sup>.

The Swedes invade Prussia, but are repulsed by the elector.

THE elector of Brandenburg and the king of Denmark, seeing themselves thus abandoned by their allies, protested against these particular treaties. The elector hearing that sixteen thousand Swedes, under the command of general Horn, had invaded Prussia, burnt the suburbs of Memel, made themselves masters of Tilse and Insterburg, and over-run the greatest part of the country, leaving Berlin on the tenth of January, and putting himself at the head of nine thousand men, he passed the Vistula on the fifteenth. The Swedes, confounded at his approach, hastily retired; and Gortz, the elector's general, pursuing them, harrassed them in their march, which disorder ruined almost the half of their army. The elector, advancing to the gulph of Frisch, drew his infantry over the ice in sledges; and arriving at Labiaw on the gulph of Courland, he sent five thousand horse to interrupt the march of the Swedes; and using sledges likewise upon the gulph of Courland, he arrived within three miles of Tilse, the Swedish quarters, on the nineteenth of January. He learned the same day that his horse had defeated two regiments of the enemy; and that, upon the news of his arrival, the Swedes had abandoned Tilse, and retired towards Courland. Gortz, pursuing them towards Quadjuc, fell in with their rear, and entirely routed them, returning to the elector with much booty, and a great number of prisoners. The remains of the Swedish army that returned to Livonia scarce amounted to three thousand<sup>n</sup>.

THESE successes were of no advantage to the elector; for the time of the cessation of arms, which was prolonged to the first of May, being expired, Lewis XIV. rejecting all propositions made by the ministers of the elector for a particular accommodation, insisted

- a upon the intire re-establishment of the Swedes; and ordered general Caino, with the troops that were in the countries of Cleves and Juhers, to pass the Rhine, and enter the principality of Minden. The general of the elector, not being in a condition to oppose them, had a conference with the marquis de Croissy, and procured the cessation to be again prolonged to the nineteenth of the month. Mean while, his ambassador at the French court, still hoping to negotiate a particular treaty, delayed signing the peace till the day after the cessation expired<sup>o</sup>; so that the marechal Crequi had advanced to the gates of Minden, and beat general Spaan, who, at the head of three thousand men and some cannon, opposed his passing the Wefer, before the news of the peace had reached his camp. The treaty of Westphalia served as a foundation for this peace of St. Germain; only, to avoid future differences about limits, the king of Sweden ceded to the elector some lands beyond the Oder, and the property of all the customs of the ports in Further Pomerania. The elector, on his side, promised to restore to Sweden all the provinces that he had conquered, and not to assist the king of Denmark, upon condition that France evacuated his provinces of Westphalia, and payed him three hundred thousand ducats, to indemnify him for the damages committed by Crequi's army in his territories<sup>p</sup>. The king of Denmark soon followed the example of the elector, and on the twelfth of September concluded a peace with France and Sweden at Fontainebleau; by which he consented that the crown of Sweden should be re-established in all that it possessed before the war, and in all the provinces and cities that it had acquired by the three treaties of Roschild, Copenhagen, and Westphalia.
- b The general peace being concluded, Lewis XIV. still continued his conquests, by establishing at Brisack and Mentz chambers of re-union, which, by examining antient charters and records, adjudged to him cities and lordships, of which he took possession, under pretence that they were originally fiefs and dependencies of countries ceded to him by the peace. On the twenty-second of March the sovereign council of Alsace declared<sup>q</sup>, that the cities and villages of Upper Alsace, of the prefecture of Haguenau, of Mundat, and the chapter and provost of Weissenburg, ought to acknowledge the king of France as their sovereign. This declaration alarmed the possessors, who believed that the king of France wanted likewise to deprive them of the profitable dominion of their fiefs; but he declaring, that he did not pretend to deprive them of the propriety and advantage of their possessions, then the bailiffs of the Rhingrave, of the elector of Triers as bishop of Spire, of the count of Hanau, of Oderburn, of the bailiage of Grevenstein, of the barons of Falkenstein, and of the prince of Berkenfeldt, took the oath of fidelity to the king of France, promising to yield obedience to his orders, and to acknowledge the sovereign court of Brisack as their judge in the last resort<sup>r</sup>.
- c THE sovereignty of the bishoprics of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, having been ceded to France by the treaty of Munster, Lewis XIV. by a decree of the twenty-fourth of July, ordered all the mediate vassals of these bishoprics to deliver in their titles and papers, justifying their rights and pretensions. This decree was followed by another, dated the seventeenth of September, giving power to the commissaries to judge of all difficulties that should occur upon account of these inquiries<sup>s</sup>. The archives of the churches and abbeys of the dutchy of Lorraine having been examined, it was found that formerly many bishops, to oblige their relations, had favoured them with grants of their bishoprics, which were in their gift. These prelates had, indeed, received others in exchange; but the council of Metz thought it probable, that the value received was not so considerable: and, besides, they pretended that the dependence of the fief was unalienable; and though the faith and homage of the possessors had been transferred to others for several centuries, yet no prescription could justify a false right, and that the immoveable possessions of bishoprics were unalienable in their nature; therefore France had a right to claim all that had been withdrawn and usurped.
- d THE sovereignty of France over all the fiefs of Alsace still met with more difficulties. The king of Sweden, as duke of Deux-ponts, and the elector-palatine, as count of Veldentz, refused to pay homage to Lewis XIV. The court of France, being informed of this refusal, ordered the sovereign council of Alsace to judge of the affair. They decreed the duchy of Deux-ponts and the county of Veldentz to be re-united to the crown of France, if, within a limited time, the two princes, possessors of them, did not pay homage to Lewis XIV. As this decree likewise regarded the ten cities of the prefecture of Alsace, they, in conjunction with the king of Sweden, the counts of Veldentz, Nassau, &c. complained of this proceeding to the diet of Ratisbon. The empire, exhausted by a long war, contented itself with writing to the king of France, and to Charles II. of England, who had been mediator of the congress at Nimeguen. In their letter to Lewis XIV. they affirmed, that, by the treaty of Munster, only the landgraviate of Upper and Lower Alsace was granted to him; and that the ten cities of the prefecture were not comprehended in that cession; but, to put an end to the differences, they prayed his majesty to determine these claims by the arbitrators that had been formerly agreed upon.

A. D. 1681.

THE king of France replied, that what he claimed was only in consequence of the rights ceded to him by the treaties of Munster and Nimeguen; but, rather than trouble the peace of his neighbours, he would consent to a revival of what his courts had decreed. The states of the empire, having received this answer, prayed Leopold to communicate to them the negotiations of his ambassadors at Nimeguen, and those of count Mansfeld, his minister at the court of France. They were sent to the diet to be examined, which afterwards agreed with France to appoint a congress at Frankfort to terminate the difference about the sovereignty of Alsace. The ministers of the Germanic body being personally obliged to Leopold, he prevailed on them to prolong the negotiations, that he might have leisure to provide for war. The king of France, to strengthen the frontiers of Alsace, cut off the Germans from passing the Rhine betwixt Brisack and Basil, and to awe the Swiss, who had promised not to grant the Imperialists a passage through their territories, ordered the village of Huninguen, within half a league of Basil, to be fortified with five regular bastions, and all necessary outworks.

Munster.

LEWIS XIV. not contented with fortifying Huninguen, resolved likewise, under pretence of taking possession of Alsace, to seize upon Strasburg, which makes a part of that province. The French court thought that the exception in the treaty of Munster, regarding the immediateness and liberty of these cities, ought not to be any obstacle to the design their king had formed; therefore the marquis de Louvois ordered troops to enter Lorraine, Franchecomté, and Alsace, under pretence of employing them at working upon the fortifications in these provinces. But soon after they all assembled within a few leagues of Strasburg; and baron d'Asfeldt, taking possession of the ground betwixt the Rhine and the city, and the redoubt which covered the bridge, told the magistrates, that the French only took possession of these posts to prevent the Imperialists, who had a design of seizing them; but that the city had nothing to fear, since the king would take it under his protection. The twenty-eighth of September the baron de Montclar, at the head of an army, spoke a different language: he summoned the town to surrender; adding, that, if they made any resistance, they would be treated as enemies. While the magistrates and people, alarmed at this proposition, were deliberating what course to take, the marquis de Louvois arrived at Illkirk, and told their deputies, that the king his master being informed that they had desired the Germanic body to send a garrison into their town, he wanted to prevent them, and therefore required the city to be put into his possession; not that he desired to destroy their privileges, but rather to load them with his favours: that they might draw up articles of capitulation according to their desire, which would be granted them, if they were compatible with the sovereignty granted to France by the treaty of Munster. The magistrates and people, seeing themselves without resource, drew up articles of capitulation; by which the inhabitants were confirmed in their privileges; the Protestants were allowed the free exercise of their religion, and the possession of all their ecclesiastic property, and the churches which they then used, excepting the cathedral, which was given to the Catholics: but it was regulated, that the cannon, military stores, and arms in the public magazines, should be put into the hands of the French. These articles being signed by Louvois on the thirteenth of September, he took possession of the city.

A. D. 1682.
Leopold prepares for war with France.

THE same day that Strasburg surrendered to Lewis XIV. Casal, the capital of Montferrat, received a French garrison, by an agreement with the duke of Mantua, its lawful sovereign. This city being a fief holding of the empire, Leopold suspected that the king of France wanted to dismember it, and ordered his ambassador in France to make complaints to Lewis XIV. concerning the surprising of Strasburg, and the possessing of Casal by the French. As he received only evasive answers, he resolved to prepare for war with France; but as his own forces were mostly employed against the malcontents in Hungary, he prevailed upon many of the princes of the empire to declare war against Lewis XIV. On the tenth of June he concluded a treaty with the plenipotentiaries of the circles of Franconia and the Upper Rhine; to which the princes of Lunenburg, the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and the electors of Saxony and Bavaria, acceded. The countries upon the Rhine were proposed to be the scene of action, where the allies were to assemble three armies, having the promise of assistance from the Spaniards and the states of Holland.

The elector of
opposes his designs.

THE minister of the elector of Brandenburg opposed these proceedings, and declared that the emperor could not, in virtue of a treaty made with some states of Germany, engage the

a whole empire in a war, without the consent of the Germanic body. He had likewise private reasons for his opposition, being piqued at a defensive league of ten years, which the emperor had concluded with Sweden on the twelfth of October; therefore, to disappoint the emperor's designs against the French, he entered into an alliance with the king of Denmark and the bishop of Munster to preserve the peace of the empire, and mutually assist each other against any violences contrary to the constitutions of the empire, and the treaties of peace. A. D. 1537.

MEAN while the count de Creffy pressed the diet of Ratisbon to come to a determination, with regard to the sovereignty of the king of France over Alsace *. The diet assembling on the twenty-second of January, it was resolved to examine the treaties upon which his most Christian majesty founded his right to the sovereignty of Alsace. After two months debating on that subject, the emperor, being threatened with an invasion from the Turks, proposed to the count de Creffy to conclude a truce with France for thirty years, which Lewis XIV. consented to; and accordingly, on the thirty first of August, a truce was agreed to by them, without either regulating the articles or time.

WHILE the negotiations were carrying on at Frankfort and Ratisbon, the Hungarian malcontents had broke the truce concluded at Oedemburg. Count Tekeli being joined with four thousand Turks, surprised the castle of Zathmar, and put the garrison to the sword: afterwards, marching to Cassovia, he made himself master of it, the fourth day after he had opened the trenches †; Eperies submitted to a body of janissaries, commanded by the bashaw of Buda, who likewise took Leutcb, the forts of Zipt and Zendre, and entered the county of Scopus. While the Turks were besieging Tokai and Filek, Tekeli went and ravaged Silesia. The grand vizier, to reward the services he did to the Porte, caused him to be declared king of Upper Hungary, and sent him a vest, a sabre, and standard, with the patent of the Grand Signior. The Hungarian malcontents break the truce, and count Tekeli surprises Zathmar.

THE sultan, in the midst of his conquests, made proposals of peace, which were rejected by the emperor, since he could not agree to them without opening a passage for the Turks into the dominions of Austria. Leopold hearing of the great preparations made by the Turks on the frontiers of Hungary, and not doubting but they were designed against Germany, made a league offensive and defensive against the Turks with John Sobieski king of Poland, who engaged to march in person to the assistance of Vienna, in case it were besieged †. He likewise addressed the princes of the empire, who engaged to furnish him with a certain number of auxiliary forces, and prince Charles of Lorraine was ordered immediately to join the imperial troops at Presburg. That prince, leaving his government of Tirol, arrived at Vienna on the eighth of April; and setting out from thence on the twenty-ninth of the same month, he arrived at Kitsee, where the imperial troops were encamped.

IMMEDIATELY he besieged Newhausel, and pushing the town vigorously, he had already made himself master of the suburbs, when being informed that the Turks were on their march, and threatened to enter Stiria, he raised the siege, and retired towards Comorra, to watch the designs of the enemy. Soon after, being informed that they intended to march towards Albe-Royale, or Weissenburg, he quitted his camp at Comorra, and passing the Raab, entered the island Schut, having sent four regiments to reinforce a body of Hungarians at Neutra, under the command of the palatine, and ordering general Schultz to march to Schinta, in order to cover the frontiers of Moravia.

THE grand vizier arriving at Belgrade, marched from thence to Weissenburg, at the head of fifty thousand janissaries, thirty thousand spahis, and two hundred thousand men, drawn from different garrisons, with artillery and baggage proportioned to such a multitude ‡; and encamping betwixt Weissenburg and the mountains of Raab, detached a great number of Tartars to ravage the country, from whence the imperial army was to draw its subsistence. Afterwards advancing to the mountains of Raab to take possession of them, he was repulsed with considerable loss, and was likewise opposed in attempting to pass the river of that name. In the mean time count Tekeli arriving at his camp, published a manifesto, declaring, that the sultan would take under his protection all those who should embrace the party of the malcontents; and that he would maintain them in their privileges, liberties, goods, laws, and religion; but that no quarter would be given to those who refused to submit. Tekeli publishes a manifesto in favour of the sultan.

THIS manifesto had so great an effect, that the cities of Papa, Tot, and Vesprin, immediately opened their gates to the malcontents: which example the emperor fearing that Neutra would likewise follow, he ordered count de Schultz, the governor, to withdraw the heavy cannon, arms, and ammunition, and to abandon the city. The same orders having been given to the governors of the towns in the mountains, the cities and counties of Hungary declared to the commissaries of the emperor, that they should be obliged to open their gates to count Tekeli, as they did not think that they ought, upon the bare hopes of assistance, to expose themselves to fire and sword. a

THE grand vizier having passed the Raab over the bridge of Kirmeded, which was abandoned by the Imperialists, entered the country, and put all to fire and sword: having afterwards passed the Rabwitz, he continued every-where the same devastation. Prince Charles, having only twenty-four thousand men, was not in a condition to resist so great an army; and fearing that they would cut off his retreat to Vienna, and the hereditary countries, he retired to Berant, to cover the river Leitbe, and watch the motions of the Tartars, who ravaged the country between the Raab and that river. The infidels advancing, attacked the guards commanded by the count de Taaff, supported by the regiment of Montecuculli, and several squadrons, and defeated them when the duke of Lorraine arrived, who rallied them, and bringing up several regiments to their assistance, repulsed the enemy, and afterwards retired with his army under the cannon of Vienna. b

MEAN while all was in the utmost consternation in that city. The emperor, with all his court, had abandoned it on the seventh of July, and retired to Lintz<sup>a</sup>. Great numbers of the citizens followed the court, and the roads were crowded with fugitives, and carriages loaded with furniture and valuable effects. The first advice of the flight of the regiments had made such an impression, that they believed all was lost; but the presence of the duke of Lorraine had, in some measure, removed their fears. As the defence of the city was of very great importance, they, with all dispatch, repaired the fortifications; and count Staremberg, who commanded the garrison of eight thousand men, foreseeing that the siege would be long, appointed the different quarters of the city to different general officers, and named subalterns to give an account of all that passed: the citizens likewise, the tradesmen, and the masters of the university, with the students, formed themselves into companies, to assist in defending the town. c

AFTER the retreat of the duke of Lorraine, the grand vizier, leaving the bashaw of Buda to besiege the city of Raab, marched to Vienna, and on the thirteenth of July appeared before the city. On the sixteenth the trenches were opened, and soon after the city was wholly invested. The duke of Lorraine, being thus cut off from all communication with the garrison, marched against count Tekeli, who was on the other side of the Danube, and with twenty thousand Hungarians, and eight thousand Turks, besieged the castle of Presburg. After having come within sight of the camp of the rebels, he sent two hundred men to reinforce the garrison of the castle; and having obliged the malcontents to abandon the town, he afterwards defeated them intirely<sup>b</sup>, and burnt the wood and materials which they had provided for building a bridge over the Danube, in order to have a communication with the army of the grand vizier. Tekeli afterwards marching into Moravia, and summoning that province to pay contribution, the duke obliged him to desist, by threatening to order the emperor's garrisons in Upper Hungary to make reprisals upon the houses and lands of those of his party: then marching to the neighbourhood of Vienna, he defeated the Hungarians in several skirmishes, and prevented them from joining the Turks under the grand vizier. d

MEAN while the siege of Vienna was carried on with great vigour: notwithstanding the bravery of the defendants, the Turks had made a breach of six fathoms in the body of the place, when John Sobieski, king of Poland, having joined the auxiliary troops of the circles, and passed the Danube over the bridge at Kremps, on the eighth of September, gained the heights of the mountain of Calemberg with his army, and, by lighting fires, informed the besieged that assistance was arrived. The grand vizier, having neglected to dispute the passage of the Danube, and allowed the imperial and Polish armies to gain the top of the mountain, continued the siege, hoping that the city would capitulate, before the allies could force him to an engagement, and only sent a body of ten thousand men to observe their motions, and harra's their march. On the eleventh of September the allies holding a council of war, regulated the order of battle: the Polanders had the right, and the duke of Lorraine the left; the elector of Saxony drew up his troops on the right of the duke of Lorraine; and the elector of Bavaria was posted on the right of the Saxons; while the king of Poland posted himself in the center of the army, which consisted of about sixty-four thousand men<sup>c</sup>. In this order they marched down the mountain. The Turks observing them, extended themselves from the Danube to the bottom of the mountain, and possessed themselves of the hedges, intrenchments, and hollow ways, from whence they could harra's them in their descent. Towards the evening, the king of Poland arriving at the plain at the foot of Camaldoli, ordered count Leflie to post his troops at the opening of a wood which extended to Vienna, and to raise a battery to secure the pass. Next day, about five in the morning, the Turks sending some troops to attack those who were working at the battery, the count e

The grand vizier at last coming out of his camp with thirty thousand horse, the king of Poland hastened his march, and about noon joined the right wing of the Imperialists, and attacking the Turks vigorously, they retreated from mountain to mountain, while the duke of Lorraine on the left advanced to their camp, which he attacked. Soon after, the king of Poland having received a reinforcement, vigorously charged the body of horse commanded by the grand vizier, and having broke through it, put them into confusion. The infidels, finding themselves so pressed by the king of Poland, and seeing their camp in danger, were struck with a panic, and fled with precipitation, leaving a decisive victory to the Christians, with the loss of only two hundred men, they themselves having scarcely lost a thousand: so great was their terror, that they left behind them the great standard of Mahomet, their tents, the greatest part of their baggage, their provisions, the warlike stores, and their artillery, which amounted to one hundred and eighty pieces of cannon and mortars; and their retreat was so precipitate, that, on the morrow after the action, the first of their troops had already passed the Raab.

Defeats the grand vizier, and forces his camp.

WHILE the duke of Lorraine was giving the necessary orders to act against the Turks, the emperor arrived at Vienna, on the fourteenth in the evening; and next day went to the camp of the king of Poland, to see that prince, and testify the obligations which he had to him, for leaving his own kingdom, and coming to deliver Vienna, and save the empire. Altho' the grateful acknowledgements ought to have been above formalities, yet there were some difficulties about the ceremonials, which were at last overlooked, and the salutation was given on both sides at the same time.

THE king of Poland and the duke of Lorraine, being able only to prevail with some of the princes of the empire to continue with the army, advanced towards Cemorra by the island of Schut; and the king, being informed that the Turks had retired to Barcan, formed the design of attacking that place before the imperial troops were all assembled. The Turks, having passed the Danube over the bridge of Strigonia, had put a strong garrison into Barcan, and had ordered several platoons of soldiers into all the gardens in the neighbourhood. The king having no information of these dispositions, had marched within half a league of Barcan, when the Turks, beginning to come out of the gardens, attacked his van-guard; and tho' few at first, yet being insensibly joined by other squadrons and battalions, the king was drawn into an engagement, without having time to draw up in order of battle. At first he opposed them with his horse in one line; but the number of the infidels still increasing, and by their motions threatening to flank his right and left, the Polanders were put into disorder, and obliged to fly. At the same time the duke of Lorraine, who had heard of the engagement, coming up to their assistance, the Turks retired, not thinking it safe to pursue.

Two days after the defeat of the Poles, the Turks appeared in order of battle in the plain of Barcan. The Christian army, which still consisted of sixty thousand men, Germans and Poles, was so disposed, that the soldiers of both nations were intermixed by equal numbers; the king of Poland commanding the right wing; the great general of the crown the left; and the duke of Lorraine the center. The infidels began the charge upon the left wing of the allies with incredible fury; but being sustained with firmness, they lost a great many men, and the vizier of Silistria, and bashaw of Caramania, were taken prisoners. The Turks still continuing the engagement with the same ardour, the king of Poland on the right, making a motion to flank their army, they gave ground by degrees, and at last fled towards Barcan; whither the Christians pursued them, and killed a great number in the marshes. After this victory, the allies took Barcan by storm; and in a council of war resolved to besiege Strigonia, tho' the officers of the Polish army made some difficulty of agreeing to it, desiring to return home; and alledging, that the war was now carried on more with a design to deprive the Hungarians of their liberties, and subject them to the absolute will of the emperor, than to make conquests upon the Turks. But Sobieski assuring them, that the siege of Strigonia would not be of long continuance, it was at last undertaken on the twenty-second of October, and the Turks capitulated four days after. Thus all Hungary, on both sides of the Danube, was again reduced under the power of the emperor, as far as Strigonia, or Gran, which place had been in the possession of the Turks for more than one hundred and fifty years<sup>d</sup>.

The duke of Lorraine and the king of Poland defeat the Turks, and take Barcan and Strigonia.

AFTER the reduction of Strigonia, the elector of Bavaria and the marquis of Baden-Durlach marched home with their troops; and the king of Poland having proposed an accommodation with the Hungarian malcontents, the duke of Lorraine and their deputies assembled in his tent. The vice-chancellor of Hungary, after having shewn the solid advantages that would attend a peace, demanded the confirmation of their privileges, and liberty of conscience; the restitution of their confiscated estates, and the assembling of a free diet; a suspension of arms during the negotiation of peace; and the sovereignty of some counties for Tekeli, which had been offered to him the year before. The duke of Lorraine answering, that he had no power to conclude any article, but that every thing might be expected from the clemency of the emperor, the king of Poland immediately perceived that Leopold did not desire an accommodation; wherefore he resolved to withdraw with his troops to his own kingdom. Notwithstanding the duke of Lorraine pressed him to take winter-quarters in Upper Hungary, he parted from him, after reciprocal marks of the highest esteem; and, taking the route of Lubonia, arrived at Cassovia, on the twenty-fourth of December.

A. D. 1684. LEOPOLD, seeing the siege of Vienna raised, and the great success of his arms in Hungary, had hitherto prevented the diet of Ratisbon from agreeing about the articles and time of duration of the truce with France; and had even transferred the negotiations to the Hague, under pretence of an universal peace. The electoral college, offended at this removal, acquainted the emperor, that they accepted of the propositions made by France; and took no part in the congress assembled at the Hague. They wrote in the same terms to the king of England and the states-general; and forbade their ministers at the Hague to enter into any negotiation, the Germanic body having given them no power.

WHILE the electors complained of the arbitrary proceedings of the emperor, who wanted to regulate the affairs of the Germanic body without their consent, the marshal de Crequi attacked Luxemburg, and made himself master of it, after twenty days open trenches. He likewise took possession of Triers, which he dismantled. Lewis XIV. after the peace of Nimeguen, had demanded Luxemburg from the Spaniards, in exchange for Alost, which he pretended belonged to him, as he had conquered it in the preceding war. Although the peace bore, that he was to restore to the Spaniards all that he had conquered from them, and the town had really returned under their power, yet he pretended that he had only left the keeping of it to the Spaniards, and therefore absolutely requiring either that city or Luxemburg, had ordered the last place to be invested; but the affair being referred to the mediation of the king of England, the blockade was afterwards raised. That mediation producing no effect, Lewis XIV. had recourse to arms, which obliged the states-general and the emperor to agree to the truce. Accordingly they agreed, that for twenty years France should be left in peaceable possession of Strasburg, the fort of Kell, and other posts on the Rhine between that fort and the city; and that in all these places his most Christian majesty should freely exercise the rights of sovereignty. Lewis XIV. promised to restore to the Germanic body, all the cities and lordships which he had seized, excepting Strasburg, and the forts thereon depending, without waiting for the decision of the chambers of Metz, Brisack, and Besançon; but he would not agree that his sovereignty over Alsace should be the same that the emperor had formerly exercised, but only granted to the proprietary lords the revenues of their fiefs, and refused them the advantages belonging to the sovereignty. The Protestants were allowed the liberty of their religion, and the enjoyment of the possessions belonging to the churches.

besieges Buda.

THE greatest part of the Hungarian lords being struck with terror at the success of the duke of Lorraine's arms, were prevailed upon by him to return to their obedience to the emperor, and again to take the oath of fidelity to him. Afterwards the duke, being informed that the Grand Signior had made extraordinary preparations during the winter, to repair all his losses; that he had caused Kara-Mustapha, his grand vizier, to be strangled; and given the command of his army in Hungary to Kara-Ibrahim, whom he had raised to the same dignity, he left Lintz on the nineteenth of May, and assembling his army at Karanitz, marched to besiege Wissegrade, which capitulated after four days open trenches. The duke having likewise taken Vatz, and defeated the grand vizier's army, passed the Danube, and on the fourteenth of July encamped before Buda. His artillery having made a breach on the nineteenth, he gained the lower town by assault, where he fortified himself; but the vizier marching to the relief of the place, he resolved, if possible, to bring him to a general engagement, before he attacked the upper town, and ordered fourteen thousand men to march out of the camp in the evening without noise. On the twenty-second he came within sight of the enemy, who were drawn up in order of battle on the declivity of a hill, and attacking them, drove them from their ground. Afterwards, ordering a body of Hungarians to take possession of a rising-ground, and to fall upon the right of the Turks, they were forced to retreat, having endeavoured in vain to affright the imperial horses, by three hundred camels, mounted by men who held several standards of various colours. The duke of Lorraine, having disordered the camels by his artillery, commanded all his horse to attack the enemy in their retreat; which great motion obliged a them to fly with precipitation to their camp, with the loss of a great number of men<sup>f</sup>. Two days after, the siege of Buda was again resumed, but the Imperialists were obliged to raise it, upon account of the sickness of the duke of Lorraine, who being seized with a violent fever, committed the care of the army to the elector of Bavaria, and the generals Staremburg and Caprara. Afterwards strong garrisons being put into several places, the rest of the army was sent into winter quarters in Silesia, Moravia, and Bohemia.

b LEOPOLD, being informed of the great preparations that were making at Constantinople, and that the Turks designed to take the field early in the spring, prepared for a proportional defence, and resolved, if possible, to prevent the infidels: he had recourse to the states of the empire, who engaged, by different treaties, to furnish him with thirty-five thousand men: the pope likewise promised to open the treasures of the church, to contribute to the support of an army that was to fight against infidels. The operations of the campaign were left to the conduct of the duke of Lorraine; only it was resolved to give nine or ten thousand men to count Schultz, to cover Moravia, and oppose the malcontents on that side; and that count Leslie, with such another body of Croatians, should act upon the Drave.

Leopold gets assistance from the princes of the empire against the Turks.

c THE elector-palatine dying on the sixth of February, without issue, the succession to his estates was the subject of new disputes betwixt the empire and the king of France. The elector having an only sister married to the duke of Orleans, she pretended to succeed to all his allodial possessions, and the greatest part of his moveables<sup>g</sup>, in virtue of the will of her father; in which claim she was supported by Lewis XIV. The duke of Neuburg, who was called by the will of the last elector, took possession of the allodial estates of the Palatinate, as of a male-fief, holding immediately of the empire. The king of France, though he allowed the duke of Neuburg to be the chief of the palatine branch, and nearest heir to the deceased elector, yet he insisted, that the allodial estates having been left to the duchess of Orleans, by the will of her father, could not be comprehended under that article of the Golden Bull, which declares the estates of electors unalienable from those who possessed the titles; and was preparing to make good the claim of the duchess of Orleans by arms, when the pope offering his mediation, the affair was left to be decided by his arbitration. The duke of Neuburg had likewise another competitor for the whole of the succession.

d Lewis-Leopold, count-palatine of Weldentz, being nearer by one degree in the collateral line to the deceased elector, pretended that this proximity gave him a preference to the branch of Neuburg: but the duke being supported by the emperor, who had married his daughter some years before, and being called by the decision of the states of the empire, was put in possession of the electorate, the palatine of Weldentz only having a liberty to protest against his investiture<sup>h</sup>.

e DURING these discussions the duke of Lorraine, at the head of the imperial army in Hungary, had resolved to besiege Newhausel<sup>i</sup>. On the seventh of July he arrived before the town, and draining off the water that surrounded the place, on the night of the twelfth he opened the trenches: mean while the Turks advanced with an army of sixty thousand men, and having surprised the lower town of Wissegrade, which they plundered and burnt, they laid siege to Gran, or Strigonia, which they pressed with great vigour. The duke of Lorraine being informed when the Turks were preparing to give the assault, marched against them at the head of thirty thousand men, leaving twenty thousand under the command of Caprara, to continue the siege of Newhausel. The Turks, upon the news of his approach, left the siege of Gran, and drew up on a small rising-ground, with a marsh before them, and the Danube on their right. The duke having put some troops into Gran, feigned a precipitate retreat, with the intention of drawing the Turks from the marsh, and obliging them to an action. He succeeded in his design; and drawing them to an engagement, after several attacks he defeated them entirely, forcing two thousand into the marsh, and pursuing the rest so vigorously, that they abandoned their camp, in which was found plenty of provisions, with twenty-four pieces of cannon. The Imperialists returning to Newhausel, three days after took it by storm, sparing neither age, sex, or condition. In the town, besides one hundred pieces of cannon, there were provisions and ammunition for several months<sup>k</sup>. The duke of Lorraine hearing that the vizier was at Buda, resolved to besiege Novigrade, hoping thereby to draw him over the Danube, to hazard a new engagement. Before the arrival of the Imperialists, the Turks had evacuated Novigrade and Wissegrade; and soon after the vizier sent an aga to the duke, desiring a suspension of arms, in order to negotiate a peace. The duke of Lorraine sending the vizier's letter to the emperor, refused a suspension of arms; and marching with his army towards Vatz, found

The Hunga-

THE retreat of the infidels, and other circumstances favourable to the Imperialists, determined the duke to employ the rest of the campaign in reducing the rebels of Upper Hungary, who seemed now despairing of the success of their arms, as every day some of them were coming into his camp, asking pardon. A detachment of ten thousand men, sent to join the body commanded by general Schultz, were employed in reducing the places which the rebels held in Upper Hungary, and the main body of the army, encamped in places convenient for provisions, with a design of observing the Turks. General Schultz having taken possession of Eperies, afterwards joined Caprara, and marched to Cassovia, which he besieged. Mean while the emperor, offering an amnesty to all those who should lay down their arms, many of the Hungarians accepted of it, and left the army of Tekeli.

Tekeli is made

This desertion deprived him of the power of executing any enterprize; and the Turks, suspecting that he had a private intelligence with the king of Poland, and the house of Austria, the bashaw of Waradin ordered him to be taken prisoner, and put in irons, which entirely changed the face of the rebels affairs. Petberasi, who had been lieutenant to Tekeli, having obtained his pardon from the emperor, influenced a great number of the malcontents to submit to their prince. By offering rewards to some, and intimidating others with the power and resentment of the house of Austria, and by representing to all, that their obstinacy only exposed the kingdom to a general desolation<sup>1</sup>, he prevailed on the cities of Tokai, Cassovia, and Filek, with their territories, to return to their obedience to the emperor. The rebels in the other places submitted at the first appearance of the count Caprara, and the Turks surrendered without resistance, upon being conducted to Buda.

A. D. 1686.
The elector of Bavaria takes Albe-Royale, and the duke of Lorraine besieves Buda.

THE duke of Lorraine having strongly represented to the emperor, that the taking of Buda would contribute to the security of his conquests, it was resolved in a council of war to besiege that city, after having taken Erla and Albe Royale. The army soon after assembling in Hungary, was commanded by the elector of Bavaria, as the duke of Lorraine had fallen sick at Odemburg. The elector began with investing Albe-Royale, which soon surrendered; and on the twelfth of June the army marched along both sides of the Danube for Buda, without waiting for the troops of Brandenburg and Suabia<sup>m</sup>. The duke of Lorraine returning to the army, which was then at Pest, immediately detached two thousand men to invest Buda. On the twentieth at night count Staremburg began the attack at the lower town, some field-pieces being advanced to defend the workmen: after a month spent in advancing their attacks, and possessing the batteries, the allies at last attacked the body of the place; and having made a large breach, the duke of Lorraine, and the elector of Bavaria, agreed to give a general assault, having disposed all the necessary preparations in the most secret manner. But notwithstanding their precaution, the enemy having notice of their design, reinforced their second and third retrenchments with janissaries, and prepared for a vigorous defence. The signal for the assault in three places being given at six in the evening, in an instant the grenadiers and heyduques, who marched first, removed the gabions that were laid in the breach, and being supported by fusileers, and others with pikes and halberds, advanced to take possession of the pallisadoes. The Turks, on their side, made a continual fire upon the Imperialists; and charging them with grenades, stones, and bombs, they at last appeared in a body upon the breach, and, sword in hand, repulsed the foremost of the enemy, and obliged them to retire. The duke of Lorraine observing this, and advancing to the foot of the breach to encourage his men, they, with new ardour, regained the ground they had lost, and made themselves masters of the pallisadoes. Immediately the Turks springing a mine, the Imperialists were almost all either buried or wounded. New troops instantly succeeding, mounted the breach and took possession of the pallisadoes; but the Turks springing several other mines through the whole extent of the breach, these gulphs of fire destroyed the Imperialists, and encouraged the besieged, so that the women and children ran to the breach with stones and grenades, to have part in the defence.

THE generals of the allies, encouraging their men, replaced the dead and wounded with fresh troops, who, notwithstanding the great fire of the enemy, began to force their retrenchments; and having made themselves masters of the whole extent of the breach, they made a lodgment upon the ruins. The attacks made by the troops of Brandenburg and Bavaria were not attended with so much slaughter, though no less vigorous. The loss of the Turks in the whole attack amounted to fifteen hundred janissaries; and that of the allies to above three thousand soldiers, and two hundred officers, killed and wounded<sup>n</sup>. The duke, being informed that the grand vizier was marching at the head of forty thou-

- a sand men to the relief of the besieged, resolved to increase the fire of his batteries, that the place might be forced to surrender before the arrival of the vizier's army, as his forces were not sufficient to venture an engagement, having only ten thousand foot fit for service. Mean while, three thousand of the enemy's horse appearing on the neighbouring hills, the duke determined to put all upon the issue of a general assault. On the first of September, all things being prepared for the attack, towards the evening the troops marched into the trenches; and the generals taking their posts, with a prohibition to the officers or soldiers to quit their ranks, next day, about five in the evening, the signal was given for the assault by six pieces of cannon. Immediately the Imperialists, marching to the different breaches, began the attack: though repulsed with the utmost resolution by the janissaries sword in assault.
- b hand, and exposed to the fire from the windows of the neighbouring houses, yet they formed themselves upon the right of the retrenchment which the Turks had been obliged to quit; and, charging the besieged, drove them to an entrenchment behind the breach, where, not having time to draw up, or oppose their chevaux de frise, they saved themselves by flight, some into the houses, and others over the wall of the covered-way, hoping to save themselves towards Pest. These last were taken by the Bavarians; while the Imperialists, who had entered the town, made a dreadful slaughter, men, women, and children, being all put to the sword.

- BUDA* being taken, after ten weeks siege, it was resolved to march with the army towards the bridge of Esseck, to cut off the retreat of the Turkish army, which though superior in number, and within sight of the town before the attack, yet did not dare to give any disturbance to the allies. But the vizier retiring precipitately, the duke did not march till the sixth of September; and on the nineteenth encamped near Tolma, within three leagues of the enemy, with design to bring them to an action: but they, to shun an engagement, repassing the Drave, and retiring between Esseck and Walkomar, the duke undertook at the same time the sieges of the Five Churches and Segedin, which last soon surrendered; but the Five Churches held out till the end of October. The Imperialists afterwards took Siclos, Darda, and Kaproncza, without any opposition; being masters of the whole country, on both sides of the Danube, as far as the Drave.
- c The Turkish army retires, and repasses the Drave, while the duke of Lorraine takes Segedin and the Five Churches.

- d THE allies having separated into winter-quarters, the Turks retired towards Servia; from whence the grand vizier wrote to Vienna to make propositions of peace. Leopold, having consulted with the duke of Lorraine, answered, that he would consent to a peace, if the sultan would engage to pay six millions of gold for the expences of the war; if he would restore all the places which the Porte still possessed in Hungary, and give full satisfaction to Poland and the republic of Venice. These propositions being rejected, Leopold promised to moderate them, provided the Turks gave proofs of sincerely desiring peace, he himself desiring nothing so much as to finish a war which had dispeopled the cities of Hungary, Austria, and Moravia, desolated the provinces, and exhausted his treasures°. Besides, having consented with great reluctance to the truce with France, he sought an occasion to break it, in order to recover Alsace, which Louis XIV. had united to his crown; and the duke of Neuburg still retaining the allodial possessions of the late elector-palatine, likewise desired a war, to protect himself, under a general alliance, from the arms of France. Therefore Leopold, having privately concluded a treaty with the elector of Brandenburg, who engaged to send seven thousand men to the assistance of the elector-palatine, in case he should be attacked, afterwards prevailed upon several states of the empire to conclude a league of alliance, on the ninth of July, at Augsburg. The purpose of this alliance was to preserve the liberty of the Germanic body, as well in general as particular; to guarantee the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen; and to confirm the truce of twenty years concluded with France two years before. The king of Sweden and the elector of Bavaria entered into the league: likewise the whole ducal house of Saxony consented to what the emperor desired, and the elector-palatine was the chief promoter of the alliance. The emperor engaged to furnish sixteen thousand men; the king of Spain, for the circle of Burgundy, six thousand; the duke of Bavaria eight thousand, and two thousand for the circle of Bavaria; the circle of Franconia four thousand; the Upp.r Rhine an equal number; and the house of Saxony two thousand. The contingent of the king of Sweden was not determined. For the support of the troops magazines were formed, and a common chest was resolved to be established at Frankfort: and to be assured that the troops of the league were in good condition, and fit for service; it was concluded that the army should encamp every year, for a month or six weeks, in a place appointed by the emperor.
- e A league concluded at Augsburg between the emperor and several states of the empire.
- f

- g MEAN while, the king of France fortified Huningen; and likewise caused a bridge to be built there over the Rhine, and a fort to be raised for its defence. These two works gave great offence to all Germany; and, complaints being made to the diet, the emperor wrote to his ambassador in France to represent to the court, that this innovation was contrary to the truce. It was answered, that the bridge of Huningen had only been repaired, and the fort was only added with a design to cover it; and that the measures his most Christian majesty had taken for the defence of his states were but just, as the treaty of Augsburg put it past doubt that the Germanic body designed to make war upon him, whenever the emperor should conclude a peace with the Turks.

A. D. 1687.
The duke of Lorraine attacks the fort of the bridge of Esseck,

THE proposals of peace made by the grand vizier were designed only to amuse the emperor; for the Porte still hoping to repair the losses of the former campaigns by arms, the warlike preparations were carried on by the Turks, during the winter, with such diligence and assiduity, that their army was sooner ready, and much more numerous, than that of the emperor, who could not raise above sixty-six thousand men, fourteen thousand of which were designed for garrisons of the cities, and twenty thousand to act separately under the command of the elector of Bavaria: the rest were to be commanded by the duke of Lorraine, who arriving at Strigonia, on the second of June, found only sixteen thousand men. Soon after, having assembled all his troops, on the twenty-fifth of the same month he began the operations of the campaign, by attacking the fort which covered the bridge of Esseck. Having taken it by assault, on the first of July he marched towards Olwar, to secure the passage over the Drave. On the fifteenth, having joined the elector of Bavaria, who was encamped on the other side near Valpo, the two generals, after a great many marches and counter-marches, on the twenty-seventh came in sight of the Ottoman army, which had passed the Drave, and encamped at Darda. The grand vizier, having fortified his camp, declined coming to an engagement, and only watched the motions of the Imperialists, sending out his Tartars to interrupt their foragers, and skirmish with the advanced guards. The duke of Lorraine, seeing it impossible to attack the grand vizier's camp, resolved to march forwards, in order to engage the Turks to follow him; and on the twelfth of August, having passed some defiles, he put his troops in order of battle, and led them into the plain of Sicles. He had no sooner marched than he discovered large bodies of the enemy through the openings of the woods; but not thinking it proper to attack them, as they only intended a skirmish, he continued his march; which the grand vizier observing, sent out a great detachment of Tartars to fall upon the baggage of the elector of Bavaria. The duke of Lorraine immediately sending some regiments to the assistance of the elector, the Tartars were repulsed; but the whole Turkish army advancing, and with their artillery beginning to attack the electoral troops, the duke marched with all his forces against the enemy, who were posted in several lines between two woods, extending their front about a quarter of a league. The Imperialists advancing very near to the enemy, and receiving their first fire, immediately attacked them with such fury, that they routed the janissaries who guarded some redoubts, and pursued them to their camp. At the same time the elector of Bavaria forcing their retrenchments, and attacking the quarters of the grand vizier, the disorder became so general, that the whole army flying to Esseck, left their camp in possession of the victors. The grand vizier, afterwards reviewing his army, found he had lost twenty thousand men, some having deserted, the rest being killed or drowned. The duke of Lorraine, seeing that the grand vizier could give him no more disturbance, passed the Danube near Mohatz, and marched towards Transylvania, to take up his winter-quarters in that province, in consequence of a treaty concluded between the emperor and the vaivode on the twenty-eighth of June; by which it was stipulated, that the emperor should not make any alterations in the province; that the troops should evacuate the towns next spring; and no inquiry should be made after those who had favoured the revolt of the Hungarians: which treaty, far from being punctually executed by the emperor, was only used by him as a means to get possession of the strong places of that principality.

An assembly of the states of Hungary de-

in the house of
Austria.

THE cause of the Hungarian malcontents being now intirely ruined, Leopold resolved to cause the archduke Joseph, his son, a boy of nine years of age, to be declared king of Hungary. Having called an assembly of the states at Presburg, he went thither with all his court on the thirtieth of October, and proposed to the diet to confirm the hereditary succession of the kingdom of Hungary in the house of Austria. The states consented to elect the archduke Joseph; but demanded to be left to enjoy their antient liberty, without proposing a hereditary succession: and likewise presented a paper, requiring their grievances to be examined and redressed, before the coronation of the archduke Joseph. The emperor replied, that though he could freely dispose of a kingdom, which he had reconquered from the infidels at the expence of much blood and treasure, nevertheless he desired to preserve their antient laws, as far as they were agreeable to the royal dignity; and that though the succession belonged to him already by so many different titles, yet it was proper to confirm a-new, by a solemn convention, the hereditary succession of the crown to the princes a of the house of Austria; and in the coronation-oath to repeal the clause of king Andrew II. in the year 1221, by which every private gentleman had a right to take up arms against his sovereign, if he attempted to violate the liberties of the nation, which only served the malcontents with a pretext to revolt. The states, being obliged to comply with the emperor's demand, confirmed the succession of the crown to the male descendants of the house of Austria in Germany; and, after their extinction, to the males of the Spanish branch; having obtained only, that the king should reside in Hungary, or in a neighbouring province: and that, in case of the extinction of the two male branches, the states should be at liberty to elect a sovereign of another house. The clause of the oath of king Andrew II. was likewise revoked, upon condition that the new conquests in Hungary should be incorporated into the kingdom: and, as a redress of their grievances, it was resolved to suppress the criminal chamber of Eperies, which had been established in the beginning of the year for the trial of the rebels, and had still continued; condemning great numbers without distinction, who were executed with barbarity<sup>1</sup>. It was likewise agreed, that the quartering and payment of the national and German troops should be directed by Hungarian and German commissaries; and that a chamber of finances, composed of persons of both nations, should be established at Buda.

The emperor having given his consent to these articles, the archduke Joseph was crowned on the ninth of December with pomp and magnificence, all things succeeding to Leopold's desires, even beyond his hopes; for, besides this happy change of government in Hungary, the Turks, by reason of their intestine divisions, retiring before the king of Poland, were bombarded by him in Caminiack: and the Venetians, having beat their fleet, had made themselves masters of Patras, Lepanto, Castelterneze, and Mistira, anciently Lacedemon. Agria also, in Upper Hungary, having surrendered, there only remained Moncatch, which was defended by the countess of Tekeli. That princess being in want of provisions and ammunition, and seeing all Hungary subdued, was prevailed upon to submit to Leopold, who promised to preserve to her all her estates, and the same rank she formerly held in the kingdom, and to cause her children to be educated at Vienna, according to their rank and birth. The capitulation being signed on the seventeenth of January, the princess was conducted to Vienna with her children, and shut up in the convent of the Ursulines with her daughter, her son being sent to be educated under the jesuits at Prague<sup>2</sup>.

d ALL Hungary being now reduced, the emperor directed his arms against the Turks, who, having dethroned their sovereign, Mahomet IV. and put his brother Soliman in his place<sup>3</sup>, were making great preparations for the ensuing campaign. The duke of Lorrain being seized with a dangerous sickness, and the elector of Bavaria refusing to take the command of the troops, the Imperialists acted in separate bodies, count Weterani taking Cromstadt on the twentieth of May; Illock, Peterwaradin, and Titel, surrendering to prince Lewis of Baden; and the city Brodt, in Bosnia, being surprised by count Hofkirkin. At length the elector of Bavaria, having the promise of a separate body to act by itself, in case the duke of Lorrain should recover his health, was prevailed upon to take the command; and on the twenty-eighth of July arrived at the army, which was encamped near Peterwaradin.

e THAT prince, eager to signalize himself by some enterprize, resolved upon the siege of Belgrade, and ordered a bridge to be laid over the Save. The bridge being completed on the eighth of August, on the sixteenth they marched in order of battle to force the Turks, who were intrenched near Belgrade<sup>4</sup>; but were agreeably surprised to find the camp abandoned, and abounding in provisions and forage. The elector having viewed and examined the city, and the heavy artillery being arrived from Buda, it was resolved to attack the upper town, because, the houses of the suburbs being less damaged by the fire, the soldiers might approach within three hundred paces of the counterscarp under shelter. The Imperialists laboured with such diligence, that, on the twenty-sixth of August, all their artillery was ready to do execution; and using thirty pieces of heavy cannon, and five mortars, they ruined several quarters of the town, notwithstanding the great fire of the besieged, which only animated their courage.

f THE duke of Lorrain having now recovered his health, and the elector not testifying any repugnance to the division of the command, but rather declaring his impatience to see him, he left Vienna, and arrived in the camp. Afterwards visiting the trenches with the elector, who demanded his advice upon the measures to be taken for the future operations, he complimented his highness upon the progress of the siege, and gave his opinion of the manner of passing the ditch, and giving the assault. On the fifth of September, the mines being ready, were sprung; and immediately after the Imperialists gave the assault: but were at first repulsed. Returning a second time to the charge, they forced all that was before them;

and having entered the town, made a dreadful slaughter, without distinction of age, sex, or condition. The bashaw, who commanded the castle, despairing of assistance, immediately surrendered, upon condition of life and safety for himself and the garrison. Some days after, the news arrived at the camp of a victory gained by prince Lewis of Baden over the Turks, near Terven in Bosnia.

THE Imperialists were prevented from making any further progress in Hungary this campaign, the elector of Bavaria being obliged to leave the camp, to manage the affairs of his own states; and the duke of Lorraine not being able to bear the fatigues of the campaign, by reason of his bad health. Besides, the king of France, in breach of the truce, having begun hostilities on the Rhine, the attention of the emperor was chiefly engaged to put a stop to the progress of his arms.

THE reasons pretended by Lewis XIV. for his invading the empire, were, to procure the public repose; to support the pretensions of the dukes of Orleans to the succession of the late elector-palatine, altho' she had renounced all right to these bailiages by her contract of marriage; and, lastly, to assert the right of William Egon, of Furstemberg, to the archbishopric and electorate of Cologne. This electorate having become vacant on the third of January, by the death of the late elector, France, by its intrigues, procured the majority of the votes of the chapter in favour of the prince of Furstemberg; but neither of the candidates having the qualifications requisite for an election, they could only succeed by a postulation, in which case, two-thirds of the votes were necessary, besides the confirmation of the pope, and the investiture of the emperor. The pope, preferring prince Clement of Bavaria, gave him a dispensation for his want of qualifications for an election; which being obtained, his postulation became a legal election, tho' he had the minority of votes, because the other candidate had not fully two-thirds.

THE king of France, having presented a manifesto to the states-general, and the diet of Ratisbon, declaring that he would look upon the enemies of the cardinal of Furstemberg as his own, soon after ordered the marquis de Boufflers to march with some troops towards Cologne. The marquis, having passed the Rhine on the twentieth of September, took Keiser-Lauter, afterwards Oppenheim, with several other towns, and, on the sixth of October, invested Philipsburg, which surrendered to the dauphin after some days of open trenches. Lewis XIV. then published a manifesto, offering to restore Philipsburg and Friburg, after having dismantled them, provided the cardinal Furstemberg was put in possession of the electorate of Cologne, the truce changed into a perpetual peace, and all the places which he had re-united to his crown by the treaties of Munster and Nimeguen, granted to him by a good treaty. The emperor refusing to consent to convert the truce into a peace, upon the conditions proposed by the king of France, because that would be to yield for ever the sixth part of the empire, which France had taken possession of, the French immediately entered the Palatinate, put a garrison into Mentz, took Manheim, Frankendal, and made themselves masters of Triers, Spire, and Worms.

A. D. 1689. THESE rapid conquests of the French alarming all Germany, the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, the duke of Hanover, and the landgrave of Hesse, assembled at Magdeburg, where they resolved to declare war against France. The prince of Orange, who was now king of Great Britain, determined likewise upon a war with France, for invading the empire, in breach of the treaties guaranteed by England, and giving assistance to the Papists of Ireland, that refused to submit to the government then established. The preparations of the allies were interrupted by the dispute between the king of Denmark and the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, with regard to the sovereignty of some territories, which was at last determined by a treaty concluded at Altena, on the thirtieth of June.

The emperor and the states of the empire enter into an alliance against France.

SOME troops of the elector of Saxony, of the landgrave of Hesse, and the duke of Hanover, had marched towards Frankfort; the emperor sent six regiments of horse, and four or five of foot, towards the Rhine; the elector of Brandenburg repaired to Wesel, where his best troops were assembled; the bishop of Munster promised to throw eight hundred men into Cologne; and the marquis of Brandenburg to send two thousand. The states of Holland caused seven or eight thousand men to march into the country of Juliers, and sent others to take possession of the places in the electorate of Mentz, which the French had not yet conquered. At the same time eight regiments of Hanoverians advanced towards Triers, to cover Coblentz, and the country round. The emperor besides having engaged these princes, with England and the states of Holland, had likewise prevailed with Spain, Denmark, and Sweden, to enter into the alliance. The diet of Ratisbon, after having in a decree mentioned, that Lewis XIV. in breach of the treaties of Munster and Nimeguen, had seized upon many places belonging to the empire; that he had raised forts, and built bridges over the Rhine, cut down woods, and appropriated to himself entire countries, under pretence of re-uniting a them to his crown; on the fourth of March declared him an enemy to the empire, and sent their declaration to the emperor at Vienna.

THE duke of Lorraine immediately leaving Inspruck, and arriving at Vienna on the first of April, consulted with the emperor upon the operations of the campaign. The command of the troops of Hungary being given to prince Lewis of Baden, it was resolved to assemble three armies on the Rhine, namely, thirty thousand men on the Lower Rhine, commanded by the elector of Brandenburg; thirty thousand men likewise on the Upper Rhine, to assemble at Heilbron, under the command of the elector of Bavaria; all the rest of the troops of the empire were to form the third body of forty thousand men, to assemble near Frankfort, and to be commanded by the duke of Lorraine.

b THE duke afterwards arriving at Frankfort, was surprised to find that many of the troops were but still on their march; that the magazines were but poorly furnished with provisions and warlike stores; and that there were no boats at Coblentz in order to build a bridge: the heavy cannon likewise were not yet arrived from Hungary and Bohemia, being detained by the overflowings of the rivers. The French, more vigilant and better served, had taken all possible precautions to prevent the Imperialists from passing the Rhine; and having added several new works to the fortifications of Mentz, had left a garrison in that place, consisting of twelve thousand men, among whom were two thousand officers.

c THE French having assembled several small camps upon the Moselle, with a design of attacking Coblentz, the duke of Lorraine reinforced the garrison of that place with several regiments; and some days after, the electors of Saxony and Bavaria, and the landgrave of Hesse, arriving at the camp, it was resolved in a council of war to besiege Mentz, as the armies then, by their situation, were so encamped as to be easily united. The ceremonial of rank among the princes of the allied army being regulated, and some officers of artillery being arrived from the camp of the elector of Brandenburg, who had taken Kaiserwerth and Nuis, the duke of Lorraine decamped from Meyen, and passing the Nave, encamped at Binghen. A few days after the elector of Saxony, and the landgrave of Hesse, advancing with their troops, and taking possession of the posts in the neighbourhood of Mentz, on the sixteenth of July the town was invested.

d Six days after the trenches were opened in three different places; the elector of Saxony, the landgrave of Hesse, and the duke of Lorraine, dividing the attacks. The Saxons and Austrians laboured at the trenches for several days, without being much disturbed by the French; but on the thirtieth the marquis d'Uxelles, who commanded the garrison, ordered five hundred men to make a sally, who at first put the besiegers into disorder, but were at last, after an obstinate engagement, repulsed. On the tenth of August the besieged making another sally, killed upwards of two hundred soldiers, with several officers; and six days after, two thousand of the best troops of the garrison sallied out at mid-day, and falling upon the Saxons, in a moment cleared the trenches; but the duke of Lorraine coming up with a reinforcement, the French were repulsed with the loss of twelve hundred men. On the eighteenth the besieged, having made two successful sallies within two hours of one another, they came out a third time with three thousand men, drums beating, and colours flying. The allies being fatigued with the two former sallies, and not expecting this third, the French fell upon five hundred men, whom they put to the sword, nailed two pieces of cannon, ruined the works of the allies, and posted the grand guards of the cavalry at the place where the trenches had been first opened. But the duke of Lorraine and the other generals, having rallied their men, repulsed the French, killing a great number of them, and regained their former posts. On the twenty-fifth the besiegers, having sprung a mine near the covert-way, made a lodgment in that place. The elector of Bavaria having made two lodgments upon the glacis, it was resolved to attack the counter-scarp; and having gained the palisadoes of the covert-way, they finished two good lodgments within three or four paces of the two points of the counter-scarp, with the loss of two thousand men, killed and wounded. Afterwards sending for a reinforcement of foot from the elector of Brandenburg, they extended their lodgments along the covert-way; but the besieged did not wait till they were finished, demanding to capitulate on the eighth of September; and on the eleventh they marched out of the town with the honours of war, and six pieces of cannon, and four mortars.

THE princes having quitted the neighbourhood of Mentz, the duke of Lorraine repaired to the camp of the elector of Brandenburg, who had invested Bonn for some time, and was now carrying on the attacks with vigour. On the fifteenth of October the town capitulated, and the garrison marched out with all the honours of war. The duke of Lorraine proposed afterwards to besiege Traerbach; but the allies declining any new action that campaign, the camp broke up, and the troops retired into winter-quarters.

Baden defeats the Turks in Hungary, and takes Nissa and Vidin.

A. D. 1690.
The archduke Joseph is elected king of
the Romans.

IN Hungary the arms of Leopold, under the conduct of the prince of Baden, were likewise successful. In the month of July he had advanced to the river Morava, to observe the Turkish army; and finding it consisted of fifty thousand men, he returned towards Passarowitz, in order to reinforce his army, which only consisted of about thirty thousand men, and to furnish himself with provisions from the magazines at Semendria. The Turks finding that he retreated, marched after him, and sent out a large detachment of cavalry to intercept his convoys. This detachment being defeated on the twenty-ninth of August, the next day the prince marched his army against the Turks, who were drawn up in order of battle beyond a wood. The Imperialists having passed the wood, by the favour of a thick fog, were attacked by the Turks, who had not observed them till they were forming their lines. After the engagement had continued an hour with doubtful success, the cavalry of the Imperialists falling upon the flanks of the infidels, broke them, and pushed the whole army as far as their camp. The prince of Baden, posting himself within half a league of the enemy, after a short repose, ordered the camp to be attacked, which the Turks immediately abandoned, leaving one hundred pieces of cannon, with their baggage, warlike stores, and provisions. On the twenty-third of September the prince defeated the Turkish army a second time near Vidin, and likewise forced their camp. Next day he entered Nissa, without any resistance; and having defeated the Turks a third time, made himself master of Vidin; where leaving a garrison, he passed the Danube, and marched into Walachia: leaving six regiments there, under pretence of protecting the hospodar from the incursions of the Tartars, and ordering the rest to march into quarters in Transylvania, he himself repaired to Augsburg, to be present at the electoral diet.

THE electors being arrived, the emperor proposed to their consideration two points; the first concerned the security of the empire against the designs of Lewis XIV. the second regarded the election of a king of the Romans, which he pressed with great warmth, as necessary to disappoint the expectations of the French, and proposed his son Joseph, king of Hungary, to be elected, with the proviso, that if the emperor should die before the designed successor had attained his eighteenth year, the vicars of the empire should govern in his name until he arrived at that age. After some objections to this discourse, as tending to render the imperial crown hereditary in the house of Austria, Joseph was at last elected on the twenty-fourth of January, and crowned two days after. The electors then renewed the league of Augsburg, and left the determination of the succession to the duchy of Saxe-Lawemburg, till the princes pretenders had produced their manifestoes.

THE Germanic body was now in a condition to march with all its forces against France; and on the sixteenth of March a general assembly being held at the Hague, at which the envoys of the confederate princes were present, it was resolved to send two armies upon the Rhine; the first consisted of the troops of the emperor, the elector of Saxony, the house of Luncenburg, and some other princes; of the king of Sweden, for the fiefs which he possessed in the country of Bremen; and lastly, of the elector of Bavaria, who commanded the whole army in chief, in the room of the duke of Lorrain, who died on the eighteenth of April, in the forty-eighth year of his age, much regretted by the whole empire, but particularly by the house of Austria. This army was to act upon the Rhine, near Philipsburg; while the second, composed of the troops of Neuburg, Munster, and the elector of Brandenburg, who commanded them in person, was to encamp in the neighbourhood of Cologne.

THE troops which France opposed to these being very considerable, and commanded by the dauphin, great exploits were expected from two such fine armies. Nevertheless, as the strength was nearly equal on both sides, each army wanted to preserve the advantage of its post, and only watched the motions of the other, without venturing to hazard a battle. Thus the whole campaign passing over without any action, the French repassed the Rhine, and took winter-quarters in Alsace and Franche-comté, while the Germans retired, disappointed in their design of retaking Philipsburg, and invading France.

Signior declares Tekeli vaivode of Transylvania,
who defeats the Imperialists
under the command of Heisler.

THE Turks at Constantinople, exasperated at the bad success of their arms in Hungary, and the neighbouring provinces, had, in a mutinous manner, demanded the head of the grand vizier, and of the caimacam, for mal-administration of affairs. The new vizier being of an active disposition, and skilful in the art of war, made great preparations for the ensuing campaign; and the vaivode of Transylvania being lately dead, he prevailed with the Grand Signior to declare Tekeli his successor, while the emperor supported the eldest son of the late Abassi. Prince Lewis of Baden being arrived at the army in Hungary, ordered general Heisler, with four thousand men, and some of the militia of the country, to make himself master of the passes, to prevent the irruption of Tekeli, who appeared upon the frontiers of Transylvania; but Tekeli, at the head of fifteen or sixteen thousand men, marched over a almost inaccessible mountains, attacked the body of troops commanded by Heifler, cut them in pieces, and made the general prisoner.

THIS victory obliged the prince of Baden to pass the Danube at Semendria, to support the Transylvanians of the imperial party; and in his absence the Turks made themselves masters of Nissa and Vidin, which last surrendered on the twenty-first of September. The grand vizier likewise, being informed that the breaches of Belgrade were not yet repaired, marched against that city, after having forced the palank at Semendria, and put the garrison to the sword. On the second of October the trenches were opened before the town, which, though weakly fortified, having only palisades in the old breaches, yet was taken by an accident sooner than was expected. On the sixth day of the siege, a bomb falling into the magazine of powder, it blew up with a dreadful noise, overturning a great many houses in the neighbourhood, and setting fire to others. The Turks, taking advantage of the disorder, attacked the palisades with such vigour, that they carried the place, and put all to the sword whom they found. Eight hundred soldiers and officers, who escaped, fled to Esseck, to endeavour to preserve that post, and were immediately besieged by a body of Turks from the grand vizier's army; but the Imperialists marching to the assistance of the town, the detachment of Turks retired with precipitation, leaving their cannon and part of their baggage.

THE prince of Baden having received a reinforcement, which rendered his army superior, advanced against Tekeli, with a design of drawing him to an action; but that count chose rather to retire to the frontiers of Moldavia than hazard an engagement; and Augustus of Hanover, at the head of one thousand horse, harrassing him on his march, he attacked the Germans, killed the prince of Hanover, and cut in pieces the greatest number of the men, the rest saving themselves by flight. The grand vizier, instead of joining Tekeli, in order to oppose the prince of Baden, and make himself master of Transylvania, contented himself with taking Lippa, and putting provisions into Giula, Temeswaer, and Waradin. The rigour of the season not permitting Tekeli to improve his late advantage, he retired into winter-quarters in Walachia; and the Imperialists being cantoned in Transylvania and Hungary, the prince of Baden repaired to Vienna.

THE duke of Savoy, who had hitherto observed a neutrality, had this year acceded to the grand alliance; in consideration of the emperor's allowing his claim to the kingdom of Cyprus, and giving him the title of royal highness; and likewise to be freed from consenting to the imperious demands of the French, who desired to put a garrison into the citadels of Turin and Vercell. Lewis XIV. suspecting that he had abandoned his friendship, sent Catinat to Turin to expostulate with the duke; while, at the same time, an army of eighteen thousand men marched from Dauphiny into the duke's territories. The duke openly professing his engagements, Catinat left Turin; and advancing with his army, on the eighteenth of August defeated the duke near Salusses, and soon after made himself master of Salusses, Savillana, and several other places. On the tenth of September, prince Eugene arriving with the German auxiliaries, the allies marched to attack Catinat; but he, by a feint, declining the engagement, made himself master of Susa, and afterwards put his troops into winter-quarters.

THE emperor, being informed that the Turks were making great preparations, ordered Esseck to be fortified; and that he might oppose them with greater vigour, he left the war upon the Rhine to be carried on by the Germanic body; and prevailed with the elector of Bavaria to represent to the diet of Ratisbon the necessity of this proceeding, who likewise offered to furnish the greatest part of the troops promised to the duke of Savoy, and to go and command them in person.

THE French having surprised the duke of Savoy, before he was in a condition to resist them, determined, if possible, to force him to abandon the alliance, and leaving only sufficient forces upon the Rhine to protect Alsace and Lorraine, they pushed the war in Italy with great vigour; and Catinat, taking the field early in the spring, made himself master of Nice, Villa-franca, St. Auspice, Montalban, Villana, and Carmagnola; which encouraged him to besiege Coni, a place situated on a craggy hill, and defended by a garrison of fifteen hundred men, one half of whom were Protestant Vaudois and French refugees. These rapid conquests of the French were chiefly owing to the slowness of the Germans and Spaniards, who had not yet arrived, and to the embezzling of the money allowed by the king of England and the states of Holland, for the payment of the Vaudois and French refugees: but the duke of Schomberg arriving at Turin on the eighth of June, though he found affairs in a desperate situation, the court removed to Vercell, and Turin itself apprehensive of a bombardment, yet he soon gave life and spirit to the army, by sending the officers often upon parties; and having relieved Coni, by a convoy under the command of prince Eugene, he obliged the French to raise the siege, and retire to Villa Nova d'Asti. Soon after the German auxiliaries arriving, to the number of eighteen thousand horse and foot, under the command of the elector of Bavaria, and Caraffa, the allies, by this reinforcement, being superior to the French, endeavoured to bring Catinat to an engagement; but he, retiring under the cannon of Salusses, sought only to preserve the conquests which he had made<sup>a</sup>. The allies, therefore, thought of recovering some of the places which they had lost in the beginning of the campaign; and prince Eugene, investing Carmagnola on the seventeenth of September, carried on the siege with so much vigour, that in eleven days the governor was forced to capitulate. After this conquest the allies going into winter-quarters, Catinat besieged the castle of Montmelian; on the seventeenth of November the trenches were opened before the place, and after a most vigorous siege, wherein they had to dispute as well with the rigours of the season as with the desperate defence of the garrison, that fortress was at last, on the twenty-first of December, surrendered to the French upon honourable conditions<sup>b</sup>.

LEOPOLD, chiefly intent upon opposing the Turks in Hungary, had sent the prince of Baden with upwards of forty thousand men to watch the motions of the grand vizier, who, at the head of sixty thousand Turks, intended to pass the Save, and besiege Esseck. On the tenth of August the prince appeared before their camp, and offered them battle; but the Turks would not hazard an engagement, detaching only a body of horse to harass the rear of the Imperialists. Some days after, posting themselves upon the rising-grounds near the Danube, with a design of cutting off provisions from the prince of Baden, they intercepted a convoy of two hundred waggons with provisions, cutting in pieces a regiment of dragoons who escorted it; and likewise falling upon the guards that conducted another convoy from Esseck, they routed them, and made themselves masters of the waggons<sup>c</sup>.

THESE actions, which were the most prudent the Turks had done during the war, made the prince of Baden and the other generals perceive, that they had to do with a vizier who understood how to conduct an army; wherefore, seeing themselves absolutely destitute of provisions, they resolved to force the camp of the infidels, since otherwise they must perish with famine. On the nineteenth of August they marched to attack the Turks, whom they found strongly intrenched: nevertheless, at three in the afternoon, the Imperialists, having regulated their disposition, began the attack with great fury; and though they were repulsed several times by the Turks with great resolution, yet at last, with the loss of a great number of men, they forced the intrenchments towards evening, when the janissaries retreated in good order, notwithstanding the death of the grand vizier, who was killed in the action. The prince of Baden, marching afterwards to Peterwaradin, repaired the fortifications; and dividing his army into two bodies; the one, commanded by the duke de Croy, took the road of Esseck; the other, conducted by himself, passed the Danube in the beginning of September, and marched to besiege Grand Waradin: but the attacks having little effect, by reason of the vigorous sallies of the besieged, and the Turks likewise opening the sluices and laying the country under water, the prince of Baden left a sufficient body of troops to continue the blockade, and put the rest into winter-quarters<sup>d</sup>.

LEOPOLD, having reinforced his army in Hungary, was more successful this year than in the former campaign. The colonel Poland defeated the Tartars near Filek, upon the frontiers of Transylvania, and took Garentzebs. Count Serau took the fortress of Calo by assault: and the prince of Baden, who had during the winter blockaded Grand Waradin, expected to have forced the garrison to capitulate for want of subsistence; but the aga of the janissaries, who commanded in the place, having found means from time to time to procure provisions, and even troops, it was resolved to turn the blockade into a siege<sup>e</sup>. On the second of May the trenches were opened before the town; and, notwithstanding many sallies of the besieged, on the fourth of June the breaches were large enough to give the assault. The bashaw, seeing the danger to which he was exposed, immediately demanded to capitulate; and, marching out on the seventh, the Imperialists took possession of the place. Afterwards general Heisler marched towards Segedin, and from thence took the route of Esseck, where the prince of Baden arrived on the sixteenth of August. The army afterwards encamping in an advantageous post above Peterwaradin, threw two bridges over the Danube for the convenience of foraging and provisions, and watched the motions of the Turks. But the new grand vizier, Haly, continuing in his camp at Belgrade, the prince of Baden resolved to go and attack his intrenchments; yet the heavy rains that immediately followed, made him abandon that enterprize, and think only of putting his troops into winter-quarters<sup>f</sup>.

ON the Rhine the allies had two small armies, that acted separately, under the command of the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel and the margrave of Bareilb. But the duke of Lorges ad-

- a vancing towards the Rhine with thirty-six thousand French, and a great train of artillery, it was resolved, in a council of war, that the two armies should join, which was accordingly done: but the landgrave, marching afterwards to besiege Eberenburg, was informed, by an express from the margrave, that the French were advancing towards him. He immediately sent four thousand dragoons to his assistance; and the duke of Wurtemberg, advancing with four thousand horse, posted himself near Edelsheim, with a design to amuse the French till the margrave's army should be reinforced. But Lorges, taking the advantage of a great fog, surprised the duke in his camp, and, charging so briskly that the Germans had not time to put themselves in a posture of defence, he took the duke, with several officers, and about four hundred soldiers prisoners, and killed about one thousand of the enemy upon the spot. The duke being sent to Paris, the French afterwards penetrated as far as Stuttgart, the capital of Wurtemberg, laid the country under contribution, and obliged the landgrave to raise the siege of Eberenburg, and repass the Rhine above Bingen. The count of Stirum afterwards joining the landgrave to cover Rhinegau, they put their troops into winter-quarters in the circles of Franconia, Suabia, and the Rhine<sup>1</sup>.

- THE elector of Bavaria, who was now governor of the Spanish Netherlands, had put these provinces in a better state than formerly; yet he could not hinder the king of France from attempting the siege of Namur. Lewis XIV. invested the town himself, and pursued the siege with such vigour and diligence, that in four days he made himself master of all the outworks; after which the garrison surrendered the town upon articles, and retired into the citadel. The French, encouraged by the presence of their sovereign, pushed the siege with the utmost activity; and resolving to carry the place at all adventures, by repeated assaults they drove the besieged from their posts<sup>k</sup>, and on the twenty-first of June obliged them to surrender. All the attempts of the prince of Orange and the elector of Bavaria to relieve the place were ineffectual; the marechal of Luxemburg, at the head of an army of seventy thousand men, having orders to cover the siege, and the great rains that fell at that time preventing the allies from passing the Meuse to attack Luxemburg's army. When the citadel of Namur surrendered, the allies lay encamped at Melle: from Melle they passed over the Stein, and were joined by twelve thousand Hanoverians. On the second of August the allies being informed of the disposition of marechal Luxemburg's army, which possessed some posts near Steinkirk, they attacked the French infantry, before they had time to put themselves in a posture of defence. The duke of Luxemburg, trusting to the intelligence he had with the elector of Bavaria's valet-de-chambre, was surprised at this attack; but the treachery of the valet having been discovered, the allies forced him to give the French general false information, to conceal from him their real design<sup>l</sup>. Luxemburg, galloping to the right, found the brigade de Bourbonnois drove from the height in great disorder, and the allies masters of their ground and artillery. After two attacks without success, he put himself at the head of the brigade of guards, and forced the prince of Orange to retire. The duke of Wurtemberg came to the assistance of the prince, and sustained the attacks of the French for a long while; but the dragoons of the marquis de Boufflers coming fresh to the engagement, the allies were obliged to retreat.

The allies attack the duke of Luxemburg at Steinkirk, but are obliged to retreat.

- IN Italy the allies were superior to Catinat; for the French, chiefly regarding the war in Flanders, desired only to defend what they had gained on this side; but the duke of Savoy, having disposed of several parties into the vallies, and other places, for securing the country, marched in the month of July at the head of twenty thousand men into France; and pillaging several villages in Dauphiny, he made himself master of the castle of Guillestre. Afterwards he attacked Ambrun, which surrendered after nine days siege. Here he found twenty pieces of cannon, and one hundred thousand livres, by seizing the pay of the French king's troops, and laying the city and neighbouring villages under contribution. From Ambrun the army marched to Gap, a city upon the frontiers of Provence, whose inhabitants opened their gates, and readily consented to pay contribution, to preserve their houses from being pillaged and burnt; a treatment which near eighty castles and villages received from the Germans, in retaliation of the barbarities committed by the French in the Palatinate.

The duke of Savoy enters France, and raises contributions in Dauphiny.

- BUT the duke of Savoy falling sick of the small pox, a spirit of division breaking out among the generals, and winter approaching, the allies thought proper to abandon their conquests; and having burnt and plundered the country, they retired before the mountains should be shut up by the snow.

- THIS year the Protestant interest in Germany was strengthened by the creation of a ninth electorate in favour of the duke of Hanover. That duke, who had been long in the interest of France, had now entered into the grand alliance; and promised great supplies against France and the Turk, if he might be made an elector of the empire. King William con-curing to press the matter at the court of Vienna, the emperor agreed to it, under pretence a that the number of electors ought to be unequal, to prevent the inconveniences of an election, where the votes might be equally divided<sup>m</sup>. The duke was supported in his claim only by the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg; the other electors, both ecclesiastic and laic, and the college of the cities, opposing it with great warmth<sup>n</sup>. Their deputies at the diet of Ratisbon represented, that it was with great astonishment they heard that the emperor designed to erect a new electorate, without the participation and consent of the states of the empire: nevertheless, they hoped that, regarding the antient customs and constitutions of the empire, he would suspend the investiture of this ninth electorate till the result of the deliberations of the three colleges should be known.

LEOPOLD, without having regard to these remonstrances, on the nineteenth of De- b cember gave the investiture of the new electorate to Ernest-Augustus, with the title of elector of Brunswick, and great marechal of the empire. The deputies at Ratisbon, being informed of the investiture, immediately drew up a manifesto, representing to his imperial majesty the grievances of their masters, and complaining of the investiture as contrary to the Golden Bull, and several capitulations confirmed by successive emperors; therefore they declared the investiture given to the duke of Hanover null<sup>o</sup>; and that they would not acknowledge him as an elector, resolving to adhere to the Golden Bull, the treaties of Westphalia, and other fundamental laws of the empire. This dispute continued for some time in terms of negotiation with the princes opposing the investiture, who contented themselves to renew their protestations afterwards in the conferences held at Ryswick for the general c peace.

A. D. 1693. THE emperor, finding his cities dispeopled, and his treasures greatly exhausted, had, during the winter, made proposals of peace to the Turks, which were by them rejected; therefore he resolved to begin the campaign early upon the Rhine, and in Hungary: and raising the militia of Bohemia, Austria, the Milanese, and other hereditary countries, he pressed the princes and cities to hasten the march of their troops. But many of the states of Germany, dissatisfied with the war, and the new electorate which Leopold had erected, were not much disposed to obey; so that they acted slowly, and with little vigour, and were likewise retarded by some private disputes about the command.

The French army, being assembled at Little Holland near the Rhine, on the seventeenth d of May passed that river near Philipsburg, without opposition; and the marquis de Chamilly, with twenty thousand French, encamped before Heidelberg; while the duke de Lorges, at the head of thirty thousand men, crossed the mountains to oppose the prince of Baden, who was encamped under Heilbron with a very small army. The marquis de Chamilly, finding that the prince of Baden was not yet in a condition to act offensively, pressed the siege vigorously; and having gained the suburbs, and killed five hundred of the garrison, he entered the town by the fort of the Star, which the besieged had abandoned. The governor of the castle, seeing the French masters of the town, where they put all to fire and sword, offered to capitulate; and the articles being signed, the garrison marched out on the twenty-fourth of May, with two pieces of cannon and all their baggage, and were conducted to Wimpfen. The French, being masters of the castle, set fire to it, and reduced it to ashes, not sparing even the tombs of the electors and palatine princes. Soon after the duke de Lorges advanced towards the Neckar, with a design to attack the prince of Baden; but being twice repulsed in attempting to pass that river, he was forced to abandon his enterprize, with the loss of near one thousand men. The dauphin afterwards, arriving with a strong reinforcement, resolved to force the intrenchments of the Imperialists; but marching to the rising-grounds at Otmarshheim, within cannon-shot of the enemy, he perceived that their camp was inaccessible; and not being able to force them to quit their intrenchments, he repassed the river; and having put a garrison into Stuttgart, and sent a detachment of twelve thousand men into Piedmont, and another of ten thousand into Flanders, he f returned in August to Versailles. After the departure of the dauphin, the allies obliged the French to evacuate the duchy of Wurtemberg, and then put their troops into winter-quarters.

In Flanders the French were prevented from entering Brabant by the diligence of king William, who had encamped at Parke near Louvain; but the duke of Luxemburg took Huy, and defeated the allies at Landen.

The duke of Savoy being recovered from his long indisposition, put himself at the head of the allies in Italy; and resolving to drive the French out of his territories, he began the campaign with the attack of Fort St. George, which completed the blockade of Casal: afterwards the army marching to Pignerol, bombarded the town; but while they were deliberating about the siege, Catinat, who had received a reinforcement of twelve thousand men a from the Rhine, descended into the plains, and gave the duke such apprehensions for Turin, that he drew off from Pignerol, and encamped at Marfaglia. Catinat approaching, the duke, contrary to the opinion of prince Eugene and the duke of Schomberg, resolved to hazard a battle. On the fourth of October, about nine in the morning, the two armies engaged; and, after a desperate dispute on both sides, the honour of the action fell to the French. The duke of Schomberg died soon after of his wounds at Turin: the allied army having encamped under the cannon of that place; while the French, after raising great contributions, repassed the mountains, and took winter-quarters in Dauphiny, Provence, and Languedoc.

b IN Hungary the Imperialists did nothing considerable this year; for the duke de Croy was obliged to raise the siege of Belgrade after thirty-two days open trenches, the grand vizier coming to the relief of the place, with an army of eighty thousand men. The duke de Croy having only eighteen thousand men, quitted his camp, and intrenched himself under the cannon of Peterwaradin, while the grand vizier arriving at Belgrade, sent out his Tartars to pillage the country, who every day had small skirmishes with the Imperialists. Afterwards thirty thousand Turks marching into Transylvania, and the bashaw who commanded them, leaving the heavy baggage at Giula, with three or four thousand men, count Hofkirken, who defended the frontiers, put himself at the head of six regiments of dragoons, and attacking the Turks who guarded the baggage, killed about one thousand of them, and returning with his booty to the Feyffe, posted six regiments of foot, and several c regiments of horse, along that river; by which disposition, the Turks being prevented from succeeding in their design, retreated, and afterwards put their troops into winter-quarters. The imperial camp being then very sickly, soon after broke up, and the duke de Croy repaired to Vienna, and represented to the emperor the great necessity of augmenting his troops, as the Turks threatened to return in the spring with greater forces.

By the persuasion of the prince of Baden, it was resolved to have a fleet this year upon the Danube; but the emperor's finances being greatly exhausted, to remedy this deficiency commissions were given to private persons, who being indulged with particular privileges, destructive of commerce, fitted out some saics; and to support the expences of the war in Hungary, a new tax was raised of three crowns upon each measure of salt. The difficulty d of raising money occasioned a great slowness in their proceedings, so that the army could not assemble in Hungary till towards the month of August. It was expected that the deposition of the grand vizier would have delayed the progress of the Turks; but his successor redoubling his efforts, had given express orders for the speedy march of the troops, the Tartars threatened an irruption into Transylvania, and the seraskier of Belgrade, having passed the Danube with an army, had invested Titoul.

A. D. 1694. The emperor prepares a fleet to act on the Danube.

THE court of Vienna was at this time greatly embarrassed for want of money to pay the troops, who demanded with great earnestness, the arrears of two or three months which were due to them. The people refusing to pay the taxes, some lords, faithful subjects of the house of Austria, borrowed considerable sums upon their private credit, to pay the gar- e risons of Peterwaradin, and the neighbouring cities. The negotiations of the emperor likewise, with the princes of Germany, advanced very slowly; for as his coffers were exhausted, the ministers of the other courts did not express such an ardor for his service: but George elector of Saxony, dying on the seventh of May, Frederick-Augustus, his brother, who succeeded him, consented to continue the Saxon troops in Hungary, and to augment those who were to march for the Rhine.

THE duke de Croy having refused the command of the army in Hungary, the emperor gave it to count Caprara, who left Vienna on the twenty-ninth of July, with the promise, that in a short time the money necessary for paying the troops, and for other expences, should be sent to him. Mean while the grand vizier, at the head of an army of ninety f thousand men, passed the Save, and invested Peterwaradin. Having encamped within a league of the place, and possessed the rising-grounds upon the banks of the Danube, he advanced his fleet of one hundred and ten vessels within cannon-shot of the Imperialists. The German army, with a design of assisting the besieged, had continual skirmishes with the Tartars, and the cannonading was continued every day with upwards of five hundred pieces of cannon, from both the fleets, and the batteries at land. The presence of the count Caprara's army, having prevented the Turks from making great progress in the siege, the heavy rains in the end of September obliged them at last to abandon it, and go into winter-quarters.

g FRANCE having suffered greatly by two successive bad harvests, the common people were reduced to misery, and great multitudes perished for want. The extreme poverty of the kingdom obliged Lewis XIV. to try all possible methods for bringing about a general pacification, or at least a separate peace with some of the confederates. In the beginning of this year he made some offers to the duke of Savoy, who did not hearken to them: he likewise employed the mediation of the kings of Sweden and Denmark, for a peace with the emperor and German princes; but the preliminary propositions appeared so unsatisfactory to the allies, that they could not be persuaded that he sincerely desired peace, or at least such an one as they desired for their common safety<sup>p</sup>; therefore, as there was no prospect of a just peace, the allies made preparations for the campaign.

THE death of the bishop and prince of Liege, gave the French a fair prospect at this time, of embroiling the affairs of the confederates on that side: but the cardinal Bouillon, who was supported by the French, being rejected by the chapter, the major part of the capitulars chose the elector of Cologne, and the rest the grand-master of the Teutonic order, for their prince and bishop. Both the candidates sending to the pope and the emperor to have their respective election confirmed, it was still feared that the election would not be quietly concluded: but whilst both parties impatiently expected the decision of the see of Rome, the contest was determined by the death of the grand-master; so that the elector of Cologne, in some time after, obtained the peaceful possession of that bishopric and principality.

THE prince of Orange, and the elector of Bavaria, at the head of the confederate army in Flanders, were encamped at Tillemont, whilst the French army, under the command of the dauphin, were advanced as far as Tongres, where they were joined by the troops of marechal Boufflers. Both armies continuing for some time in their posts, the allies at last formed a design of passing the Scheld at Pont d'Espieres. With this view, on the twenty-fourth of August, they detached a body of troops, commanded by the elector of Bavaria, to endeavour to take possession of the bridge: but the dauphin, sensible of the danger of allowing the allies to penetrate into French Flanders, ordered four thousand dragoons, with each a footman mounted behind him, to march with the utmost dispatch to take possession of the bridge, and throw up some intrenchments to oppose the enemy. The elector of Bavaria, upon his arrival, finding the French strongly intrenched, did not think it prudent to pursue his enterprize.

THE prince of Orange, finding it impossible to attempt any thing on that side, resolved to dispossess the enemy of Dixmuyde and Huy. This last place, though well fortified, and defended by a good garrison, surrendered on the twenty-seventh of September, after eight days open trenches. By this conquest, which was the last expedition of the campaign, the French were totally expelled out of the bishopric of Liege.

ON the Rhine the Imperialists, commanded by prince Lewis of Baden, lying encamped near Heilbron, the marechal de Lorges having passed the Rhine, marched towards them with his army in order of battle; but finding that the prince of Baden, though not yet reinforced with the Saxons, had resolution to meet him, he retreated towards Wislock, passed the Neckar, burnt the town of Laudenburg, and ruined the flat country. The prince of Baden, desirous of engaging the French, advanced to Wislock, an advantageous post, of which he took possession after a sharp rencounter with the enemy, who passed the Rhine three days after, and encamped between Manheim and Frankendal. Soon after the allies decamped from Stolhom, and laying a bridge over the Rhine, entered Alsace on the fourteenth of September, and destroying a great quantity of forage, and some magazines, they laid the great bailliage of Haguenau, and part of Lower Alsace, under contribution. The marechal de Lorges, surprised with this sudden expedition, marched towards Landau, and designing to inclose the Germans, he detached the marquis d'Uxelles, that marching behind the mountains he might attack their rear, whilst he himself attacked them with the rest of the army: but the prince of Baden suspecting his intention, ordered his army to repass the Rhine, which then beginning to swell, immediately after overflowed its banks so much, that it was impossible for the French to follow him.

The elector of Brandenburg cedes the circle of Schweibus, in Silesia, to the emperor.

THE elector of Brandenburg, being ambitious of the title of king, in order to secure the good dispositions of the emperor, whose approbation would influence the votes of the whole Germanic body, by a treaty this year, put an end to the differences that had, for some time, subsisted between the houses of Brandenburg and Austria, with regard to their pretensions to some fiefs in Bohemia and Silesia. The elector ceded to the emperor the circle of Schwiebus, and his imperial majesty granted to the electoral branch of Brandenburg, the title of king of Prussia, the reversion of the principality of East-Friesland, and barony of Limburg, a place in the aulic council for a Protestant deputy, and promised to pay the elector two hundred and fifty thousand florins. The treaty was accordingly executed on both sides the year following.

a THE duke of Savoy, though he openly rejected the proposals made to him from France, after his defeat at Marsaglia, yet entering into a private negotiation he continued very inactive, and prevented the execution of the schemes formed by prince Eugene, general of the army of the empire. The taking of the castle of St. George, and the blockade of Casal, were the utmost of their expeditions, while marechal Catinat observed their motions, being encamped at Fenestrelles.

b THIS winter the court of France flattered their people with a speedy end of the war; A. D. 1695. and Lewis XIV. accepting the mediation of the king of Sweden, proposed to make the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen the basis of the negotiation, and that the truce concluded at Ratisbon should be turned into a definitive treaty, with some alterations: but some men, of great consideration, being sent by the allies as far as Maestricht, to see what powers those sent by France had brought, they found them so limited, and the preliminaries so high, that the negotiation was soon at an end, or rather never began: and the allies depended upon the success of their arms, as they had made great preparations in Flanders.

THE prince of Orange, in the Low Countries, invested Namur, which he reduced after an obstinate siege, while Villeroi reduced Dixmuyde and Dense, and bombarded Brussels.

c THERE was not any action this year upon the Rhine, both armies being so equal in strength, that they could not lie on the defensive. In the month of May the French raised some redoubts along the Rhine, and the Germans ordered the fortifications at Heilbron to be repaired, and a camp to be marked between the Rhine and the Maine, from whence their hussars might harraßs the French soldiers and workmen.

d IN Montferrat, the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene had ordered six thousand Imperialists, and as many Spaniards and Piedmontese to march in the beginning of April, with twenty-four pieces of cannon, to attack Casal: but after the siege was well advanced, there fell such a quantity of snow, that the allies were obliged to go into winter-quarters again. In the month of June their army again taking the field, encamped before Casal, which capitulated a few days after the trenches were opened. It was agreed that it should be restored to the duke of Mantua, after all the fortifications were destroyed; that the demolishing the out-works should be at the expence of the allies, while the king of France demolished the rest. A truce being agreed to during the dismantling of Casal, the work went on so slowly, that the whole summer was spent before it was finished. The allies take Casal.

e IN Hungary the Imperialists were obliged to remain upon the defensive, the Turkish army being upwards of one hundred thousand men, exclusive of the Tartars, and commanded by the Grand Signior in person. Besides the power of their enemy, the court of Vienna had to struggle with domestic difficulties; for, notwithstanding the heavy taxes upon the people, they were still in great want of money for the necessary expences. The fleet upon the Danube was unserviceable for want of sailors; and a great many officers delayed joining their regiments, till they had assurances of being payed their arrears. The reinforcements likewise of Saxons and Brandenburgers were yet upon their march, though the summer was far advanced. In the beginning of August the elector of Saxony, who was to command the German army in Hungary, repaired to Peterwaradin; and being informed that the sultan had made a bridge at Panzowa, with a design of taking Lippa, and entering Transylvania, he left count Herbeville with a body of troops to cover Peterwaradin and Titoul, and marched towards Betsch with the rest of the army: from thence he passed the Teyße, resolving to go to the assistance of Veterani, who guarded the frontiers of Transylvania. But the Turks, having the advantage of several days march, sent a detachment of twelve thousand men to take possession of Titoul; likewise carried Lippa by assault; and afterwards attacking Veterani, intirely defeated him, though with very great loss to themselves. The remains of his army, to the number of three thousand men, under the command of general Truchses, retired to the Iron-gate, one of the principal passes on the frontiers of Transylvania. At last, after thirty days hard march, the Imperialists, under the command of the elector of Saxony, encamped within a few leagues of general Truchses. The sultan, being informed of the elector's arrival, on the sixth of October repassed the Danube with his troops, and, taking the route of Adrianople, left the grand vizier to order the preparations for next campaign, which he resolved to begin early. The Sultan defeats the Imperialists under Veterani.

f THE emperor, seeing the necessity of having a strong army in Hungary, engaged the German princes to augment their contingent; and treated with the king of Denmark for some regiments; but that prince, having then some difference with the duke of Holstein, would not consent to part with his troops. Frederick, duke of Holstein, having succeeded his father, who died this year on the fifth of January, proposed to call an assembly of the g states, that the clergy and nobility of the two duchies of Holstein and Sleswick might pay him their ordinary homage; and wrote to the king of Denmark, joint sovereign of the duchy of Holstein, for his approbation. As Frederick had not named the regencies of the cities of Lubeck and Hamburg among those who ought to pay homage, and as this omission had been practised during the last duke's reign, against which the Danish deputies had protested, in order to preserve the rights of their master, the king of Denmark desired the duke to defer the solemnity of the homage, assuring him, that the delay should be no prejudice to the common rights.

A. D. 1696.

THE duke, not hearkening to the representations of the king of Denmark, had entered into an alliance with Sweden, and taken some troops of that crown into his service, designing to cause the homage to be paid him, without any more regard to the king of Denmark. The king being informed of this, declared to the duke, that, notwithstanding the irregularity of his conduct, he would still observe mildness and moderation, and not oppose the exercise of the acts of common government; provided that he first communicated the testament of the duke his father, renewed the antient unions, which ought to be done at the beginning of each reign, and dismissed the troops which he had taken into his service. The duke refusing positively to comply with these conditions, the king immediately prohibited the exercise of the acts of common government; and was preparing to have recourse to force, when the princes, mediators of the treaty of Altena, prevailed with the two parties to terminate their difference in an amicable manner in a congress held at Pinneberg; but the treaty was not faithfully observed by either of the parties.

The allies burn the French magazines at Givet.

THE allies, though weary of the war, yet hoping, from the late success of their arms, to oblige the king of France to offer more reasonable conditions than those already proposed by him, they made great preparations for the campaign; and on the thirteenth of March forty squadrons marching from Namur, the greatest part of them invested Dinant; while the rest, under the command of lieutenant-general Coehorn, burnt the French magazines at Givet. Marechal Villeroy having taken the field, the prince of Orange soon after appeared at the head of the allies, and encamped near Wavre. Afterwards quitting that post, and marching towards Gemblours, he obliged marechal Boufflers to decamp, and pass the Sambre, to cover the places situated on that river, and on the Maese. Both armies seemed to have grand designs, yet they executed nothing; but fatigued one another by marches and counter-marches betwixt the Maese and the Schelde. The generals on both sides practised all the stratagems of war, and fought the advantages of a victory without the effusion of blood.

ON the Rhine, as well as in Flanders, both armies continued on the defensive. About the twenty-third of June the French passed the Rhine, and encamped within a league of Eppingen, where the Imperialists were intrenched. Towards the end of the campaign the prince of Baden passed the Rhine in his turn near Mentz, and advanced to Newstadt against the French; while general Thungen was to have passed the Rhine near Philipsburg, and attacked them in rear: but the French, having notice of his design, detached the marquis d'Uxelles to oppose him. The Germans, therefore, after having raised great contributions, repassed the Rhine in the beginning of October, and then marched into winter-quarters.

THIS year the duke of Savoy was drawn off from the grand alliance by the intrigues of the French court, seconded by the pope's nuncio and the Venetian envoy, who were desirous of sending the Germans out of Italy, and afraid of the increase of heresy, by the encouragement given to the Vaudois and the French Protestants. As the duke could not conclude the treaty at Turin, being narrowly observed by the lord Galway, in the beginning of the year he went, with a small retinue of his own naming, to our Lady of Loretto, under pretence of a religious vow. There having concluded the treaty, by the mediation of the agents of Rome and Venice, he returned to his capital, and, in conjunction with the allies, made great preparations for the campaign. In the mean time marechal Catinat marched towards Turin with an army of fifty thousand men, with a pretended intention of bombarding that place; but in reality to support the duke, when he should publish his acceptance of the treaty. On the twelfth of July, the French army threatening the town, he concluded a truce with them for a month, which was afterwards continued to the fifteenth of September. The treaty was at last published on the twenty-third of August, under the title of the Neutrality of Italy; when the duke wrote to the emperor, and the electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg, desiring them to accede to the neutrality; otherwise he should be obliged to join his arms with those of France, to force the Germans to observe the peace, or to retire from Italy.

IN conformity to the treaty, the king of France made a solemn resignation of all pretensions to Savoy, and the duke's territories<sup>u</sup>; Pignerol was demolished; four millions of livres were to be allowed to the duke for reparation of the damages sustained during the

- a war; and a marriage immediately treated of between the duke of Burgundy and the princess Mary-Adelaide, to be consummated as soon as they should be of age. In the mean time, the allies began to retire out of a country where they were already looked upon as enemies; and marching into the Milanese, were followed, at the expiration of the truce, by the duke of Savoy, at the head of the French and his own troops. Thus, by an adventure not to be paralleled in history, the same general commanded two contending armies in one campaign. Four days after the duke's arrival, he besieged Valentia, in order to oblige the allies to evacuate Italy, or to accept of the neutrality. After the siege was far advanced, the allies at last consented to accept of the neutrality, upon condition that three hundred thousand crowns were paid to the Germans, in lieu of winter-quarters. Thus was concluded the particular peace of Italy, which hastened the general one the year following.

- b THE elector of Saxony, who commanded in Hungary, began the campaign with the siege of Temeswaer; but some days after was obliged to abandon his enterprize. Being informed that the Turks advanced, with a design to force his intrenchments, he marched himself towards them, in order to give them battle <sup>w</sup>. The grand vizier was then encamped in the plain of Temeswaer, with the river Beghe in his rear, a marsh on his left, and in his front three rows of waggons, fastened together by chains and ropes. The elector, resolving to fall upon the Turks before they had fortified themselves better, ordered six battalions, supported by two regiments of dragoons, to begin the attack. But the Turks, sending out twelve thousand chosen horse, repulsed the Germans; and forcing the chevaux de frise, which covered their infantry, they penetrated to their second line, cutting in pieces all that opposed them. The janissaries also advancing, put the Germans into such disorder, that they were obliged to retire, with the loss of six or seven thousand men, killed and wounded, and twenty-three pieces of cannon taken. The Imperialists soon after repassed the Beghe; but were attacked on their march by one thousand Turks, who put them in disorder, killed many of their men, took a hundred cattle, and several waggons laden with baggage. For eight days together the Turks harrassed the march of the Germans, who were extremely fatigued, having had no rest, being in great want of provisions, and tormented with thirst. At length, by the great care of the elector of Saxony, they arrived, on the thirtieth of August, at Ollasch, where they found refreshments.

- d THE elector, having afterwards distributed them into winter-quarters, returned to Dresden, to endeavour to procure the throne of Poland, which was now vacant by the death of John Sobieski. The election of a successor having been delayed almost a whole year, by the artifices of the bishop of Gesna, was at last fixed to the twenty-seventh of June. During this delay, the elector having gained many of the palatines, and agreed to renounce Lutheranism, and profess the Roman Catholic religion, proposed himself as a candidate for the throne, and marched his troops towards Poland, to be ready to support his interest. On the day of the election, he was proclaimed king of Poland, and great duke of Lithuania, by the bishop of Cujavia; tho' the prince of Conti, the other candidate, had the majority of votes. Being thus called to the throne, he immediately entered Poland at the head of his troops, and being joined by those of the crown, which declared for him, he strengthened his authority thro' the kingdom; and having forced the prince of Conti to retire, secured the quiet possession of it to himself.

- In the mean time, the hopes of a general peace were not so certain, but that each party thought it necessary still to prepare for war, at the same time naming the generals for the armies, and the plenipotentiaries for the negotiations of peace. On the Rhine, the allies, after having thrown up intrenchments along the Neckar and the Rhine, encamped at Eppingen; whilst the French army, commanded by marechal Choiseul, passed the Rhine on the fourth of July, and posted themselves at Stolhoff. The two armies afterwards lay several days in sight of each other, but declined coming to an engagement; and the French marching towards Strasburg, the marquis of Baden passed the Rhine, and ordered major-general Ogilvy to besiege Eberenburg, which surrendered after eight days.

- f THE French, having withdrawn their forces from Italy, sent Catinat into Flanders, who, at the head of forty thousand men, laid siege to Aeth; while Villercy and Boufflers, with two other armies, opposed the allies, who made some motions to secure the place; but as they must have hazarded a battle against an army much superior to theirs, they resolved, in a council of war, to entrench themselves in an advantageous post, in order to secure Brabant. Aeth surrendering to the French, they afterwards proposed to take possession of the post of Anderlack, by means of which they could have made themselves masters of Brussels and Vilvord; but finding the allies so advantageously situated, and the prince of Orange having sent a great reinforcement to Brussels, they thought proper to alter their design.

- g THE north of Germany was at this time disturbed with new commotions: the duke of Strelitz having called in Swedish troops to enable him to take possession of the duchy of Gustrow, pretending to the succession of the late duke Gustavus Adolphus, who died without male issue. <sup>a</sup>

 The envoy of the emperor representing to the directors of the circle of Lower Saxony, that the duchy of Gustrow ought to be put under sequestration, till the rights of the pretenders to the succession were determined, the duke of Strelitz submitted to the commission; but the Swedish troops refused to evacuate the city of Gustrow, without orders from the king their master, and likewise denied admittance to the duke of Mecklenburg, who was declared successor by the emperor. The directors of the circle joined their forces to those of Sweden, pretending that their privileges were violated by Leopold's determination.

THE plenipotentiaries of the allies being arrived at the Hague, while those of France resided at Delft, it was resolved to hold the conferences at a palace of the prince of Orange, situated betwixt these two places, and close by the village of Ryswick; and the preliminaries being settled, baron Lillieroot, the mediator, appointed the first conference to be held on the ninth of May. Some days after, the imperial plenipotentiaries delivered to the mediator their demands in the name of the emperor and empire; and some of the German ministers, at the same time, gave in the particular pretensions of the princes their masters. The French, in their turn, proposed the conditions, according to which they were ready to make a peace, and declared, that, if the allies did not accept of these offers before the twenty-first of September, they would reckon themselves free to propose new articles *. The imperial ministers made a tedious answer to the plan proposed by France, as the emperor sought all means to retard the peace, and desired the continuance of the grand alliance, to assist him in the design he had of placing the archduke Charles, his youngest son, upon the throne <sup>b</sup> of Spain, in case of the death of his Catholic majesty, who was at present in such a declining state of health, that the imperial court thought he had but a few months to live. The same reason that made the emperor desire the continuance of the grand alliance, obliged the king of France to hasten the peace; for he likewise intended the succession of that monarchy <sup>c</sup> for the duke of Anjou, the second son of the dauphin: therefore, desiring chiefly to satisfy the rest of the allies, he made large offers to the states of Holland and Spain. The day fixed by France for the termination of the conferences being at last come, the English, Spanish, and Dutch plenipotentiaries signed the treaty; while the imperial and electoral ministers, who were present in the hall, entered a protestation against the proceedings of the allies.

Peace concluded between the emperor and France.

NEVERTHELESS, the Imperialists thought proper to agree to a cessation of arms; and express <sup>d</sup> were dispatched to the respective armies upon the Rhine, to discontinue all acts of hostility. The plenipotentiaries of the empire and France then resuming their conferences, endeavoured to settle the remaining points in controversy: but the French now seeing the empire under the necessity of accepting the conditions proposed by them, absolutely refused to part with Strasbourg, but ceded Philipsburg, Friburg, Brisack, and the forts on the other side the Rhine, as equivalents. At length the emperor, considering that Brisack and Friburg were places belonging to his hereditary dominions, consented to the exchange; and all other articles being agreed upon, the treaty was signed on the thirtieth of October, and ratified by the emperor on the seventh of December, in his own name, and the name of the empire. <sup>e</sup>

By the treaty, Lewis XIV. engaged to restore to the emperor and the empire the fort of Kell, Philipsburg, Friburg, and all his other conquests beyond Alsace; and likewise that all the re-unions made by the chambers of Metz, Besançon, and Brisack, since the treaty of Nimwegen, should be made void: that Lorraine should be restored according to the conditions of that treaty; only that the fortifications of Nancy should be destroyed <sup>f</sup>. On the other side, Strasbourg, and all depending upon it on the left side of the Rhine, were ceded to France; the duke of Neuburg was re-established in the Palatinate; the pretensions of the princess, which were disputed by the duke, were referred to the arbitration of the pope, and, till the difference was decided, the elector was obliged to pay every year one hundred thousand florins of the Rhine to the dukes of Orleans.

DURING the negotiations at Ryswick, the ambassadors of the Protestant princes delivered a memorial to the mediator, demanding, that in Strasbourg, and all the other cities of Alsace to be ceded to France, the Lutheran religion should be tolerated, and enjoy all the rights and privileges secured by the treaty of Westphalia <sup>g</sup>. The French desiring some time to answer, afterwards, in concert with the imperial plenipotentiaries, neglected this representation, and inserted in the treaty, that the Roman Catholic religion, in the places to be delivered up, should remain in the same state in which it was at that time. Thus, no notice being taken of the Protestants, several churches were to be left to the Papists, which, according to the laws of the empire, and the preliminaries of the treaty, ought to have been taken from them, and restored to the Protestants. The ministers of the electors, and other Protestant princes, refused to sign the treaty till this clause was altered; and published a memorial justi-

a flying their refusal, and shewing, that this article in the treaty was contrary to the laws of the empire, the peace of religion, and the treaty of Westphalia: but as the Popish princes and the emperor had made no objection, the French refused to make any alteration in the treaty for the sake of the Protestants, and only allowed them six weeks to accede to it, threatening them, after that time, with the whole forces of France, in case of their refusal.

Containing the Progress of a new Alliance against France:

b THE elector of Saxony being engaged in quieting the tumults in his new kingdom of Poland, Leopold gave the command of his troops in Hungary to prince Eugene, who had already become famous by his actions upon the Rhine, and in Italy. The prince repairing to Virismarton, in Upper Hungary, put himself at the head of the Imperialists, and ordered prince Vaudemont to disperse a body of malcontents, who, commanded by one of Tekeli's captains, ravaged the country, took Tokai, and several other places, putting to death all who offered to resist them. Upon the approach of prince Vaudemont, the malcontents retired into Tokai; which place was attacked with so much vigour by the Imperialists, that they carried it by assault in a few days, putting most of the malcontents to the sword. Those that remained having fled to Potack, the prince pursued them, cutting to pieces all that resisted, and forcing the rest to deliver up their captain, and lay down their arms.

c IN the mean time, the Turkish army, which was three times the number of the Imperialists, and commanded by the Grand Seignior, marched from Belgrade, with an intention of besieging Peterwaradin; while the fleet, composed of one hundred and six vessels, sailed up the Danube, and passed the Save. Prince Eugene, being too weak to oppose the enemy, waited for a strong reinforcement from Transylvania, and put a garrison into Titoul. After the reinforcement had joined him, he marched his army towards the sultan; who, judging it impossible to besiege Peterwaradin in sight of the imperial army, resolved to make an irruption into Transylvania. Having taken and burnt Titoul, he passed the Danube, and d marched up both sides of the Theysse. Prince Eugene having heard that Tekeli had persuaded the Grand Seignior to besiege Segedin, sent a strong detachment to reinforce the garrison, and continued his march to watch the motions of the Turks<sup>a</sup>. The sultan being encamped near Zenta, on both sides of the Theysse, over which he had thrown a bridge, prince Eugene formed the resolution of attacking his camp. On the eleventh of September, in the morning, he put his army in march in twelve columns, and about four in the afternoon, having formed them in order of battle, he advanced against the enemy, who were defended by three intrenchments, and seventy pieces of heavy cannon<sup>b</sup>. The Turks began the engagement with their artillery, which was answered by the Imperialists, who, at the same time, advanced with their right towards the river, and their left towards the country. About six in the e evening, coming up to the intrenchments, they attacked them with such impetuosity, that the Turks were immediately broke, and put into confusion; and the grand vizier being killed whilst he was endeavouring to rally them, they made no more resistance, but fled in disorder. The right of the Imperialists, having broke down the bridge, intercepted those that fled, and put them all to the sword, not sparing even the bashaws, who offered them money to spare their lives. The ground was covered with twenty thousand dead, and ten thousand more were drowned in the Theysse. The loss of the Imperialists was very considerable, having only four hundred and thirty men killed, and fifteen hundred wounded. There were taken from the infidels nine hundred waggons, six thousand camels loaded with provisions, seven thousand horses, seventy-two heavy cannon, seven horse-tails, fifteen thousand tents, with that of the Grand Seignior, and his chariot, in which were ten women of the seraglio, the military chest, in which were found three millions, and the archives of the chancery of the sultan<sup>c</sup>.

The sultan takes Titoul.

Is intirely defeated by prince Eugene, with the loss of 30,000 men, &c.

f THAT prince had fled to Belgrade with a small body of horse, and left the remains of his army intrenched on the opposite bank of the Theysse; while prince Eugene marched into Bosnia, took Seraglio, the capital, by surprize, destroyed the fortresses of Dobay, Magloy, and Brandack, and loading his army with booty, led them back into winter-quarters, returning himself to Vienna.

g THE troops that had been employed upon the Rhine, and in Italy, having now marched into Hungary, and being assembled at Salankemen, between Peterwaradin and Belgrade, prince Eugene repaired thither early in the spring, with a design to open the campaign, before the

Turks were joined by the khan of the Tartars, who was on his march with thirty thousand a men. The prince made many attempts to draw the enemy to an engagement; but they still continuing in their camp, he proposed in a council of war to besiege Temeswaer, which, if it was taken, would confine the infidels to Walachia, and prevent them from giving any assistance to the malcontents of Transylvania and Upper Hungary; but the place was so well provided with every thing for a siege, and the Ottoman army was now so strongly reinforced by the junction of the Tartars, and the garrisons of several towns, that it was thought proper not to undertake that enterprize. Prince Eugene, afterwards hearing of a great convoy that was preparing for Temeswaer, made all the necessary dispositions to intercept it; but his design being betrayed by a hussar that deserted to the enemy, the convoy was stopped, and the Imperialists obliged to return to their camp. Thus the whole campaign having passed b over without any action, both parties now waited the issue of the conferences for peace to be held at Carlowitz, a small town upon the Danube, near Peterwaradin.

THE emperor, tho' he was now delivered from the war with France, yet, as his revenues were quite exhausted, he very willingly hearkened to proposals of peace; and the Grand Seignior, fearing a revolution upon his bad success, had prevailed with the king of Great Britain, and the states-general of the United Provinces, to act as mediators in negotiating a peace. The first conference was held on the first of November, and the preliminaries being quickly agreed upon, the treaty was signed on the twenty-sixth of January, in the year following, between the sultan on one part, and the house of Austria, the Venetians, Poland, and Muscovy, on the other. Transylvania was ceded to the emperor, with the conquests which he had made in Hungary; and a truce was agreed to between the emperor and the Porte for twenty-five years. The Turks being able to obtain nothing for Tekeli, as an acknowledgement for his services, they ceded to him Lugos, Carinsibes, and Vidin, with the title of a principality. c

THIS year there was some opposition to the execution of the treaty of Ryswick by the Protestants and the elector-palatine. The Protestants complained to the diet against the fourth article of the treaty, concerning religion, as a formed design between the emperor and the king of France to destroy the Protestant religion in Germany: but far from having that satisfaction which they desired, they were only told, that the article in the treaty, concerning religion, was conformable to that of Westphalia, the Catholics being left to enjoy the free d exercise of their religion in Protestant countries, and Protestants enjoying the same privileges in Catholic countries. The elector-palatine, under pretence of not being fully re-established in all his rights, refused to pay the one hundred thousand florins to the duchess of Orleans, according to his agreement. To prevent this refusal from troubling the peace of the empire, both parties consented to refer their reciprocal pretensions to the arbitration of the emperor's ministers at Frankfort.

ERNEST-AUGUSTUS, duke of Hanover, dying on the twenty-fourth of June, without ever having been admitted into the electoral college, his son George-Lewis, who succeeded him, met likewise with the same opposition; for though he received the investiture of the electorate from the emperor, in the month of January following, yet the electors and princes e opposing him, presented a memorial to the kings of France and Sweden, guarantees of the treaty of Westphalia, shewing, that the erection of that electorate was contrary to the Golden Bull, and other constitutions of the empire. The two kings laid these complaints before the court of Vienna, who did not much regard them, hoping that the opposition would insensibly drop, when the fear of the tendency of the emperor's proceedings was abated.

A. D. 1700.

MEAN while, the king of England and the states of Holland took measures to preserve peace between the houses of Austria and Bourbon. As the king of Spain, whose life was now despaired of, had no children, and the young electoral prince of Bavaria, whom he had appointed his heir, was lately dead, it was thought prudent, in order to avoid a war, to regulate the succession to his estates by a treaty of partition before his death. The only pretenders to succession, by birth, were the dauphin, and Joseph king of the Romans. f The dauphin, being the son of the eldest daughter, seemed to have the best title; but Maria-Theresa, his mother, having renounced all right to the succession of Spain, the emperor justly insisted upon a preferable claim. Lewis XIV. from a pretence of moderation, and love of peace, did not insist upon the whole succession for the dauphin, but acceded to the partition; by which the dauphin was to have the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, with their dependencies, the duchy of Lorraine, the marquissate of Final, and the province of Guipuscoa; the duke of Lorraine was to have the Milanese; and the archduke all the rest of the Spanish monarchy. The French king and his son appeared satisfied with the partition, and bound themselves not to accept any will, testament, or donation, contrary to the treaty. Nevertheless, the g greatest part of the troops of France moved towards Spain; and the ministers of Lewis XIV.

- a at that court, having gained over the cardinal Portocarrero, and many of the grandees, who had an aversion to the Germans, they persuaded their king to sign a will upon his death-bed, in favour of the duke of Anjou, second son to the dauphin. The emperor, who had all along refused to accede to the treaty of partition, as being rightful heir to the whole, now likewise declared against the will. He protested against all that had been done as null and void; and that he might not give apprehensions to the princes of Germany, by claiming the succession himself, he declared the archduke Charles, his second son, king of Spain, and only claimed the Milanese as a fief of the empire. The king of Spain dying on the first of November, Lewis XIV. immediately accepted of the will. He sent the duke of Anjou into Spain, ordered French garrisons into the Spanish Netherlands and the duchy of Milan, and sent a squadron of ships to the West Indies.

- b THE French, by sending garrisons into the Milanese and Flanders, greatly alarmed the emperor and the Dutch. Leopold, claiming the duchy of Milan as a fief of the empire, devolved to him by the death of the king of Spain without issue, ordered prince Vaudemont, governor of the Milanese, and likewise the cities of that duchy, to swear allegiance to him; but Philip V. the new king of Spain, had prevented him, and received the homage of the governor and the states before the arrival of the emperor's messenger. Leopold, then resolving to have recourse to arms, ordered a body of twenty-nine thousand men to march into Italy under the command of prince Eugene, and negotiated alliances with the other powers in Europe. The kings of Denmark, Sweden, and Poland, refused to engage in a league against France; and the Swiss cantons, and the republic of Venice, declared that they would observe an exact neutrality: but the elector of Brandenburg having for a long time been ambitious of the title of king, Leopold secured him to his interest, by consenting to acknowledge him as king of Prussia; for which favour the elector engaged to furnish ten thousand men at his own expence during the war, and likewise maintain a company in the garrison of Philipsburg. The king of Portugal, after many delays, at last made a treaty with France and Spain. The king of England and the states of Holland had not yet declared themselves: but the French, uneasy at their preparations, endeavoured to amuse them, by sending count d'Avaux to the Hague. After many conferences, the negotiation was at last broke up, the French refusing to evacuate the Spanish Netherlands, or give any satisfaction to the emperor.

- d PRINCE Eugene, having arrived in Italy, made a feint of passing the Po near Ferrara. Having thus amused the French, he passed the Adige near Carpi, and advanced to Albaro, within two miles of Verona. Upon his approach Catinat decamped, and posted five thousand of his men at Carpi, and the rest at Ostiglia. Prince Eugene attacking the forces posted at Carpi, after a brisk engagement drove them from their posts, took one hundred prisoners, and the greatest part of their baggage. In several other skirmishes the Germans having the advantage, Lewis XIV. sent Villeroy into Italy, with orders to march against the enemy. Prince Eugene, having then no place of defence to retire to, in case of a defeat, had fortified his camp at Chiari with strong intrenchments; and, being informed of the design of the enemy, disposed his army in order to receive them. On the first of September the French, having passed the Oglio, attacked the German camp with great resolution; but being received with firmness, after an engagement of four hours they were repulsed, with the loss of five thousand men. Afterwards, their army being attacked with sickness, they quitted the field, and retired into winter-quarters. Towards the end of the campaign the Germans laid all the Mantuan under contribution, except Mantua and Goits; and, continuing in motion all the winter, they took several places on the Oglio, which greatly enlarged their quarters.

Prince Eugene defeats the French at Carpi,

- f As the war between the emperor and France did not directly regard the empire, but only the succession to the crown of Spain, several princes of the empire assembled at Heilbron, and concluded a treaty of neutrality. The electors of Bavaria, Cologne, and Mentz, and the circles of Suabia and Franconia, engaged to take no part in the present war. But the emperor having prevailed with the greatest part of the princes to take part with him in the war, the dukes of Hanover and Zell marched with their troops into the territories of the duke of Wolfembutte, and made themselves masters of several places, which obliged that duke to quit his engagements with France, the elector promising to take into his service those troops he had raised to serve Lewis XIV. The Dutch likewise, being informed that the elector of Cologne desired some French troops to enter his country, marched into his territories, and took possession of several of his towns. Representing to the king of England, that the French had put formidable garrisons into the strong towns in Spanish Flanders, were drawing a line from the Schelde to the Maese, were making great magazines in Brabant, Guelderland, and Namur, and building forts under the cannon of the towns belonging to the states, that prince concluded an alliance with them and the emperor, which was signed at the Hague on the seventh of September, and known afterwards by the name of the triple Alliance. By this treaty it was stipulated, that if, in the space of two months, the French king did not give satisfaction to the demands of the allies, the parties concerned should mutually assist each other with their whole strength.

MARECHAL Villeroy, having left his head-quarters at Cremona, and repaired to Milan with several of the officers of the garrison, to be present at the diversions celebrated in that city in the month of January, prince Eugene formed the design of surprising Cremona. Having ordered prince Thomas to march from the Parmesan with eight thousand men, to be ready at a certain time to take possession of the bridge upon the Po, he himself marched secretly on the other side of the river towards the town; and sending in a small body of men, through the ruins of an old aqueduct, who quickly made themselves masters of one of the gates, he entered the city with four thousand men, before the garrison had any apprehension of his being near them<sup>k</sup>. The Germans were opposed by one regiment at first, till the rest of the garrison put themselves in a posture of defence; then the skirmishes became very warm, the Imperialists still pushing forwards to the other side of the town, wanting to make themselves masters of the gate of the bridge. Villeroy, who had returned from Milan the evening before, awaking with the disturbance, ran out into the street, and was taken prisoner by the Germans<sup>l</sup>. The garrison, by this time, being thoroughly alarmed, had secured the gate of the bridge; and the body of troops, that marched from the Parmesan, coming too late, had no access, which delay obliged prince Eugene to think of a retreat. Finding it impossible to keep possession of the town with the few troops he had, after skirmishing the whole day, he retired at night by the gate of St. Margaret, carrying marechal Villeroy, and several other prisoners, with him.

THE French, having then no other enemy to contend with but prince Eugene, in the beginning of March sent twenty-five thousand men into Italy, under the command of the duke of Vendome, who was to succeed marechal Villeroy. The duke having marched thro' the Venetian territories, to avoid prince Eugene's posts upon the Oglio, arrived at the French camp, and began with the relief of Mantua; which had been blockaded by prince Eugene for eight months. In the beginning of June, the French army encamped within a league of the Imperialists, with the design of offering a battle; but as they were greatly superior, prince Eugene declined an engagement, till he should be reinforced by the junction of several garrisons. Hearing that the French had a design upon the castle of Luzara, the prince marched on the fifteenth of August with a design to attack them: at five in the evening the artillery began to play upon the enemy, and soon after both armies engaged; the battle continued for two hours very desperate, and night putting an end to the engagement, both sides claimed the honour of the victory<sup>m</sup>, the Germans having possessed the field of action, and the French afterwards making themselves masters of Luzara and Guaftalla.

England and Holland declare war against

QUEEN Anne, who succeeded to the throne of England after the death of king William, supported the engagements which he had entered into, and on the fourth of May declared war against France and Spain. The Dutch having sent some troops to the siege of Kaiserwert, as auxiliaries to the emperor, followed the example of queen Anne, and became principals in the war. Kaiserwert having been put into the hands of the French by the elector of Cologne, and endangering the circle of Westphalia, and the states of Holland, the emperor ordered the prince of Nassau-Saurbrug to besiege the place. The garrison being frequently reinforced by count Tallard, who was encamped on the other side of the Rhine, the allies did not make themselves masters of the town before the fifteenth of June, after fifty-nine days open trenches<sup>n</sup>.

THE duke of Burgundy arriving at the French camp on the tenth of June, marechal Boufflers decamped privately with a design of surprising Nimeguen; but the earl of Athlone, who then commanded the confederate army, hearing of his intention, marched immediately to prevent him, and arrived at the outworks of the place half an hour before him. The French, thus disappointed of their design upon Nimeguen, fled off towards Cleve, venting their rage upon the defenceless country, which they rifled and laid waste.

WHILE the French army encamped at Cleve, the earl of Marlborough arrived at Nimeguen to command the army of the allies; and drawing all the detachments from the garrison that could be spared, he passed the Maese below Grave, and took the route of Brabant. The duke of Burgundy being informed of this, advanced towards Ruremond, and reinforced the garrisons in Spanish Guelderland: then finding himself obliged to retreat as the confederates advanced, he left the command of the army to marechal Boufflers, and departed for Paris on the sixteenth of September. The allies having taken several small places without a any resistance, endeavoured to bring the French army to an engagement; but the deputies of the states-general, who followed the army, having represented to him that it was much more for the advantage of Holland to dispossess the enemy of the towns they held in Spanish Guelderland, he detached several parties, who took Venloo, Maseick, Stevenswert, and Ruremond. Marechal Boufflers, fearing that the allies had a design upon Liège, went and posted himself at Tongres, with a view of securing that place; but the confederates advancing, obliged the city to capitulate, and afterwards took the citadel by storm. The allies take Venloo, Maseick, Ruremond, &c.

b THE emperor having prevailed with the greatest part of the princes of the empire to abandon a neutrality, employed those troops that were raised for the preservation of the peace of the empire, in the war against France; and having assembled a powerful army, gave the command of it to the prince of Baden. The troops being encamped between Spire and Worms, began the campaign by laying siege to Landau. Some days after the opening of the trenches, the king of the Romans arrived at the camp, in order to make his first campaign<sup>o</sup>; but with so large a train, and so splendid an equipage, that the expence of it threw all the emperor's affairs in disorder, the most necessary things being neglected, while the treasure was wasted in supporting this needless pomp. The siege was stopped for some weeks for want of ammunition; but at last the citadel was taken by storm on the ninth of September, and on the twelfth the city surrendered. The king of the Romans takes Landau.

c AFTER the taking of Landau, the king of the Romans encamped at Bischweiler near Straßburg, with a design of attacking the French army commanded by marechal Catinat; but seeing the French strongly intrenched, and always upon their guard, he quitted the army, leaving the command to the prince of Baden. Afterwards, the imperial army being greatly weakened by several detachments, which the neighbouring circles and princes had called away to defend themselves against the enterprizes of the elector of Bavaria, the design of attacking the French army was laid aside. That elector having, from the beginning, secretly favoured the succession of the duke of Anjou, his nephew, was now prevailed upon by the offers of France to declare publicly in their favour; after he had, on the eighth of September, surprised the free city of Ulm, and taken Kiechberg, Biberach, and some other places<sup>p</sup>. The elector of Bavaria declares for France, and seizes Ulm.

d THESE proceedings of the elector of Bavaria alarmed the diet at Ratisbon: the credit of the emperor being very great in that assembly, it was resolved, by a decree of the twentieth of September, to declare war against France; and a memorial was presented to the emperor, requesting him to proceed against the elector, according to the constitutions of the empire. Mean while, the French army being now superior to the prince of Baden, took possession of Neuburg on the Rhine, over which river they laid a bridge, notwithstanding the great fire of the Imperialists; and marechal Catinat sent a detachment of ten thousand men, under the orders of count Guiscard and the marquis de Villars, to march towards Huningen, in order to cut off provisions from the prince of Baden. The prince being informed of the motion of the French, decamped from Fridlinguen on the thirteenth of October, in order to go into winter-quarters; but being observed by the marquis of Villars, who was encamped near Huningen, the French passed the Rhine, and attacked him on his march. Marquis of Villars attacks the prince of Baden on his march.

e After an obstinate and bloody engagement, which continued for near two hours, the prince, being greatly inferior to the French, began to think of a retreat; but his infantry falling upon the French foot with fresh vigour, broke their ranks, and drove them from their ground into a wood. The prince, after he had been five hours upon the field of battle, directed his march towards Stauffen. Nevertheless the French claimed the honour of the victory; and Lewis XIV. honouring Villars with a marechal's staff, ordered Te Deum to be sung. The prince of Baden, soon after having received a reinforcement, advanced within half a league of Neuburg, with the design of a second engagement; but marechal Villars, not thinking fit to wait his approach, repassed the Rhine, and encamped at Otmarfen.

f MARECHAL Villars, being thus prevented from joining the Bavarians, wrote to count d'Arco, their general, that he would march towards him by the forest-cities; but the Swiss, having put garrisons in these towns, declared that they would take up arms against him, if he undertook any thing to the prejudice of the liberty of these places. The Bavarians, though they failed in being assisted by the French, took Kempten and Weissenburg, and beat count Palfi, who commanded the Imperialists in that province. Towards the end of October likewise the French made themselves masters of Triers and Traerbach; while, on the other side, the prince of Hesse-Cassel, marching from Liege with ten thousand Hessians, retook Zinck, Brisack, and Andernach, from the French. The French take Triers and Traerbach.

g LEWIS XIV. being assisted by the elector of Bavaria, resolved to carry the war into the empire; and apprehending that the duke of Lorraine would declare for the house of Austria, he obliged him to receive French troops into Nanci, and his other fortified towns. A. D. 1703.

The duke of Savoy concludes an alliance with the emperor.

He likewise desired to continue the alliance with the duke of Savoy; but that duke beginning to reflect, that if the French king drove the Imperialists out of Italy, and became master of the Milanese, he must be exposed to his mercy; and finding that the emperor was willing to make him large offers, he abandoned the interests of France, and concluded a treaty with the emperor on the fifth of January, Leopold having ceded Montferrat to him, with some cities of the Milanese. Lewis XIV. being informed of this treaty, ordered the duke of Vendome to seize and disarm the troops of Savoy that were in his army, and demand the fortresses of Vercell, Verjur, and Susa. The duke, instead of complying with this demand, published a manifesto against France, and sent envoys to England and Holland to solicit assistance, while count Staremberg received positive orders from Vienna to endeavour to join him with fifteen thousand men. That count made himself famous by his remarkable march; having left the Modenese in the worst season of the year, when the roads seemed almost impassable, by reason of the rains that had fallen, he marched through the enemy's country, having the French frequently both before and behind him; and, notwithstanding all obstructions, joined the duke of Savoy at Canelli.

THE emperor being informed that marechal Villars had orders to join the elector of Bavaria, with the army then encamped at Strasburg, sent the prince of Baden with an army to watch his motions; while the counts of Stirum and Schlick had orders to march with two different bodies to enter Bavaria, the one on the side of Saltzburg, the other on the side of Neumark. Stirum, having taken Neumark, defeated a body of Bavarian troops, and made himself master of Freystadt and Neufchatel. At the same time count Schlick, having passed the Inn, took possession of several small places on the other side of Bavaria, and published the evocatory letters of the emperor, discharging the magistrates from their oath of fidelity to the elector their sovereign. To put a stop to the progress of the imperial generals, the elector assembled his army near Brenau, and, to deceive count Schlick, reported that he was going to besiege Passaw. The imperial general, considering the importance of that place, marched towards it with the greatest part of his infantry: the elector having thus succeeded in dividing the count's army, marched towards the bridge of Schardigen, and attacking the body of troops commanded by general Plesse, he routed them, and made himself master of the tents and baggage, and a few days after took Neuburg on the Inn. Afterwards marching towards Ratisbon, with a design of making himself master of that city, count Stirum raised the siege of Amberg, and went to encamp between that place and Neumark, resolving to engage the elector with the first opportunity. The elector, without giving the Imperialists time to entrench themselves, marched towards them all night, and at eight in the morning attacking their camp, routed them in less than half an hour, having killed and taken prisoners about three hundred men, the prince of Brandenburg-Anspach being among the number of the first. The elector having formerly proposed to the city of Ratisbon to observe a neutrality, and not to allow a passage to the imperial troops, to which proposal he had never got any satisfactory answer, now marched to that city, and obliged the magistrates to deliver up the bridge and two gates upon the Danube. Notwithstanding this the emperor refused to ratify the conclusion of the diet for the neutrality of the city; therefore the elector still kept possession of the city, and the deputies fearing to be over-awed in their deliberations, transported the diet to Lintz.

WHILE the elector of Bavaria was employed in protecting his territories from the imperial troops, marechal Villars had passed the Rhine, and taken the fort of Kell over-against Strasburg, and several redoubts built upon the banks of the Rhine. Afterwards attacking the lines of the prince of Baden at Stolhoffen, with an intention of joining the elector of Bavaria, he was repulsed with great loss, the prince having received a reinforcement of eight Dutch regiments during the time of the action. Notwithstanding this unsuccessful attempt, Villars, having received repeated orders, resolved to endeavour to join the elector by the Black Forest, where the passes were but slightly guarded, it being thought impracticable to march that way, by reason of the great rains; and overcoming all difficulties, he at last joined the elector near Dutling, on the nineteenth of September.

THE combined army immediately marched to attack the lines of count Stirum; but that general, being informed of their design, quitted his intrenchments, and marched to join the prince of Baden. The duke of Bavaria and marechal Villars, pursuing him, defeated his army near Donawert, and obliged them to retire under the cannon of Norlingen, leaving all their baggage, thirty-three pieces of cannon, and three thousand dead upon the field, besides losing three thousand prisoners, and many standards. The French likewise, with another army of forty thousand men, commanded by the duke of Burgundy, besieged Brisack, which surrendered after three days open trenches, for which the governor afterwards lost his head; and count Marfigli, who was second in command, was degraded, and had his sword broke over his head by the hand of the hangman.

- a WHILEST the emperor was thus overpowered in Germany by the French and Bavarians, the affairs of the confederates upon the Lower Rhine, and in Flanders, were in a more prosperous situation. Count Lettum, general of the Prussians, having taken Rhimbreg, blocked up Gueldres; and the duke of Marlborough having invested Bonn, opened the trenches in three different places, on the eighth of May, and carrying on the siege with great vigour, obliged the city to surrender on the fourteenth. While the duke of Marlborough was employed in the siege of Bonn, the rest of the confederate army, then assembled at Maestricht, proposed to march to Tongeren; but the marechals Boufflers and Villeroy advancing with forty thousand men, the allies were obliged to retreat under the cannon of Maestricht. The French afterwards took Tongeren, where two battalions were quartered; but the duke of Marlborough joining the confederate army at Maestricht, with the troops that formed the siege of Bonn, they abandoned that place, after they had blown up the walls and the tower, and retreated to Hannuyt. The French thus declining an engagement, the allies resolved to attack them in their intrenchments: accordingly baron Spaar was appointed to attack the lines towards Ghent; while general Coeborn passed the Scheld with another detachment, to make an attack near Liefkenshoek; and general Opdam, with the rest of the army, made an attempt before Antwerp. On the twenty-seventh of June, in the morning, baron Spaar feigning a march towards Eruges, immediately altered his disposition, and attacked the lines in the country of Waes, near Steken, where, after a bloody and obstinate dispute, he forced them sword in hand. About the same time, general Coeborn attacking them at the point of Callo, after a short resistance, broke through, with very inconsiderable loss. Next day baron Opdam, who was posted nearest Antwerp, marched to Eckeren, with design of appearing before that city, and preventing them from sending any detachments over the bridge into Flanders. He remained two days without seeing any enemy; but, on the thirtieth of June, marechal Boufflers and marquis Bedmar appeared at the head of thirty-two squadrons and thirty-two battalions, and using the advantage of their superiority, immediately attacked the allies. The action was very warm on both sides, and the French pushing on within pistol-shot of the place where general Opdam was, cut him off from the army; upon which he fled to Breda, with thirty horse: but the Dutch, tho' forsaken by their general, rallied again, and maintained their ground with such firmness, that the French were obliged to retire. As the loss was pretty equal on both sides, each party claimed the victory. The allies soon after joining all their forces together, took Limburg and Huy; and Gueldres at last surrendered to the Prussians, on the seventeenth of December.

The duke of Marlborough takes Bonn.

The allies take Limburg and Huy.

ON the Upper Rhine, after marechal Villars had joined the Bavarians, the elector marched into Tirol, reviving his antient claims upon that province; and having taken Inspruck the capital, and raised great contributions on the other towns, he marched towards Trent, to meet the duke of Vendome, who was to join him from Italy; but count Staremberg detaching a body of troops to secure the passes and castles upon the road, and the boors of Tirol rising against the Bavarians, the elector was obliged to retire out of the country before the duke of Vendome could join him.

- e THE duke of Burgundy having left the command of the army after the reduction of Brieg, marechal Tallard was ordered to besiege Landau, which had been taken by the king of the Romans the year before. The place being of great importance, the prince of Hesse-Cassel set forwards from the Netherlands with a body of troops, in order to raise the siege, who having joined the general of the Palatine forces near Spire, they concerted measures for the relief of the place. The French, hearing of the prince's departure, ordered monsieur Præcontal, with a body of ten thousand men, to follow him with all expedition. Marechal Tallard having received this reinforcement, did not wait for the Imperialists in his lines, but marched out to meet them, and attacking them before they had time to form, he defeated them with the loss of three or four thousand men. Afterwards returning to his camp before Landau, the governor of the city expecting no more relief, surrendered on the sixteenth of November. The elector of Bavaria still keeping the field, on the sixth of December invested Augsburg, which surrendered soon after.

The French take Landau.

The prince of Hesse is defeated at Spierbach.

- g ABOUT the end of this month, Charles, king of Spain, arrived in England from Vienna, in order to embark from thence for Lisbon, the king of Portugal having now made an alliance with the emperor, upon consideration of having several places in Spain, and the country beyond Rio de la Plata in America, ceded to him. Leopold, who, in the beginning of the war, had ceased mentioning his claim to the crown of Spain, and only insisted on his right to the Milanese, as a fief of the empire, judging that the Germanic body would not consent to his adding that monarchy to his hereditary dominions, this year ceded his right to the Spanish monarchy to the archduke Charles, who was proclaimed at Vienna, on the twelfth of September, king of Spain, by the name of Charles III.* In England he was received with great magnificence; and the queen behaved towards him in a very noble and obliging manner. Orders being immediately given to fit out the fleet with all expedition, he sailed soon after for Portugal, where he arrived on the ninth of March, with about nine thousand men, raised by England and Holland for his service. Charles, upon his landing at Lisbon, published a manifesto in Portugal and Spain, promising a pardon to all those who should abandon the party of Philip duke of Anjou. This prince, on the other side, published a manifesto, which he supported with a strong army, and entering Portugal, took several towns, which the Portuguese retook at the end of the campaign. The prince of Darmstadt foiled an attempt on Barcelona, sailed with the combined fleet to Gibraltar, which he reduced in the month of August, and surrendered into the hands of the English.

In Italy the French seized upon Modena, because the duke had declared for the emperor. The Imperialists retaliated upon the prince of Mirandola, protected by Lewis; and the duke of Mantua, perceiving his dominions become the theatre of war, retired to Paris, where he married madame d'Elbauf. Nothing, however, could obstruct the conquests of Vendome, who over-ran the territory of Victor Amadeus with surprising rapidity. Vercel and Touré fell an easy prey, and were demolished; Susa experienced the same fate; but Verue sustained a siege of five months open trenches, though the garrison at length yielded to the superior fortune of the French general.

Disturbances
in Hungary.

WHILE the imperial court was under great affliction for the losses sustained in Italy, the Hungarian malcontents ravaging the duchy of Austria, pushed their incursions to the gates of Vienna. To prevent their destroying the suburbs, the emperor ordered a deep ditch to be formed from the mountains to the Danube, and defended by strong redoubts, mounted with cannon. Three years had now passed since the court had arrested Ragotski; about this time he made his escape, and no sooner found himself at liberty, than he fomented a rebellion in Hungary, in defence of the religion and privileges of that kingdom. The allies, apprehending the disturbances in this quarter might occasion an unreasonable diversion, and draw the emperor's attention from the affairs of Spain, and the more immediate object of the confederacy, offered their mediation. They pleaded so warmly the general interest of the empire, that the Hungarians consented to send deputies to Vienna to represent their grievances. They demanded, in consequence of the royal capitulation, that all civil and military employments should be given to natives; that the prince Ragotski should be set at liberty; that the sentence pronounced against the prince should be revoked, and all his possessions restored. The imperial court was unwilling to accept these conditions; but fearing they could not obtain better by force of arms, they proposed, that the kingdom of Hungary should be elective at the death of the king of the Romans; that this prince should renounce the hereditary act passed in favour of his family, provided the nobility and people renewed their oath of fidelity to his person; that the Catholic and Protestant religions should be mutually tolerated and restored to their former privileges; that the emperor and king of the Romans should grant a general amnesty without exception; that all new taxes should be abolished, and the people suffered to engage in every species of industry and commerce, on paying the antient duties regulated by the states of the kingdom; that, in three months after the ratification of this agreement, a general diet of the nation should assemble, to examine the grievances of the people; and that, for the three succeeding years, the same diet, if they thought proper, should meet, to deliberate on the general affairs of the kingdom; finally, that the Hungarians should be permitted to send residents to Vienna, vested with the character of counsellors to the king.

THESE terms would appear more favourable to the Hungarians than the conditions demanded; but they were thought too general. Ragotski's ambition and revenge were not satiated; his influence was great, and he found himself supported by a powerful army. In person he commanded a body of twenty thousand Hungarians; general Forgats was at the head of eight thousand; count Caroli had under him nine thousand men; Esterhazi four thousand; and Bereccini was assembling an army of twenty-five thousand strong. So formidable an armament elevated the courage, and raised the demands of the Hungarians: they grew indifferent to an accommodation, and were preparing to drive matters to extremities, and begin the war with vigour. Their conduct greatly embarrassed the court at this critical juncture. Already the French army, under the elector of Bavaria, occupied the chief posts on the Neckar and the Danube, after having reduced Augsburg, Passau, and other considerable places. Lewis had promised to assist him with all his forces; but all the passes were guarded, and the lines of Stolhoffen, Kinchel, and Bebel, possessed by the prince of Baden. Marechal Tallard, however, surmounted these difficulties by an ingenious feint: under pretence of a design to march through the Swiss territories, he drew off the imperial forces from their posts, and penetrated by forced marches the Black Forest. Nothing could

- a now have saved the empire besides the vigilance and ability of Marlbrough, who flew with incredible rapidity from the Netherlands, joined the prince of Baden, forced the lines at Schellemburg, obliged the elector to retire from Dillingen, his troops to abandon Donawert, after burning the magazines, and several cities of the electorate to submit to the superior fortune and conduct of the confederates. It was now that the most advantageous propositions were made to that prince, with a view to detach him from the French monarch. He amused the allies, under the pretext of deliberating upon their proposals; but shewed, by the event, that nothing was capable of shaking his constancy and fidelity to his engagements. The battle of Blenheim was lost, after prodigious slaughter; the electress constrained to implore the protection of the imperial court, at the price of almost all her dominions, and the electorate reduced to the utmost distress; yet did the elector remain firm and unmoved in his resolution to adhere to the treaty with Lewis (A).

b In consequence of the flow of success produced by the actions at Schellemburg and Blenheim, the emperor commanded the ministers of Bavaria and Cologne to quit Ratisbon; a proceeding which highly incensed the Bavarians, and obliged them to declare to the inhabitants, that, if they refused paying a contribution of three hundred thousand florins, their city would immediately be laid in ashes. The regency and the diet were terrified at these menaces: the imperial ministers represented the danger of continuing the diet in a city threatened with bombardment, and proposed transferring it to Egra, a strong town on the frontiers of Bohemia and Franconia. To this the deputies of the circles replied, that, by the constitution of the Germanic body, the diet could only be held in a free city; that, as Egra did not enjoy this privilege, they could not consent to the proposition; but it was easy, they said, to obviate all difficulties, by observing an exact neutrality.

c DURING these disputes about the security of the diet, and the privileges of the Germanic constitution, the allies, determined to push their advantage, invested Landau, where the brave defence of Laubanie astonished all Europe. This intrepid officer behaved, under the pressure of bodily infirmity, and the misfortune of blindness, with all the ardour and impetuosity of youthful bloom and florid health. He replied to the menacing summons sent to him by the king of the Romans, that he could not let slip the glorious opportunity of perishing in the service of his country, and erecting the most honourable monument to his own memory on the ruins of Landau, in which he proposed burying himself. He kept his word, and obstinately defended the last remaining work, ordering himself to be conducted to the trenches to feel the progress of the enemy, and giving directions for the sallies; which the soldiers, fired with the amazing constancy of their general, obeyed without murmuring, and executed with irresistible fury. At length Laubanie was wounded, every inch of ground was lost, the garrison dwindled to an handful, spent with perpetual fatigue, and a general assault preparing: this determined the governor to save the lives of his valiant garrison by an honourable capitulation, which he obtained, without hesitation, on the twenty-fourth of November, after the siege had cost the Imperialists near ten thousand men, killed and wounded.

d THE campaign terminated with the obstinate battle of Cassano, in which prince Eugene was defeated, after the most glorious efforts to restore the emperor's affairs in Italy. Greatly inferior in number of troops, distressed for money and necessaries, and supported only by promises and his own genius, he encountered Vendome, the best general of France, at the head of an army flushed with conquest. Even his repulse at Cassano was less mortifying to the great soul of Eugene, than the constant checks and mortifications he sustained from the unsteady measures of the imperial court, fluctuating from one resolution to another. Already the princes of the empire began to testify their aversion to a war, which, though fortunate for the last campaign in Germany, produced nothing but useless victories, desolation, and slaughter: the republic of Holland raised various difficulties about furnishing her quota of money and troops: she made fresh demands, and proposed several alterations in the new levies, in the pay, cloathing, and quarters of the army: the prince of Hesse refused to suffer his troops to be commanded by Dutch officers: and prince Lewis of Baden would not acknowledge that superiority which had long been granted by the other inferior princes of the empire as due to the republic. To these difficulties others, more immediately relative to the empire, were superadded: the circle of Suabia, to avoid paying the stipulated contingent, represented, that the country was ruined by the heavy contributions levied by the French, by furnishing winter-quarters to both armies, and by the marches and counter-marches of friends and enemies. This affair was debating in the aulic council, when the emperor Leopold breathed his last, on the third day of May, after having wore the imperial diadem for forty-six years, maintained the affection of his subjects, great authority in the diet, the respect of neighbouring powers, and the reputation of an affable, cautious, and politic prince, whose prudence had often preserved the crown that tottered on his head, and his character, amidst the vicissitudes of a variegated fortune (B).

In 1666, he married Maria-Theresa, daughter of Philip IV. of Spain. At her death he espoused Claudia, daughter to his cousin the archduke Ferdinand: and lastly, he married Eleonora, princess of palatine, daughter to the elector. By his first marriage, he had one daughter; and by the last, two sons and three daughters (1).

A. D. 1705.
The emperor
Joseph's offers to the Hungarians.

THE emperor Joseph succeeded to the imperial crown of his father in the flower of his age, after having some years before been solemnly acknowledged king of Hungary and Bohemia. It was universally believed that this change in the succession would contribute greatly to terminate a war, which had desolated Germany, and impoverished Europe; but the opportunity that offered of recovering Lorrain, and penetrating into France, was lost. The English were obstinately bent against all terms of accommodation; and Lewis was not sufficiently humbled to grant such conditions to Joseph, separately, as he could with honour accept. It was certainly intended to compromise the differences with the Hungarians; but their spirit and invincible love of liberty pushed them on to demand such a barrier for their freedom, as would wholly have destroyed the emperor's authority. Joseph banished the ministers most attached to the jesuits, hoping thereby to prevail on the malcontents to listen to reasonable conditions. He promised to restore to the natives all the effects the jesuits had acquired, and the immense riches they had amassed since the year 1655; to convoke a general diet, to which all might report their grievances; to restore and confirm the antient privileges of the nation; to assemble a general diet every three years, and oftener, if necessary; candidly to examine the pretensions of Ragotski, and the other discontented chiefs; and to pass a general amnesty, including all degrees of men. Six days were given the Hungarians to deliberate on these proposals; after which they were to be persecuted with the utmost rigour, and their country desolated with fire and sword.

RAGOTSKI called a great council of the principal lords of the kingdom to deliberate on these proposals: the result was, to hearken to no conditions which tended to disunite them; to keep in arms until their grievances were fully redressed; to oblige Joseph wholly to banish the jesuits; to abolish the arrears of the diet of Presburg in 1687; to restore to the people their uncontested right of electing their own sovereigns; to have the sole garrisoning of their own fortresses; and to obtain ample security that no foreign troops should ever be quartered in the kingdom, or employments bestowed but upon natural-born Hungarians, either civil or ecclesiastical, except in cases where the diet should think proper to gratify very extraordinary services by certain preferments. All the members of the council swore strictly to observe this resolution, and to punish as traitors to their country those who should depart from their engagements, or connive in the least with the measures of the house of Austria.

THE consequence of the discontents in Hungary was apparent to the confederates. England and Holland were sensible that the emperor would apply his whole strength to subdue those turbulent subjects; they therefore exerted their utmost endeavours to mediate an accommodation. Their mediation was accepted by both parties, and conferences were held at Tyrnaw; but some inconsiderable advantages gained by the imperial forces encouraged the emperor to rise in his demands. A body of the Hungarians was defeated a near Fort Pax by general Glokelsberg; and Bereccini was worsted in a sharp encounter he had with count Heißler. Thus the negotiations were broke off, after they were in a fair train of coming to a happy issue.

GENERAL Heberville, who commanded the grand imperial army, could not boast the same advantages. After raising the blockade of Waradin, he advanced within sight of the malcontents, intrenched at Scibo to dispute his passage. Here he met with a variety of unexpected obstructions; and was reduced to the necessity of giving battle, under all the disadvantages of situation, in returning to Great Waradin, and exposing his rear to the attacks of the enemy. Besides, Rabutin had sent him advice, that, without immediate succours, he should be forced to relinquish all his imperial majesty's fortresses in Transylvania.
 b In this extremity, he determined upon fighting. At first the enemy made a brave resistance: they twice repulsed the Imperialists with great slaughter; but their cavalry giving way, they were forced to yield to Heberville's obstinacy, to abandon their camp with precipitation, and leave their baggage and magazines to be plundered. This victory was followed by the intire reduction of Transylvania, where the emperor's sovereignty was again acknowledged; after which Heberville returned to Hungary, having left a sufficient force with Rabutin for the defence of the province.

WHILE Vienna rung with rejoicings for the victory at Scibo, Lower Hungary, Moravia, and the hereditary dominions, were desolated by the malcontents, who had penetrated into the heart of the duchy of Austria. Trauttsrandorf, with some other towns and villages, were
 c laid in ashes, and several fortresses reduced, in which the rebels lodged their booty. Their success in pillaging drew into their party crowds of the Austrian peasants, fired with the hopes of plunder; and this increase of numbers so elevated the expectations of the malcontents, that they refused the armistice proposed by the mediators. The allies acted heartily in this cause, that the emperor might be at liberty to turn his whole force against the common enemy; but their endeavours proved fruitless. Lewis, though considerably weakened by his late defeats, still maintained his spirit, and now joined redoubled activity to numerous forces. Marechal Villars was at the head of a formidable army on the Moselle; and the banks of the Rhine were covered by the numerous troops of Marsin. The elector of Bavaria had invested and reduced Huy, the garrison surrendering prisoners of d war; and Liege was in the utmost danger, had not the fortune of Marlborough interposed. That general, with his usual boldness and irresistible impetuosity, forced the elector's lines near Messelin on the Maine, and obliged him to retire in disorder towards Louvain, to cover that place, Antwerp, Lièrre, and Mechlin. This motion rendered almost fruitless the bloody advantage gained by the allies; yet the elector mentions it in the following modest terms, in a letter which he wrote in the field to his favourite the baron Malkenecht:
 "God I hope will pardon those who were the cause of our being surpris'd. The whole
 "army is here; nor is the misfortune irrecoverable; with God's assistance we shall be "able to save Brabant and Antwerp. I am well, but extremely fatigued." After all, it was the obstinacy of the Dutch deputies which probably saved the elector: Marlborough
 e was for pursuing and attacking him in the neighbourhood of Louvain; but he was opposed by the Hollanders, who refused to suffer the Dutch army to run the hazard. The English general loudly complained, that their unseasonable caution had wrested victory out of his hands, and deprived him of additional laurels. He remonstrated to the states-general, of the little regard paid by their officers to discipline and subordination: "My "heart is so full, said he, that I cannot refrain from lamenting to you the decline of my
 "authority since the last campaign." However, all his remonstrances produced no effect: all his efforts served only to reduce some inconsiderable places, and were insufficient to prevent the elector's becoming master of Diest.

ALTERCATIONS now arose between the confederate generals. Marlborough, not un-f justly, reproached the prince of Baden with dilatoriness; and, in some measure, attributed to his backwardness that the different members of the empire had not yet furnished their contingents. The prince replied, that he had never doubted the duke's courage or ability; but he did not imagine he would have presumed to insult a prince of the empire, who had hitherto commanded not only the respect of his equals, but, in a particular manner, the esteem of every officer of candour and merit in the army. Not satisfied with the sarcasm implied in this rebuke, he complained of Marlborough to the courts of Vienna and London: he even wrote to the diet at Ratisbon in terms full of resentment, saying, that the haughty carriage of the Englishman reflected dishonour on the whole German body, if they tamely passed the insult. He alledged, in his own justification, that he only waited g to be joined by his detachments; and that the junction with Marlborough was soon enough effected, had not that general imprudently involved himself in difficulties, from his ignorance of the country, and the enemy's situation: that he now was desirous of throwing upon a prince of the empire an error consequent on his own presumption. The issue of these

these disputes was, that the allied army separated, and by that means suffered M. Villars to reinforce the elector of Bavaria with thirty battalions and fifty squadrons, by which he was again enabled to face his enemies. An attempt was accordingly made to attack the prince of Baden in his intrenchments, before he should be reinforced by the troops of different circles now on their march; but his prudent disposition baffled all the endeavours of the elector and Villars. He soon after received the expected succours, and was in a condition to act offensively, which obliged the French generals to retire behind their lines at Haguenaw. As Villars was forced to detach seven battalions to Italy, he found he should not be able to cover his lines, and therefore retreated under the cannon of Strasburg. By this means the count de Frise was at liberty to invest Drusenheim, which he reduced in five days, while the prince of Baden was forming the siege of Haguenaw. After the batteries had played for some time, Perry, who commanded in the garrison, demanded a capitulation; and proposals were sent him by the prince; the first article of which imported, that he should surrender prisoner of war. Perry demanded eight days to deliberate on this article, and the same time for each of the other propositions; which being refused, the siege recommenced with great vigour. The governor, having advice that the town was not invested on the side of the Saverne, resolved to retire by that quarter, and save the garrison from falling into the hands of the enemy. Leaving the sieur de Rebingue in the covered way with two hundred men, he evacuated the town at nine in the evening, and was followed by Rebingue at eleven o'clock, arriving happily at Saverne before his design was discovered. This circumstance gave additional credit to the reproaches levelled by the duke of Marlborough at the prince of Baden, and persuaded most persons, that the prince was greatly relaxed in his usual vigilance and activity<sup>b</sup>.

A quarrel between the pope and the emperor.

WITH this transaction ended the campaign, during which the emperor found himself involved in a dispute with the pontiff. Cavalletti, one of the imperial ambassador's domestics at Rome, had struck the officers of justice, in the execution of their orders to arrest his son for some misdemeanour. The fiscal, informed of the violence, ordered both to be seized, imprisoned, and their effects sealed up. A few hours after the secretary to the embassy complained to the pope of this insult upon the privileges of an ambassador; but the pontiff replied, that Cavalletti was imprisoned not as the domestic of the imperial ambassador, but as the subject of the holy see, who had opposed the execution of justice. This answer proved unsatisfactory: the count de Lamberg represented the affair to the emperor; but, before he received any instructions from the court of Vienna, the prisoner was set at liberty. Notwithstanding this, the count no sooner received an answer from Vienna than he quitted the ecclesiastical state, without the ceremony of taking leave; and the pope's nuncio was at the same time desired to leave the imperial court. So trivial a circumstance was sufficient to revive an ancient controversy, which had for some time been absorbed in business of more consequence. The emperor now demanded, that cardinal Patuni, secretary of state, should be deprived of his office, and forbid the court; that Palavicini, governor of Rome, should be banished; that the process formed against the marquis del Vasto, a Neapolitan nobleman, vested with the character of ambassador from the archduke Charles, should be burnt by the ignominious hands of the common executioner; that the pontiff should send a cardinal to Vienna, to apologize for his conduct; and that, as an immediate atonement, Ferrara should admit an imperial garrison. This, indeed, was talking in the style of an emperor; no measures half so spirited had been taken since the days of Charles V. Had Joseph persisted, it is probable the pontiff must have yielded to all that was required. Clement wrote several letters to the court of Vienna, representing the irregular conduct of the count de Lamberg, on his quitting Rome. He likewise demanded, that the orders given his nuncio to depart from Vienna should be revoked; but he was not able to appease the emperor, or procure the least mitigation at that time, notwithstanding the affair soon after appears to have been almost forgot.

Cruelties of the Imperialists in Bavaria.

THE altercation between the papal and imperial courts, prevented Clement's soliciting the emperor to pay more regard to the complaints of the Bavarians. By a treaty with the electress, all acts of hostility on both sides were to cease, and the elector to be regarded merely as the general of Lewis XIV. at the head of a French army. Besides, it was stipulated that the Bavarians should enjoy all their privileges; and that the revenues of Munich, the capital, and its dependencies, should go untouched, for the support of the prince and the electoral family. The treaty was badly observed after the emperor gained possession of Bavaria: it was regarded as a conquered country, and treated with the same rigour as if no agreement had ever passed: all the records were removed to Vienna, and the electoral palace stripped of the plate and rich moveables. The nobility and people were oppressed with exorbitant contributions, and the troops quartered upon them at discretion: all were a pillaged and disarmed. Nothing could exceed the misery of the inhabitants besides the brutality of the Austrian army, the soldiers committing every kind of excess; and the rapacity of the officers carried them so far, as to dig in the tombs for the hidden treasures of the Bavarians, which ought to have been sacred: all were imprisoned upon suspicion of concealing their wealth; and to be rich, was sufficient to be deemed criminal: loud complaints were made to the imperial commissaries: crowds of old men, women, and children, poured out their grievances and tears before them, in a piteous manner, capable of moving the most obdurate breast; yet did their sighs, wailings, and wretchedness, produce no effect. As it was necessary to justify to the public the excesses committed, it was pretended that the Bavarians had conspired against the Austrian garrisons. The accusation was b false, and, indeed, too absurd to gain credit; but it was urged to palliate their severity. The Bavarian nobility demanded of the commissaries a list of the names of the conspirators: they promised to have them punished agreeable to the laws; but the commissaries gave only a general reply, refusing to enter into a detail. Some days after several private gentlemen, who had ventured to make the same remonstrances, were arrested, and their estates confiscated: thus all were deterred from interposing in behalf of the innocent victims to the Austrian avarice.

WHEN it was presumed the spirit of the Bavarians was sufficiently subdued, the count de Lowenstein, governor of the province, published an edict, enjoining all the young men from the age of eighteen to thirty-five to appear in certain places specified, in order to be c draughted for recruits to the regiments in Italy and Hungary. This ordonnance was thought beyond measure oppressive: it was not only a direct violation of the treaty with the electress, but the grossest infraction of the laws of nations, and of the electorate in particular. The peasants hid themselves; and their evasion was construed into an act of rebellion. In a few days all the jails in Bavaria were crowded with the unfortunate inhabitants, dragged out of churches and monasteries, in which they had taken refuge; and where the culprit could not be found, the imperial vengeance was reeked on the heads of his mother, children, and relations. Their houses were pillaged, and the little magazines of provision they had for the support of their families burnt and destroyed. Terrified with these violences, and fainting under the pressure of extreme want, the peasants fled in the night to the woods, d in search of food to appease their hunger. Thither they were pursued by the barbarous Austrians, and driven to such despair, that they united against the common enemy, and joining the malcontents of Bohemia, soon became formidable. Above twenty thousand took the field, and suddenly reduced Burkhausen, Kelheim, Wilshoven, Hilsgarsberg, Brunau, and Scharding. A design was formed to surprise Huy; but their troops being separated in detachments, and accidents preventing their assembling at the place of rendezvous, they were attacked and defeated by the Austrians. Perceiving they could not make head against regular forces, the peasants made proposals to surrender the places they had taken, and lay down their arms upon certain conditions. Their terms were accepted, and an amnesty granted; but observed like the former treaty. Some were hanged, some beheaded, and e others broke on the wheel, dismembered and dispersed about the country, and fixed up in the most public places. At this time the electress was in Italy with her mother the queen of Poland. She demanded leave to return to her dominions, and a passport, which was granted; but just as she arrived on the frontiers of the electorate, she was prohibited from pursuing her journey, without any reason assigned. Her complaints of this violation of the treaty of Landau availed nothing: she was even deprived the poor satisfaction of mingling her tears with those of her faithful subjects, and bewailing in concert the misfortunes of her country.

SUCH was the deplorable situation of the house of Bavaria, when the death of the duke of Zell occasioned some disputes between the family of Hanover and the king of Denmark, f which were happily accommodated under the mediation of the emperor Joseph and the queen of England. The decease of the bishop of Lubec had likewise almost kindled a storm in the North, by renewing the several pretensions of the crown of Denmark, and the house of Holstein-Gottorp, to that see. The duke took possession, and the prince of Denmark demanded the decision of the aulic council. The former was supported by the Swedish monarch, and the king of Denmark resolved to maintain the right of the prince his brother. By the interposition of the queen of England, and the states-general of the United Provinces, the affair was for a time compromised, just as the parties were upon the eve of hostilities. Charles of Sweden was at this time engaged in Lithuania; and king Augustus of Poland, resolving to profit by the opportunity, assembled an army near Grodno. The g Swede, apprised of his design, quitted Lithuania, flew like lightning to Poland, appeared with his army before Grodno, offered battle, and was refused. Augustus waited to be joined by the army from Saxony; but Schulemburg, the Saxon general, was defeated in his march <sup>a</sup> by Renschild, quartered with a body of Swedes on the frontiers of Brandenburg. Next year, after Charles had driven the Russians out of Lithuania, he prosecuted, with redoubled vigour, the quarrel with Augustus, transferring the seat of war into the heart of the electorate of Saxony: in this manner a dispute between two northern princes became a concern of the empire. His arrival overwhelmed the Saxons with consternation: all the princes of the empire dreaded the vicinity of so enterprising and ambitious a monarch. They offered their mediation to accomplish a peace; Charles gave audience to their ambassadors, and the deputies from the states of Saxony, at Alt-Ranstadt. At length a treaty was concluded, in which were a great variety of articles kept secret from the German princes. The treaty was ratified by Stanislaus, the competitor for the crown of Poland, and afterwards sent to Warsaw, for the approbation of Augustus; during which an armistice for ten weeks was published in the Swedish camp. The Polish envoy, Pfingsten, being sent with the treaty, Charles intrusted him with an order for general Mardeweldt, and the palatine of Kiovia, to refrain from hostilities for the time specified; but the envoy committing this order to another hand, it was never delivered. In consequence of this neglect a battle was fought, in which the Swedes were defeated; upon which the peace was again broken, and Charles determined to punish, with the utmost rigour, the supposed perfidy of his enemy. Saxony was loaded with exactions, and the people reduced to extreme misery. In the end, Augustus, to save his hereditary dominions, was forced to renounce the crown of Poland; to confirm it to his rival Stanislaus; to renounce all his engagements with the czar, and other enemies of Sweden; to restore all the jewels and archives of Poland, which he brought into Saxony; to maintain in Saxony and Lusatia the Protestant religion; and to surrender all the Swedish prisoners, deserters, and particularly the famous Patkul, who was broke on the wheel and quartered, though his merit, courage, patriotism, and public character, ought to have exempted him from so ignominious a punishment, however obnoxious he might have been to the Swedish monarch (A). The allies, apprehensive of disobliging the ferocious Charles, were obliged to guaranty this treaty. England and Holland feared he might be induced to join with France, and support the elector of Bavaria, now put under the ban of the empire. Joseph had the same sentiments: he had constrained the aulic council to proscribe the electors of Bavaria and Cologne, by which he confirmed to the council an <sup>d</sup> authority before disputed <sup>b</sup>. After so extraordinary a precedent, it did not become the inferior princes of the empire to contest this extensive jurisdiction, though we have since beheld it prostituted to the worst purposes of ambition and policy.

No sooner was the decree of the aulic council passed, than the emperor assembled a great number of nobility. Seated in his imperial throne, he heard read the acts by which Leopold had invested the two proscribed princes with the electoral dignity. He then tore them in pieces, threw them on the ground, and trampled upon those solemn decrees. The heralds at arms took up the scraps on the points of their lances, and flung them into the street. Then was pronounced the decree of the aulic council, by which the princes were proscribed; after which the sentence was publicly proclaimed by the heralds in all the public streets of Vienna. A price was set on the head of the elector of Bavaria, and the same would have been done to the elector of Cologne, had not his ecclesiastical character exempted him from such severity. Even the children of the elector of Bavaria were deprived of their titles, and ordered to be called only the children of the count de Witelspach. Most princes in Germany blamed the emperor's inflexibility, and the rigour of the sentence: they likewise declared, that the form was not agreeable to the usual method of proscribing the members of the Germanic body. The constitution indeed requires, that the accused should be cited before a full diet, be permitted to plead their own defence, again examined before the three colleges, and, if found guilty, three several times summoned to comply with their obligations, and make ample satisfaction. If the delinquent should still persist in his fault, the three colleges then assemble, and publish the ban of the empire. It was therefore concluded, that as those formalities had not been regarded in this instance, the proscription was void, and of no effect. <sup>f</sup>

(A) Patkul was a native of Livonia: his zeal for the liberties of his country incurred the resentment of the states of Sweden, in the reign of Charles XI. He harangued boldly, in the king's presence, upon this subject; and his eloquence and public spirit secured the royal esteem. The states, however, condemned him to death: the king warned him of his danger, and Patkul withdrew to Poland. Animated with revenge, he advised Augustus to the conquest of Livonia, just as Charles XII. had succeeded to the crown. Upon some disgust he quitted Poland, entered into the service of the czar, and acquitted himself with fidelity. He was at this time invested with the character of ambassador from the czar; notwithstanding which, the necessity to which Augustus was reduced, obliged him to violate the laws of na- <sup>g</sup> tions.

a THE electors, however, rested their cause upon a surer foundation: they hoped that M. Villars, backed by a numerous army, would restore their affairs, and demonstrate the injustice of their sentence. He advanced with great rapidity along the Sar, and obliged the prince of Baden to abandon his camp, and retire towards Drusenheim. This situation likewise he quitted precipitately on the defeat of his advanced guard, who disputed the passage of the Moter with the French forlorn hope. This retreat extremely affected the reputation of the prince of Baden, as he left all his tents standing, his baggage, stores, ammunition, and part of his cannon, a prey to the enemy, repassing the Rhine before a body of irregulars, with an expedition which had all the appearances of a flight. In consequence, Lauterburg fell an easy victim, and the Imperialists were driven from post to post, without the credit of striking a blow, or making the least shew of resistance. In a word, M. Villars profited so much by this general consternation, that he soon occupied all the posts and fortresses from the river Moter to Spirebach. Next he reduced Haguenau by a detachment under the same Perry, who had lately so bravely defended it against the Imperialists: after which, he was too much weakened by draughts made from his army, to enter upon any considerable enterprize.

PRINCE Lewis of Baden was in much the same circumstances: he was forced to send strong reinforcements to Hungary, to oppose the progress of the malcontents, who had forced the lines at Morave, defended by general Boskai, and made an irruption into Austria, whence they returned with booty of immense value. Guy de Staremburg, who imagined he lay in security behind the lines of Oedemberg, had likewise the mortification of being forced; while the Hungarians, after destroying thirty villages, and desolating the whole country, returned with rich plunder to Newhausel. Afterwards Ragotski harrassed, for the space of a month, the army under Staremburg, by perpetual marches, counter-marches, skirmishes, and alarms. Both practised every finesse of war, and exhausted the whole military art, in endeavours to gain some decisive advantage; when at length Ragotski, by a sudden manœuvre, appeared before Strigonia, in Lower Hungary, which he took by assault. Staremburg retook this place soon after, though he found himself unable to stop the ravages of the enemy. Ragotski was at the head of forty thousand men, and had left considerable detachments with the generals Forgats and Oskai, to penetrate into Austria and Moravia. They passed and repassed, pillaged, plundered, desolated all before them, and returned untouched, laden with booty. A corps of Hungarians had near surprized the emperor, and seized his person, as he was hunting in the forest of Eberdorf. The scheme was well laid, and it only miscarried through accident.

IN Italy affairs were not more prosperous: the enemy, under M. Berwick, had reduced Nice, and the Imperialists were diminished at least four thousand in number since prince Eugene had quitted the command. Such was their superiority, that the French were meditating the conquest of all Piedmont; nor could the remonstrances of Eugene animate the councils of Vienna, or quicken their measures. Money was wanting, and the emperor was advised to supply the deficiencies by new impositions on the Bavarians; but Eugene, touched with the misfortunes of the electorate, proposed a scheme more generous and noble: it was to mortgage to the English the revenues of Silesia for the sum of twenty-five thousand pounds sterling. The proposal was embraced, Eugene intrusted with the negotiation, the money borrowed, and the utmost expedition exerted in levying troops for the service in Italy. As soon as the levies were complete, the prince prepared to repass the Alps; but, before his arrival, he was informed of the unfortunate action at Calcinato. Before he could collect the remains of the scattered army, the enemy had invested Turin. The capital was on the verge of destruction, when Eugene, by the most astonishing march, environed by danger, and hemmed in on every side by enemies, appeared before the French camp, forced their intrenchments, obtained a complete victory, relieved Turin, and recovered all the conquests made by Lewis the Great, with a rapidity which will transmit his memory with glory to the latest posterity.

IN Flanders the duke of Marlborough rivalled the fame of Eugene, by a victory equally glorious and decisive as that at Turin. Villeroy was defeated by an inferior army at Ramillies, with the loss of his cannon, baggage, and an infinity of killed and prisoners. Ghent, Bruges, Louvain, Mecklin, Brussels, Oudenarde, and a variety of other places, surrendered at the summons of the victorious confederates. Covered with glory, Marlborough set out for London, and from thence proceeded to sound the intentions of his Swedish majesty, who was supposed to have a bias in favour of Lewis and the elector of Saxony. Here he approved himself as able a statesman as his repeated conquests had shewn him a general.

8 WHILE Marlborough resided at the court of Charles XII. the emperor dispatched the count de Wratisslaus to Leipsick, to accommodate the differences between the Swedish monarch and the house of Austria. Charles demanded satisfaction for the injury done him, by granting a passage through Silesia to a body of Russians. With respect to the house of Hessein, he required, that right of primogeniture should be established, and the see of Lubeck confirmed to the present possessor: he insisted, that his contingent against France should be excused, on account of the war against Poland and Muscovy, in which he was engaged: he farther expected, that liberty of conscience should be allowed the Protestants in Silesia, and the count Zoern sent to apologize in the Swedish camp for the disrespectful terms in which he spoke of him and his ally king Stanislaus. The count replied, that his instructions were too limited to grant those demands: he refused restoring to the Protestants any of the churches of which they were deprived previous to the treaty of Ryswick; but the king insisted and extended his demand to that of Westphalia. Wratislaus returned for fresh instructions to Vienna; and, during his absence, the English and Dutch ministers laboured to persuade the king to march without delay against the Russians. They offered their mediation to terminate the affair with the emperor to his satisfaction; but Charles well knew that his presence would have more influence. In fact, the emperor was forced to accede to all the propositions made by the Swede, who, at this critical juncture, was courted by all the potentates of Europe, who equally feared and admired a young prince so fierce, active, ambitious, and warlike.

THE long duration of a war, in which all Europe was embroiled, intirely drained the provinces of money, and deprived them of the possibility of furnishing the usual contingents. The people ardently wished for peace; but the imperial and British courts, and the states-general, were not yet satiated with conquest. The circles of the Upper and Lower Rhine, of Swabia and Franconia, complained of the impossibility of defending their frontiers against the enemy, unless the stipulated forces were regularly levied. This gave birth to the assembly which met at Heilbron, where it was resolved, that an army of forty thousand men should be raised for this purpose, and augmented by a certain number of English and Dutch forces. A sufficient sum of money for the maintenance of this army was voted; magazines were to be formed at Philipsburg; Landau was to be fortified, garrisoned, and well provided; and recruits sufficient to complete all the regiments to be sent early in the spring to Savoy: but the execution of these resolutions met with numberless difficulties.

NEGOTIATIONS were likewise on the carpet, to engage the emperor to invest his brother, the archduke Charles, with the duchy of Milan. He had long waved this request, and thereby excited jealousy in the Italian states, who dreaded the establishment of the imperial power in Italy, and the vicinity of so formidable a potentate. At the same time the English and Dutch were labouring to procure the extension of the duke of Savoy's territories. He was detached from the French interest by a promise of the late emperor, to cede to him the towns of Valencia and Alexandria, with their dependencies. Joseph had long deferred the performance of his father's promise; but he now at length yielded to the intercession of his allies: he surrendered the above cities to Victor Amadeus, and invested the archduke Charles with the duchy of Milan. Perhaps the treaty which the emperor now signed with the court of France, was the least politic of all his late measures: he consented that Lewis should withdraw his garrisons out of Italy, with all their baggage and artillery. They must have necessarily fallen into the hands of prince Eugene, who now carried all before him; and the French army in Flanders received by this means a reinforcement of eighteen thousand of the best troops of France, veterans, who had served during the war in Lombardy. Had the whole imperial army in Italy been likewise recalled, it would more than have counterbalanced this advantage gained by France; but the case was otherwise: that army was almost wholly taken up in garrisoning the towns evacuated by the enemy. It is true, a direct path was now opened to Provence, and a scheme on foot for penetrating into the heart of France; but as these extensive projects never took effect, it may reasonably be presumed, that this treaty was, on the whole, prejudicial to the alliance. The imperial generals proposed laying siege to Toulon; accordingly the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene encamped at la Valette, where they established their head-quarters. On the twenty-ninth of July they attacked the enemy posted on an eminence near St. Catharine, and strongly intrenched: they were twice repulsed; but returning a third time to the charge, they attacked with such impetuosity as carried the intrenchments sword in hand; upon which they erected batteries on the eminence to play upon Toulon. M. Tesse, who commanded the French army, perceived, that the safety of the town depended upon dispossessing the Imperialists of an eminence that intirely commanded the besieged. He resolved upon the enterprize, and executed it with so much vigour, that the whole allied detachment was put to the sword, and above four battalions cut in pieces. This disappointment, the scarcity of provision, and the difficulty of forcing a strong town well garrisoned, provided and covered with an army, determined the duke and prince Eugene to raise the siege, and withdraw the imperial forces. The latter, however, in his retreat, made himself master of Susa.

NOR

<sup>a</sup> NOR were the emperor's arms more successful on the Rhine. At the death of prince Lewis of Baden, one of the best officers in the imperial service, the command of the army was given to the margrave of Brandenburg-Bareith, a Protestant prince, and the oldest veldt-marechal. It was an agreement between the Catholics and Protestants, that the officers of either religion should have the command in turns; the only expedient by which both parties could be united for the common interest; yet did the directory of Mentz oppose this coalition, because it was disliked by several of the Catholic princes of the Germanic body, who wanted to engross all preferments. The emperor had taken some measures to satisfy the directory, which so enflamed the Protestants, that he was now obliged to appease them, by appointing prince Eugene and the margrave alternately to the command. As the former was wholly occupied in Italy, this regulation gave the Protestants full satisfaction. The margrave no sooner entered upon his new appointment, than he wrote to the several circles to solicit their contingents; and his remonstrances were supported by the states-general of the United Provinces, who wrote to the diet, reproaching the circles with backwardness, and with having taken no measures for the defence of their frontiers, and the campaign on the Rhine. Their letter, which was exceedingly bitter and spirited, became the subject of debate in the diet. Several of the members took offence at the acrimony of the stile; and the ministers refused to act, until they were empowered by fresh instructions from their different courts.

<sup>c</sup> MEAN time, the margrave was at the head of an army on the Rhine; but, instead of the forty thousand men voted by the assembly at Heilbron, it did not exceed twenty-eight thousand men, newly levied, ill armed, and worse paid. With this force he was embarrassed how he should act against M. Villars, and be able to defend the lines at Stolhoffen, which covered the territory of Baden-Dourlach, and extended to the impassable mountains of the Black Forest. These lines were indeed impregnable, had they been sufficiently guarded; but Villars knew the state of the imperial army, and resolved to profit by the opportunity. Conducted by the count de Broglio, who was perfectly acquainted with the country, the strength and weakness of the lines, he made divers feints and false attacks, as if he intended penetrating into the marquisate, while he was assembling twenty battalions, and forty-five squadrons, under Broglio, at Lauterberg. Filling sixty boats with grenadiers, he dropped <sup>d</sup> down to the isle of Newburg: he chased from thence the Imperialists, after a short resistance. As he was preparing to attack the lines, they were abandoned by the margrave, who retired under cover of a thick fog, not imagining he should be able to stand the assault. Thus, without scarce striking a blow, Villars got possession of the strong works at Stolhoffen, all the tents of the Imperialists, great part of their artillery and baggage, the cloathing of several regiments, a variety of copper pontoons, an intire bridge of boats, twenty thousand sacks of corn, a prodigious quantity of forage, ammunition, and stores, and the intire command of the marquisate of Baden. Terrified at this unexpected loss, the marchioness dowager fled precipitately with her family from the castle of Rastadt; but Villars sent after her to request she would return, promising her the protection of his master, and all the respect <sup>e</sup> due to her sex and quality. She relied upon the marechal's word, returned to Rastadt, and found all her effects untouched, and the greatest order observed; only contributions to the amount of one hundred thousand crowns were levied in the marquisate. Villars then penetrated into the duchy of Wirtemberg, which he taxed at the rate of two millions of livres. His approach gave the alarm to the margrave, encamped at Heilbron, who did not believe himself in security here, notwithstanding his army had been augmented by considerable reinforcements. The truth is, he was forced again to weaken himself, in order to secure Landau, Friburg, and Philipsburg, by strong garrisons. Villars, however, had too much discernment to waste his time in sieges. He found it more to the king's and his own advantage to spread consternation over Germany, drive before <sup>f</sup> him the little fugitive imperial army, and support his own by contributions levied on the enemy.

<sup>g</sup> THE misfortunes of the campaign were wholly charged upon the misconduct of the margrave: they ought, perhaps, to be imputed to the backwardness of the circles in contributing their contingents. Certain it is, that so displeased was the emperor with all the margrave's proceedings, that he offered the command of the army to the elector of Hanover, under pretence that Bareith was too old and infirm to support the duty. His true motive was, to engage the elector to join his forces to the Imperialists. This the elector perceived, and declined the compliment, on account of his bad state of health. It was obvious that he chose not to declare himself, until he was certain the princes of the empire would fulfil their engagements, and assured of the measures of the king of Sweden. To raise money sufficient to augment the army, the next step taken by the imperial court was, to confiscate the estates of all the ministers and officers in Bavaria, who had shewn the least attachment to their sovereign; sovereign; a procedure that was followed by the necessity of depriving them of the power of revolting<sup>a</sup>.

to the diet.

ALL this time the circles of Suabia and Franconia, assisted by the deputies of several imperial cities, remonstrated to the diet at Ratisbon upon the dangers which threatened all Germany, and their territories in particular. The remonstrances were followed by a declaration of their deputies, importing, that if speedy measures were not taken for their defence, they should be under the necessity of accepting the proffered neutrality with France. At the same time it was whispered, that the princes of Wirtemberg, Baden, and the states most exposed to the enemy's incursions, had come to a resolution of striking up a separate pacification. In these circumstances, the diet exerted the utmost vigilance to prevent so dangerous a breach in the alliance and the states of the empire. No method more effectual could be found than issuing orders to the margrave of Bareith to join with all possible celerity the troops of Westphalia and other circles, assembling in the neighbourhood of Mentz, and after this junction to proceed to the Rhine. This resolution had two important objects in view, one of which, it was imagined, might necessarily succeed. M. Villars only advanced into the heart of Germany, because the imperial army retired; but should the margrave return to the Rhine, the marechal must infallibly take the same route to watch his motions. On the contrary, if the French meditated the recovery of Bavaria, the Imperialists might pass the Rhine, force the lines at Lauterberg, penetrate into Alsace, and retaliate all the injuries the empire might sustain from the loss of the electorate, and the heavy contributions levied in other districts. The emperor approved the resolution, and the orders were immediately dispatched to the margrave. He passed by Heilbron, through Franconia, with such rapidity as baffled all the endeavours of Villars to obstruct his progress: upon which the French general sent a detachment of four thousand men under the count de Bourg to sustain the lines at Lauterberg, in case they should be attacked. Another detachment, under the count de Broglie, seized upon Lauffen on the Neckar; while the marechal in person crossed that river with a part of his army, and arrived on the fourth of July at Durlach. His approach broke the design of the Imperialists upon Alsace, and enabled him to lay under contribution all the states of the Palatinate.

Hanover is appointed general of the Imperialists.

THOUGH the margrave was reinforced by the troops at Mentz, and the flying camp of general Thungen, he was still unable to make head against the marechal. The necessity of augmenting his army occasioned a motion in the diet to take into the pay of the empire a body of eight thousand Saxons; but to this the circles of Suabia and Franconia objected, on account of the heavy contributions levied upon them by the enemy, which had already impoverished the country. They proposed the necessary supplies should be borrowed of England and Holland: hence the emperor perceived the backwardness of the circles to enter upon fresh expences, and the danger lest they might close with the proposals of France, should any constraint be laid on their inclinations. For these reasons the proposition was dropt, and he again sought the assistance of Hanover. The more strongly to induce the elector to accept the command of the army, it was proposed to invest him with the title of veldt-marechal: the margrave complained of the injustice done him, and the indignity offered, by so declared a preference. He vindicated his own conduct; and, with great truth, shifted the blame on the circles of the empire, the insufficiency of his army, and the want of every necessary. However, the emperor persisted, the margrave resigned the command, and it was bestowed, with the title of veldt-marechal, on the elector of Hanover.

IN the month of September the elector repaired to the camp at Etlinguen, attended by a body of Hanoverians. Immediately he visited all the posts; and, having examined the situation, formed the design of running a line along the Elbe, for the greater security of the country. He sent a sketch of his project to the diet; and, while he expected their sentiments, was preparing to surprise the marquis de Vicois, encamped at Offenburg. With this view he detached two thousand cavalry, and an equal number of infantry, under the conduct of count Merci and prince Lobskowitz, under cover of a thick fog, to make the attempt<sup>b</sup>. They approached so near to the French camp, that the scheme must have taken effect, had they not been discovered by foraging parties, who spread the alarm, and gave the French general time to withdraw and evacuate his camp, with the loss of three hundred soldiers and a few officers. With this transaction ended the campaign, both armies going into winter-quarters.

Spain and Naples.

AFFAIRS in Spain bore a very untoward aspect. The battle of Almanza was lost; the allies every where foiled by the vigilance, activity, and superior genius of marechal Berwick; and the kingdoms of Valentia and Arragon forced to submit to the conqueror. But a these losses were in some measure repaired by the happy revolution in Naples, effected by cardinal Pignatelli and the duke de Monteleone. Here count Tbann was appointed governor, and the archduke Charles declared sovereign of the whole kingdom. At the same time the nuptials of this prince, with Elizabeth-Christina of Wolfenbuttle, was celebrated with great magnificence at Vienna. This reverse of fortune, however, in Spain, prevented his attending the ceremony in person, which was performed by his proxy.

DURING the recess from hostilities produced by the winter, the diet was plied with remonstrances from the allies. The states-general represented, that as the war was undertaken in defence of the liberties of Europe in general, and of the states in particular, they were resolved to prosecute it with the utmost vigour and alacrity: the same measures they expected from all their allies; yet hitherto it unfortunately happened, that in proportion as they augmented their forces, the emperor and princes of the empire diminished their army, and seemed to throw the whole burthen of the war upon their allies. A variety of other grievances were represented with great freedom and energy, which so embarrassed the diet, that three months were spent in disputations. At length the colleges agreed to raise three hundred thousand florins, to supply the deficiencies of the preceding year, and a million of crowns for the sole use of the military chest: besides, three thousand Saxon horse were to be taken into pay, the army to be augmented to one hundred and twenty thousand effective men, for the defence of the frontiers, the garrisons, and the purpose of facing the enemy upon the Rhine; the elector of Hanover was authorised to enforce by, military execution, the decree of the diet, and the contingents of the several members, either in men, money, or artillery. Yet did not this precaution produce the effect. The princes and cities alledged various excuses for evading this extraordinary expence. They insisted upon recalling the army from Italy, as a measure preferable to new and oppressive levies. A. D. 1708.
Resolutions of the diet.

BESIDES these difficulties, another occurred of a more refined and political nature. By the partition of the one hundred and twenty thousand men, and two million eight hundred thousand florins made by the diet, a certain proportion was assigned to the Spanish Netherlands, under the name of the circle of Burgundy. In this division were included a great number of towns belonging to the republic of the United Provinces, who highly resented that they should be taxed by the empire, at the same time they were contributing to the support of the war as subjects of the states-general. They remonstrated to the diet, refused to pay the taxes, and by this means introduced a new scene of discord and confusion. Ruremonde, Venlo, Nimeguen, Tielt, Bommel, and the whole barony of Breda, sent their deputies to the diet, and to the states-general. It was on the presumption of their having a voice in the grand council of the empire, that they were taxed as subjects of the empire; it was because they were the acknowledged subjects of the republic they refused to pay them. They pleaded the impossibility of being subject to two separate independent states; and the diet thought it unreasonable they should maintain the privileges of members of this assembly, without contributing to the expence of the government. However, the cities carried the debate, and in consequence the whole decree of the diet was rendered fruitless, because an additional expence must fall upon the other members. Objections raised by the circle of Burgundy.

DURING these altercations, the crown of Portugal, the archduke Charles, the duke of Savoy, prince Eugene, the duke of Wirtemberg, and the prince of Hesse-Cassel, were all clamorous for money, troops, provisions, and necessaries. All were in want, and disappointed. The projects of the duke of Savoy, prince Eugene, and the elector of Hanover, were at a stand, and the troops in a most deplorable situation; but nothing could hasten the dilatory proceedings of the Germanic body. Without England, the confederates must have been ruined, and all the glorious victories of Eugene and Marlbrough rendered abortive. The British parliament kept firm not only to their engagements, but greatly exceeded the promised supplies, and became equally the support and the cement of the alliance. Through the invigorating influence of this wealthy state, always proud of taking the lead, the principal in every quarrel, and the prey of every confederacy, the combined armies were at length put in motion. In Flanders the battle of Oudenarde was gained, under the auspices of Marlbrough and Eugene, though the enemy were headed by a prince of the blood, and the philosophic Vendome, one of the first generals in Europe, and now, with marechal Villars, the prop of Lewis's declining glory. Lisle, Ghent, and other cities, surrendered to the conquerors, and nothing seemed capable of stemming the impetuosity of the confederates. On the Rhine no considerable transaction occurred: both sides directed their chief strength to the Netherlands; and the affairs of Hungary still bore an unfavourable aspect.

Hungary.

A diet sits at Presburg.

THOUGH the malcontents had been frequently defeated, they were far from being conquered, obstinately refusing the terms proposed by the court of Vienna. They flattered themselves with the hopes of some happy revolution, which should induce the emperor to secure their privileges. They even wished for a Turkish war, hoping that, between rival powers, they might acquire independency. Ragotski, and the other chiefs, loudly complained of the violence offered to public liberty; and to silence their clamours, and redress their grievances, the emperor convoked a diet at Presburg. This was certainly a prudent measure, had it been right'y pursued; but no steps were taken in the diet to appease the troubles; no concessions were made to sooth, or proposals offered to satisfy the disaffected. The diet answered no other purpose than to shew that the kingdom swarmed with malcontents; only a small proportion of whom appeared in arms, and to draw up a remonstrance of the grievances of the people. They demanded a public ratification, in full diet, of the late emperor's declaration, that no attempts should ever be made on the privileges of the kingdom: they also demanded security that his imperial majesty should never bequeath the crown by will or testament; and that, at his death, the antient right of election of a sovereign should revert to the people: that no Hungarian gentleman should be condemned for treason, before he was legally proved of having appeared in arms against the supreme authority: that the nobility should be exempted from having soldiers quartered upon them: that no taxes should be levied without the consent of the states, and all contributions upon any other authority be abolished: that the general diet be assembled every three years: that the imperial council, relative to the kingdom of Hungary, consist wholly of natives of that country: that all employments in the kingdom be filled up by Hungarians, whether civil, military, or ecclesiastical: that all foreigners should immediately resign their places, except the cardinal Saxe-Zeitz, primate of the kingdom, who, in consideration of his extraordinary merit, should continue in possession of all his dignities: that the officers of the treasury should be wholly directed by the laws, with respect to the confiscation of the estates of noblemen: that liberty of conscience, and the public exercise of religion, should be restored to the Protestants: that, however, the Catholic faith should be the established national religion, and the other tolerated only, for the sake of peace: that the offices of palatine of the kingdom, judges of the king's court, of the thane of Croatia, &c. should be restored on the antient footing, and their salaries regularly paid out of the public revenue: that the revenues of the kingdom should be administered by an Hungarian treasurer, independent of the imperial court: that foreign troops should be obliged to observe exact discipline, and intirely to quit the kingdom before the session of the next diet: finally, that his imperial majesty should commit the whole direction of affairs to his Hungarian council, assisted by four other counsellors of his own election.

SUCH was the bill of remonstrance presented to the court; several of the demands were entirely new, and others the same which had been repeatedly urged, to little purpose. Hitherto the success of the malcontents had not been considerable enough to induce the emperor to grant all their demands; however, defeats and disappointments could not break their spirit; they even rose with misfortune. Nor did the sitting of the diet prevent the malcontents from making excursions into the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria, which they overwhelmed with terror. They besieged a variety of places, and, among others, the strong fortrefs of Neistettl, which they reduced to great extremity. General Heisler, informed of the wretched situation of the garrison, marched with seven thousand cavalry, and a body of infantry, to their relief; his approach obliging Ragotski, and the count Bireccini, to retire beyond the river Trenchin. In their retreat he attacked the enemy's rear with so much vigour, as put them in confusion, and obliged them to relinquish the siege, with the loss of a considerable number of men and military trophies.

WHILE rejoicings were making in Vienna for this trifling victory, the court was alarmed with advice that the rebels had crossed the Danube, forced the lines of Petronelle, carried fort Rust by assault, and plundered the towns and villages within forty miles of the capital of the empire. Intelligence likewise arrived, that the enemy had forced a passage over the Meuer, taken Legrad, a town situated on the confluence of that river with the Drave, surprised Chackburn and Petaw, cut off the communication between Slavonia and Transylva- nia, and reduced general Heisler to the necessity of raising the siege of Newbausel. With this news vanished all hope of reducing the malcontents: their armies, their courage, their resentments, and their prospects, were daily augmenting. They had fortified Newbausel, razed the works of the besiegers, augmented the garrison with two thousand men, and put this place out of all manner of danger. Ragotski had assembled the chief discontented generals, and obtained from them a resolution to continue so just and necessary a war, with the utmost vigour and alacrity. They highly extolled his valour, activity, and patriotism, and rewarded his zeal for the public liberty with the chief command. Then they

a signed a new association, whereby they agreed to defend their privileges with their lives and fortunes; to obey the directions of Ragotski; and to suffer every extremity for the space of six years, rather than renounce their pretensions: at the expiration of this time the association might be renewed <sup>b</sup>.

THE court of Vienna, however, was less astonished at the firm resolutions of the Hungarians, than at the spirit with which the pontiff resented the emperor's late conduct. He now thundered excommunications against some officers of the imperial army in Italy, because, in passing thro' the territories of the church, they had committed some irregularities, and exacted contributions from the clergy of Parma, and other districts. The pontiff had first complained to the emperor, but not finding redress, he proceeded to judgment with great b rigour, and seized this opportunity of wreaking his vengeance for the late insult offered his authority. He likewise refused to acknowledge the archduke's pretensions to the crown of Spain, and thereby widened the breach between the papal and imperial courts. In the month of July the count de Cauris, auditor of the rota for the empire, distributed circular letters in Rome, supported by an imperial manifesto, whereby Joseph annulled the pontifical censures, alledging, for a reason, that Parma and the towns where his troops had lived at free quarters, were fiefs of the empire. He added his resolution to support the imperial rights in Italy, without other exception, than of those towns which could prove their immunities by authentic deeds, signed by former emperors, and ratified by the Germanic body. In this menace he had an eye to the pontiff, and the dukes of Tuscany and Parma, c whole neutrality, during the war that raged in Italy, gave great offence to his imperial majesty.

Disputes renewed with the pope.

JOSEPH pushed his resentment still farther. The cardinal Grimani, viceroy of Naples, published a decree suppressing the nunciatory tribunal, and forbidding the clergy to pay the annates to the chancery of Rome. He insisted, that the king of the Two Sicilies did not require the investiture of the pontiff, because these provinces were not fiefs of the papal see, and the estates of Avignon and Benevento reverted by right to the crown of Naples. To support these decrees the Imperialists commenced hostilities: they seized on Comachio, Magnavaca, Logo, Cévali, and other places, commodious for throwing succours into Ferrara, over which they asserted the right of the duke of Modena. At the same time d the dukes of Mantua and Montferrat were put under the ban of the empire, and their estates confiscated, because they had presumed to tax the imperial justice. It had been stipulated in the treaty of 1707, by which the French evacuated Lombardy, that the duchy of Mantua should be sequestered in the hands of the pope and the republic of Venice, until a general pacification should determine its fate; and the emperor should maintain garisons in such towns as he thought proper, out of the revenues of the duchy, only allowing a certain sum for the support of the ducal dignity. Without regard to this treaty, the Imperialists appropriated the whole revenues to their own purposes, and the duke was left to beg his sustenance, like a vagrant, from the neighbouring princes. They likewise e transported the duke's artillery to Milan, and other places, obliging the inhabitants of Mantua to maintain their forces at free quarters. It would be vain to attempt a vindication of this conduct, equally insolent and oppressive. The Imperialists acted in this manner wherever their arms were successful, poverty being the strong motive to their rapaciousness <sup>c</sup>.

Joseph oppresses the Italian states.

As to Montferrat, the emperor gave the investiture of the duchy to the duke of Savoy, on condition that prince adhered faithfully to the alliance during the war, without regard to natural affection and the interests of his daughter, married to the duke of Anjou, competitor with the archduke Charles for the Spanish monarchy; that he acknowledged the princess of Wolfembutte as queen of Spain, in right of her husband the archduke; and that he should grant the duke of Modena a subsidy of fifteen thousand livres, until he was put f in quiet possession of the duchy of Ferrara. The death of the duke of Mantua happily prevented the chagrin he must have felt from this iniquitous distribution of his dominions. This event made no alteration: the emperor pursued his resolution of establishing the imperial rights in Italy on the antient footing; and he ordered the duke of Parma to prove his rights in fifteen days, or pay homage to the empire, under pain of confiscation of all his dominions. All Italy was alarmed at the high tone in which Joseph expressed himself. Venice, Genoa, and all the other states, were deeply interested in this resolution, which must rob them of the greatest part of their dominions, or render them at least subject to the empire: yet the imperial forces in Italy, and their own weakness, obliged them to suppress their complaints, and satisfy themselves with murmuring at a conduct they were incapable of resenting. At length, Joseph carried his violences to so enormous a length, that g they ventured upon remonstrances. They said, that his measures were contradictory, since he required the consent of the aulic council in a simple donation in Italy; and yet had of his own right, disposed of the Higher Palatinate, and the county of Chamb, in favour of the count Palatine. His father Leopold had never consulted the empire when he transferred to the duke of Savoy a considerable part of the Milanese. Besides, that prince had, in the year 1691, declared the duke of Parma a vassal of the holy see; yet the emperor now claimed the duchy as a fief of the empire. These arguments were unanswerable; but Joseph's claim must be decided not by reason, but the sword.

The pope has recourse to arms.

THE court of Rome, less timid than the other states and princes of Italy, resolved to join force to arguments, to stop the progress of the imperial power. In a conclave of thirty-four cardinals, a great majority was for coming to an open rupture, and repelling hostilities: all of them contributed to the expence of raising an army, to the command of which count Marsigli was appointed. The peasants of Ferrara were already in arms; and being joined by a few ecclesiastical forces, they drove the Imperialists out of Argenta and Longastrino, while the marquis de Bentivoglio, at the head of his own vassals, seized upon their magazines. On the first notice of these hostilities, count Thaun marched for the Ferrarese, forced several important posts, and laid siege to the capital, forbidding the people to supply the inhabitants with provision, under the penalty of military execution. At the same time the prince of Darmstadt, commander in chief in Naples, ordered several regiments to file towards the ecclesiastical territories; but before they entered upon action, the marquis de Prie was sent to Rome to propose an accommodation. The terms were, that the pontiff should reduce his standing forces to five thousand men; that he should permit the Imperialists to quarter in the ecclesiastical territories, and a passage when required. A few days were given him to consider the conditions, and in the mean time an armistice was granted.

Peace con-
the pontiff.

ALREADY the Imperialists were in possession of the greater part of Ferrara, and the troops under count Thaun only waited for orders to march directly to Rome, while the fleets of England and Holland threatened the pontiff's sea-ports and coasts. The princes of Italy were over-awed: they scarce ventured to breathe in whispers their grievances; and the remonstrances lately published, they feared had already roused the indignation of the confederates. Terror appeared in every face, and a general revolution in the affairs of Italy was apprehended. Clement assembled a consistory, to deliberate on the state of affairs, and the emperor's propositions: several cardinals were bold enough to repel them; but the more dispassionate were of opinion, it was better to yield certain points, and a few temporal rights, than incense a monarchy equally able to destroy or support the holy see. As they could come to no resolution, a message was sent to the marquis de Prie, requesting a prolongation of the armistice, the time limited being too short to deliberate on matters of so great moment; but he answered, that an extension of the truce exceeded his instructions; and that the infallible consequence of rejecting the emperor's proposals would be the desolation of the ecclesiastical territories, perhaps of Rome itself. This menace determined the consistory: they were terrified with the picture drawn by the imperial ambassador; and fearing the ecclesiastical forces were too weak to resist the enemy, they embraced the proposals, and signed the treaty in the month of January. Here it was stipulated, that the pontiff should reduce his army to the number mentioned above; that he should disband all the French and Spanish auxiliaries; that he should furnish subsistence for six thousand Imperialists in his dominions; that he should on no terms abet the malcontents in Naples, or assist the enemies of the house of Austria, and the other allies; that Comacchio should remain in the hands of the emperor, until it was otherwise disposed of at a general pacification; at which time commissaries should be appointed on both sides to adjust their mutual pretensions to this and to Parma and Placentia. No mention was made about acknowledging the right of the archduke to the Spanish monarchy: this was remitted to the conclave, where the emperor depended on a majority. This circumstance gave the French the greatest uneasiness. Lewis doubted not but establishing the right of Charles to the Spanish succession would be a necessary article of the treaty. Marechal Tesse was therefore dispatched to Rome to frustrate the negotiation; but his remonstrances made no impression. The Imperialists marched towards Rome, the treaty was signed, and the marechal was forced to rest satisfied with protestations. With respect, however, to acknowledging the archduke Charles, the pontiff egregiously equivocated. In his brief, addressed to that prince, he called him 'Our dear son the Catholic king in Spain;' a phrase which equally incurred the resentment of both parties. France alledged he granted too much in calling Charles a Catholic king; and the emperor was displeased he gave him a title inferior to the Catholic king of Spain, Naples, and the Indies. Clement, however, cleared himself.

THE new year was ushered in by the emperor's application to the states of the empire, to confirm the ninth electorate he had created in favour of the duke of Hanover. A variety

* riery of princes objected to the erection of this electorate, particularly the archbishops of Treves and Cologne. All the Catholics blamed Leopold for strengthening the Protestant interest in the electoral college, and they now represented to Joseph the evils which might arise from ratifying the creation of a new dignity. For six years the affair had been agitated; but Joseph determined to surmount all opposition, and at any rate oblige the general of his army on the Rhine, and his Protestant allies. To satisfy the Catholics, it was proposed to erect for them another electorate, so as to turn the scale in the electoral college; but this being opposed, it was resolved to give a casting vote to the president of the diet, who was always a Catholic, the archbishop of Mentz constantly holding that dignity. Upon this compromise the elector of Hanover was admitted into the college; but the dispute was not wholly terminated. The duke of Wurtemberg opposed his being complimented with the grand standard of the empire, which had been long possessed by his family. He said, that honours ought to be contrived for the elector of Hanover which should diminish in no respect the other members of the empire, and particularly the duke of Wurtemberg, who had always distinguished his loyalty to the imperial crown. Recourse was then had to the place of grand treasurer, because, since the proscription of the elector of Bavaria, the count-palatine quitted that title for the other more honourable one of grand master of the empire: yet, as by the peace of Baden all employments and dignities were established on the antient footing, this project likewise met with difficulties. It was almost impossible to adjust the different pretensions of the elector-palatine and the elector of Hanover, who disputed about the dignity of grand treasurer. It was expected all obstructions would be removed, by making the new elector grand master of the horse; but to this the king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, put in his claim, pretending that all the functions attached to that charge belonged of antient right to the arch-marechal of the empire.

Difficulties about the honours to be conferred on the elector of Hanover.

AFTER the diet had acknowledged the elector of Hanover, they voted that the emperor Joseph had a voice in the electoral college as king of Bohemia; an honour which none of his predecessors enjoyed since Ladislaus. A peculiar prerogative he likewise enjoyed: it was, that his presence at the assembly could not be required, unless the diet was held on the frontiers of the kingdom whence he derived his right of voting. There was a wide difference made between the re-admission of the sovereign of Bohemia, and the introduction of the house of Brunswick into the diet: the rights of the first were without exception or limitation; those of the other were restrained to the male issue of Ernest-Augustus, the first elector.

In this situation were the affairs of the empire, when the most Christian king began seriously to wish seeing an issue to a long war, which had desolated and impoverished his dominions. The president Rouille came to Antwerp to confer with the deputies of the states-general: his terms appeared so moderate, that, after much altercation and punctilious delays, Rouille was told, his master would be permitted to send plenipotentiaries to the Hague, to adjust the preliminaries of a general pacification. This was retaliating the indignities sustained from the French monarch before the peace of Ryswick: it was indeed mortifying, in excess, to that towering pride which aimed at giving law to all Europe. After tedious negotiations, mutual proposals were made and rejected: the allies demanded more than Lewis, even in the wain of his glory, could grant, without staining his honour, and subduing his natural affection for a grandson. We have already exhibited the particulars in our History of France: sufficient it is to remark in this place, that both sides prepared for the prosecution of the war, after Rouille had notified the impossibility of his master's accepting five of the articles specified in the preliminaries.

THE confederates under Marlbrough and Eugene were again victorious in the Netherlands: Villars lost the battle of Malplaquet; but he was formidable in his defeat, and had stained deep with blood the laurels gained by the conquerors.

UPON the Rhine the campaign opened late in the season. The elector of Hanover, dissatisfied with the conduct of the preceding year, predicted the event of this, from the dilatory proceedings of the Germanic body. Scarce a single member of the empire discovered the least ardour in the common cause. All were slow in furnishing their contingents, and many refused at all to contribute to the public expence. The best troops were employed in Flanders, and money was wanting to assemble an army on the Rhine. It was proposed in the diet to borrow; but the college of princes refused their consent both to this measure and to levying new taxes, until all the circles had paid the arrears of their quotas. Under these embarrassments, the elector of Hanover wisely declined accepting the command of an army in want of every necessary, and which must every where be foiled by the enemy's superiority. However, he was at length gained over by the influence of the queen of England; upon which he repaired to the camp about the middle of August. He no sooner reviewed his forces than he made a motion towards the French lines at Weisseburg, commanded by the marechal de Harcourt. He had formed a project, which would have proved fatal to the enemy, had it been attended with the success which might reasonably have been expected. It was proposed to pass the Rhine into the Higher Alsace; while count Thaun, after crossing the Rhine, should penetrate into Franche-comté, with a view either to reduce that province, or to seize upon the Three Bishoprics, and levy contributions in Champagne and Burgundy. To amuse de Harcourt, the elector propagated a report that he designed attacking his lines at Weisseburg; and the marechal took the necessary measures of defence, at the same time that he believed something further was intended. As if he had been acquainted with the elector's real design, he detached five squadrons and two battalions to defend the passage of the Rhine towards the Upper Alsace, and the commanding officer was scarce arrived at his post before he received intelligence that the enemy were in motion. In a few days the marechal Harcourt was surprised with undoubted intelligence that general Merci, at the head of thirteen battalions and twenty-three squadrons, was traversing the territory of Basil, the Swiss having, contrary to their professed neutrality, granted him a passage. By the twenty-first of August he had entered the Higher Alsace, and advanced as far as the isle of Newburg, between Brisack and Hunningen. The sieur de Roccaux, who commanded the French detachment, immediately abandoned the island, and retired in such good order towards the main army, that Merci did not chuse to hazard an attack. Then the Imperialists, occupying that post, threw a bridge over the Rhine, and marched over eight battalions, leaving the rest of the troops to the defence of the bridge and island. Mean time, count de Bourg advanced with a body of troops beyond the lines, to watch the motions of the Imperialists; and he was reinforced with four battalions and eight squadrons, sent to his assistance by the marechal. With this force, in all consisting of eighteen squadrons, six battalions, and eight companies of grenadiers, he resolved to give battle to the enemy; which Merci, at the head of nine thousand men, imprudently enough accepted. The armies met between Hermstadt and Rumersheim, at the distance of a league from the isle of Newburg, and engaged with great vigour for half an hour, when the Imperialists gave way, and left a complete victory to the count de Bourg, with all their baggage, provision, stores, twelve pair of colours, two standards, two pair of kettle-drums, several pieces of cannon, two hundred horses, and all count Merci's papers, among which was found the plan concerted by the elector of Hanover.

AFTER this unfortunate action, the elector of Hanover retired towards the lines of Ettlingen, and relinquished the great object in view; while count Merci, filing off to the Rhine, endeavoured to cover the passes of the Black Forest; though he could not prevent the marechal from laying under contributions the marquisate of Baden, and the bailliages in the neighbourhood of Landau.

IN Italy count Thaun opposed marechal Berwick. As to the duke of Savoy, he was so disgusted with the emperor's vast pretensions in Italy, which he thought might in time devour all the lesser states, that he resigned the command of the combined army. The Imperialists had taken Annecy, with intention to penetrate into Franche-comté; but the defeat of Merci rendered that post useless. A variety of detachments were made from both armies; but they had the caution not to fall in with each other. At last marechal Berwick, with the main army, approached Briançon, with intention to besiege it; and Thaun, incensed that with a superior army he had gained not a single advantage, advanced to give him battle. All his attempts were foiled; and yet his conduct upon this occasion obtained him great honour. He was opposed by a general of such vast abilities, that to maintain his ground, and avoid being disgraced, was considerable reputation. He practised every stratagem to oblige the marechal to quit the advantageous post he occupied; but in vain: the French army was so judiciously posted as to cover all the frontier, and render perfectly secure the great object of Thaun's designs, Dauphine and Provence. In a word, all was directed with so much ability, that this campaign affords the finest lessons in the art of war.

MEAN while, the allies had so vigorously prosecuted the war in Flanders, that the archduke's affairs in Spain were wholly neglected. Eugene, as much respected at Vienna as Marlborough was in London, carried all before him in council, and determined the emperor to direct his chief efforts to the side of the Netherlands, where he commanded the Imperialists in person. Charles complained that he was neglected, in consequence of which his conquests were seized from him, and his influence was daily declining. England, moved by his remonstrances, determined however to send succours to Catalonia: but Lewis now made fresh proposals of peace by his ambassador, the marquis de Torcy. He offered to accept some of the conditions he had last year rejected; but though the approaching re-

a. volution in the English ministry displayed the pacific intentions of that nation, Joseph was still inexorable. He dispatched the count Zinzendorf to the Hague, to traverse the projects of the French ministers; and he acquitted himself with so much address, that the negotiations had the same issue as the preceding. The more the French ambassadors yielded, the more did the allies rise in their demands: every day gave birth to new propositions unfavourable to Lewis. At last, the confederates plainly declared, that, unless the most Christian king would contribute his assistance to dethrone his own grandson, it was impossible the treaty could take effect: and even this hard condition was clogged with restrictions, which rendered it next to impracticable. Yet the confederates endeavoured to load the French monarch with the odium of breaking off the conferences: b. they alledged, that he proposed nothing more than to amuse them with negotiations, in order to draw breath, and recover his vigour for resuming hostilities. Nothing could be less true: it was Lewis's earnest desire to come to an accommodation upon any terms possible, that were not wholly destructive of his honour and humanity. He was now no longer the same formidable monarch who gave law to Europe at Ryswick.

No sooner were the conferences broke off at Gertrudenberg, than both armies took the field in the Netherlands. Bethune, Aire, St. Vinant, and other towns, yielded to the victorious arms of Eugene and Marlborough; but nothing decisive occurred. The allies had gained four towns, and about fifteen leagues of a fine country; but they lost above twenty thousand men, and their infantry was quite ruined.

c. TOWARDS the Rhine no considerable action was performed, not because the parties were too weak to take the field, but because they were pretty equal. Count Merci and Du Bourg exerted all their ability; the one to regain the reputation he had lost, the other, to maintain the glory he had acquired by the late fortunate action: in a word, the season passed in marches, encampments, and stratagems, none of which produced any real advantage.

WITH respect to the affairs in Hungary, they were rather more prosperous than the year preceding. Neubausel submitted to the Imperialists, after sustaining a blockade of six months: yet all the endeavours of the court of Vienna to bring the malcontents to reason, proved fruitless. The old obstructions to peace still remained; the discontented nobility continued to insist upon the re-establishment of their privileges, of the antient laws, d. and the liberty of electing their sovereigns, which the emperor could not be induced to grant. Such was the situation of Hungary, while Bavaria was dismembering in favour of the elector-palatine, and his brother the bishop of Augsburg. Other fiefs were also bestowed on the bishops of Salzburg and Passau. The count de Schomborn, vice-chancellor of the empire, and nephew to the elector of Mentz, was presented with the perpetuity of the district of Reidemburg, in consideration of the bishop of Breslau's being chosen coadjutor of Mentz. All these promotions and donations were made of the emperor's own authority, without consulting the diet, which appeared to him unnecessary, as his father had put the elector of Bavaria under the ban of the empire, without the consent e. of the Germanic body, and the princes of the empire. The same ceremony he neglected in the disposal of Mirandola to the duke of Modena. This duchy he confiscated, because the duke had appeared in the French army; a measure to which he had been forced in the year 1705, while a minor.

IN Italy the campaign passed without effusion of blood; but it was otherwise in Spain, f. where the succours sent by England enabled Charles to gain the decisive victory of Saragossa, which must have infallibly established him in the Spanish throne, had the advantage been properly pursued. But the arrival of the duke de Vendome soon changed the scene, and the consequences of the battle of Villa Viciosa were as fatal to Charles as those of Saragossa might have proved to Philip. This single victory, improved by the abilities of Vendome, restored the affairs of Philip, placed him securely in the throne, and raised him from a fugitive prince to a triumphant monarch. The following note to him from Vendome the night succeeding the battle, is memorable. "Sire, I have prepared for you g. "the best and most glorious bed in which you ever slept." This bed was composed of colours and trophies taken from the enemy, in which the king slept for five hours. The revolution in Spain gave the utmost uneasiness to the allies; and a great man told the duke of Hanover, that the union of two crowns in the house of Bourbon was a gordian knot, which future ages must untie by the sword. The prediction, however, has not been verified in its full meaning, as France has hitherto deduced scarce a single advantage from the succession of a prince of the blood to the Spanish monarchy, besides what would naturally have resulted from the situation of both kingdoms, had not that event ever happened.

This year the elector of Hanover made an acquisition of the county of Delmenhorst, mortgaged to him by the crown of Denmark. As the money borrowed was not paid at
